10. Adenauer and Blank then reverted to the question of preparatory work on barracks, etc which would not be of direct military significance, but they agreed with my suggestion what we should first try to get agreement in principle and should not risk causing further trouble with the French by raising these issues within the next few weeks. Meanwhile they said that the Germans could discuss their practical problems with the United Kingdom and United States experts.

11. I then asked Adenauer about our programme. He said that the more he thought over our plans the happier he was. He thought the French would agree since the important points for most Frenchmen were that the British should participate on a footing of equality with them and that France should not be left alone with Germany. He also thought that Mendes-France would personally welcome our plan as the only way out of his parliamentary difficulties, and because it would enable him to turn to the economic problems which primarily interested him. He was sure that our ideas would also be welcomed in Italy and in America. He now favoured the proposed London conference of the nine as soon as possible after I had completed my European tour.

12. I told Dr. Adenauer that I planned to meet the NATO permanent representatives and General Gruenther in Paris. He thought this would be most useful. I also said that I would be telegraphing to Mr. Dulles who had expressed his readiness to come to Europe this month. But I warned the Chancellor that I thought he was too optimistic about probable French reactions. Dr. Adenauer nevertheless stuck to his view of Mendes-France although he had no confidence in him personally. He thought we might have greater difficulties with the pro-E.D.C. group in Paris. Ends.

GERMAN REARMAMENT

According to reports received by the Foreign Office Mr. Eden's meetings with the Benelux Foreign Ministers in Brussels were very satisfactory and encouraging.

All three Benelux Ministers agreed upon German membership in NATO with the various safeguards which the British have in mind, and appeared convinced that the British proposals would provide the best attainable solution. The suggestion that the Brussels Treaty should be expanded to include Germany and Italy was warmly welcomed and it was agreed that this should be done in such a way as would avoid creating another, and looser, EDC inside NATO. Finally, Benelux Ministers approved the British suggestions on procedure and considered a nine-power conference an essential preliminary to a Ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Council, expressing the hope that both these meetings might take place in London.

On tactics, they were convinced that progress must be made rapidly, and while everything should be done to meet legitimate French preoccupations, the other NATO powers must be prepared in the last resort to go ahead without the French if necessary and should make this clear to the French before it is too late. This attitude apparently reflects the distrust of French tactics resulting from the Brussels conference and the EDC debate, and the feeling that the probability must be faced that having rejected the EDC the French Assembly would also reject an alternative along the lines proposed by Mr. Eden.

The Dutch and Belgian permanent representatives to NATO were present at the afternoon session and welcomed Mr. Eden's plan to meet the NATO Council on September 16. They were particularly interested in working out safeguards within NATO and strengthening NATO structure for this purpose. We understand that informal consultations between Steel and the Dutch and Belgian permanent representatives are now being continued on this point.

Mr. Eden emphasized throughout the discussion that the German contribution to defence and the attendant safeguards could best be handled in NATO and that the Brussels Treaty plan should be kept on a separate political plane. There was, however, a tendency on the part of the Benelux Ministers to suggest that while any new commitments should be to NATO, the expanded Brussels Treaty grouping might be used as a coordinating body which could go further in the direction of mutual assurances, in view of the guarantee of automatic assistance under the Brussels Treaty, than other NATO members would be prepared to go.

NATO AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

I am very glad to note the Council's decision to hold a full-scale discussion on September 16 on the problem of a German defence contribution, and I am in accord with your view that we should do our best to make the discussion as useful as possible. Whether or not you should put forward at appropriate points in the discussion the proposals contained in our memorandum of July 16 as modified by the memorandum of September 3 (draft of which was sent under cover of our letter D-572 of September 7)† should, I think, depend to a considerable extent on the course of the discussion. I would hope that the United Kingdom would put forward their own proposals, and that the discussion might centre on these. If they seem generally acceptable, then we can hold our own in reserve in case the Germans later decide that they cannot accept the U.K. proposals. If the United Kingdom proposals are not put forward and no one else jumps in, you could begin the discussion by putting forward our ideas. These should be presented, as you have suggested, as a line of thought rather than as a "plan". I would not wish, at this early stage in the Council's consideration of the problem, to give the impression that we have ready a fully thought-out set of proposals which the Canadian Government has decided to submit at some future date. You should, therefore, explain that, while they represent the thinking of this Department and carry my judgment, they are not yet Canadian Government views, but are being put forward at this stage in the hope that they might contain useful points which would contribute to an agreed solution of the problem.

2. For your own information, there has not yet been an opportunity to discuss our proposals in Cabinet Defence Committee or with other Departments. I have discussed them in general terms with the Prime Minister, however, and have had a preliminary discussion of our two memoranda with Mr. Campney and General Foulkes.

3. You will see that our present thinking, as presented in the memorandum of September 3, takes into account the very useful comments you have let us have. You will also see, however, that we have maintained the cardinal point of our original plan, namely that whatever armament controls are considered essential to safeguard against a resurgence of German militarism should be instituted in NATO as a whole in order that they should appear non-discriminatory. Our insistence on the point that the necessary safeguards and controls should be built into the NATO structure before admittance of Germany is based on the view that any attempt to impose on Germany discriminatory controls not, repeat not, applicable to other NATO countries would either be unsuccessful from the start or would create for NATO as many problems in the future as it might now solve. If we are wrong in this (and we will soon find this out) we would have to change our views. We are convinced, however, that West Germany, which is already in a strong position to insist on complete sovereignty and equality in the Western Community, would not long be happy with a manifestly unequal status in NATO. Even if she accepted it initially, she would soon be making efforts to change it, efforts which could not but create most serious strains within the Alliance. In other words, the Western countries are rapidly reaching a point in their relations with Germany where they will be unable to ask of her substantially greater obligations than they themselves are also prepared to assume.

4. It is on the basis of these considerations that we consider the application of an armament control system on a NATO-wide basis a more practicable proposition than the United Kingdom approach of persuading Germany to accept a prior agreement with limiting safeguards as the price of obtaining the rest of her sovereignty and joining NATO. However, I would not wish to emphasize any points of difference between the United Kingdom plan and our own ideas, but hope rather that the best features of both could be used. There have, in fact, been indications in the press and hints from your United Kingdom colleague that the British may have taken over some of our ideas. We have had no official confirmation of this, but if it is true, so much the better.

5. In your earlier comments you expressed misgivings lest our concept of an armament control system in NATO would result in a loss of direction and purpose which would seriously threaten the NATO defence structure. We assume that these misgivings were due primarily to the fact that Mr. Robertson's original suggestion was aimed partly at the disarmament problem and that we took the model for our inspection machinery from the United States disarmament proposals. This is a matter of presentation which we have tried to take care of in the later memorandum and telegrams outlining our modified plan. On the matter of substance, however, we hope you agree with us that a concept of armament supervision and control not too far removed from present NATO activity in this field would in so sense be incompatible with the "long haul" approach to NATO defence planning and would, in fact, be admirably suited to the dual task we shall have, if Germany is admitted, of being in a position to strike a fair balance between German rearmament and the defence efforts of the other NATO countries.

6. To this extent I would agree with your view (para. 2 of your telegram 693) that the concept of armament control in NATO should, at least at this stage, be viewed primarily as a convenient means of facilitating the integration of Germany in the Atlantic Community rather than as an end in itself. On the other hand, it is my view that the strengthening of that Community and the successful integration in it of Germany are both desirable and complementary objectives; the first is necessary to the second and the second will contribute to the first.

7. It is also my view that we should not put exclusive emphasis on German admission to NATO. We have consistently supported the idea of closer European integration within the framework of the Atlantic Community and we should continue to do so. I do not regard our proposals for strengthening NATO as excluding further progress toward that objective but rather as facilitating it. I would hope that, once Germany has been admitted to NATO, it would be possible for the European members to make further progress in that direction. I agree with you, however, that the proposal to include Germany and Italy in the Brussels Treaty should not be viewed as an alternative to German admission to NATO, but as complementary to it.

8. With respect to the implications for Canada of our proposals (paras. 3, 4 and 5 of your telegram No. 693), we recognize that they may put NATO in a position to interfere to a somewhat greater extent in matters hitherto regarded as exclusively Canadian. Our membership in NATO has already meant for us some limitation of sovereignty and obviously we cannot contribute to a strengthening of the Atlantic Community without expecting a further measure of practical (though not formal) limitation in certain fields. As you point out this will mean some reorientation in the attitude adopted here. I could not, repeat not, agree however that the establishment of inspection machinery in NATO should or could result in itself in the appointment of a NATO supreme commander for the Canada-U.S. Region. If we submit firm proposals for an armament control plan we must, of course, be prepared to accept its application to the Canadian defence programme but the extent to which it will apply will depend on the particular variant adopted. If Variant B of our memorandum of September 3 was adopted (this is the one we prefer and it need be the only one to which you would refer) only those Canadian forces and their armaments actually assigned to SACEUR would be subject to inspection. Since there is no NATO commander in the Canada-U.S. Region, none of the Canadian forces for North American defence would be covered; since we only " earmark" forces for SACLANT, and do not assign them except in wartime, our SACLANT forces would not be covered either. The United States would, of course, be in a similar position and it is with a view to the difficulties of obtaining acceptance of a more comprehensive plan that I have indicated my support for Variant B.

9. Since drafting this telegram, we have received Mr. Eden's report of his talks with Adenauer from London, No. 1143, which has been repeated to you. This may well have a bearing on what you should say Thursday, but we have not had sufficient time to study its implications in that connection. First reading indicates that Eden has accepted the idea that limitations on German rearmament should be self-imposed, while we had thought that in the British plan they would result from an agreement prior to NATO admission. The message in question may make it even more necessary for us to be cautious in putting forward our own ideas, but we will cable you about this tomorrow. In addition, I think it would be useful if we had a telephone conversation, and for that purpose, I will be phoning you at 11.00 o'clock our daylight time.

NATO AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

Following for your background information is an analysis prepared in the Department of the United Kingdom working paper (text of which was given in Canada House Telegram 1038 of August 26; it may have been somewhat amended since then):

Sub-Paragraph (a): While Germany would probably not object to the level of forces proposed here we think she might well decline to bind herself to it before becoming a member of NATO, since she could argue justifiably that the German contribution, like the contributions of the other NATO countries, should be decided through the Annual Review process and in accordance with agreed NATO strategy.

Sub-Paragraph (b): This is perhaps the most important part of the United Kingdom plan. We feel that the Protocol on "strategically exposed areas" would be manifestly discriminatory since Germany would be the only NATO country whose total resources would be subject to these very serious restrictions. We also feel that, unless the Protocol was accompanied by the establishment of some machinery to ensure its implementation, it would prove to be inadequate.

Sub-Paragraph (c): Like you we see no, repeat no, objection (indeed some psychological advantages) to a European Arms Pool. However, this must be a matter for the E.D.C. countries alone to decide and we would not, repeat not, regard it as an essential safeguard.

Sub-Paragraph (d): Such an Agreement would be of great value and has in fact been suggested in our memorandum of September 3 (paragraph 15) as a necessary accompaniment to any variant of our control plan which excludes atomic armaments.

Sub-Paragraph (e): There would be advantage in including provisions along these lines in any plan to admit Germany to NATO.

Sub-Paragraphs (f) and (g): These additional measures, which are not primarily aimed at Germany, might also be worth considering in connection with Germany's admission to NATO but are not essential to it.

Sub-Paragraph (h): We regard some assurances of this nature as a natural corollary to the Agreement envisaged in sub-paragraph (d) above and as an essential part of any plan to rearm Germany. It might be better, however, if this assurance could be in the form of a NATO declaration to which all member countries would subscribe. This would bring NATO obligations more obviously into line with U.N. obligations and would add to the non-discriminatory appearance of the arrangements.

NATO AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

At the last moment Mendes-France elected to take the chair at the council meeting summoned to hear Eden's report. Lange who happened to be in Paris at the time also attended. Mendes-France's action apparently infuriated Spaak, who telephoned Ismay immediately before the meeting to protest that other foreign ministers had been given no opportunity to attend. De Staercke had been instructed to make this protest in the meeting, but as matters developed, he had no opportunity to do so prior to Mendes-France's departure.

2. The meeting was run with military precision. Eden ably and effectively outlined the general United Kingdom attitude, as influenced by his talks in Brussels, Bonn and Rome. In each of these capitals he had apparently found substantial general support for the United Kingdom approach. He explained quite frankly that this approach was two-fold. One aspect would be the admission of Germany to NATO as a means of providing for the full and equal participation of Germany in the western defence programme, while the other aspect would be the modification of the Brussels Treaty to provide for the entry of Germany and Italy. This latter step was designed to meet the need for the close political association of Germany with the democratic countries of Western Europe and would provide a means for the exchange among such countries (including the United Kingdom) of more comprehensive engagements than were involved in the broader and looser NATO structure.

3. Mendes-France closed off the meeting with almost indecent haste as he was apparently anxious to hurry to another appointment. There was no discussion, but I did have the opportunity to ask Eden whether he thought that the dual procedure which he proposed would involve serious delays in the admission of Germany to NATO. He replied that he did not think this would occur as the work on both aspects of the matter could proceed simultaneously.

4. Following the meeting I had an opportunity to talk to De Staercke and Van Starkenborgh, and I may acquire still further information in the course of Gladwin Jebb's luncheon for Eden. De Staercke and Van Starkenborgh were irritated and depressed at the present situation, as it appears that Mendes-France has taken with Eden in the current talks a line very similar to that which he followed at Brussels. He has said that there would be no difficulty about ending the occupation régime in Germany and admitting Germany to the Brussels Treaty Organization. He has insisted, however, that at the present time no possible majority is in sight in the French Assembly for German rearmament in any form. He has professed to agree personally with Eden's proposal, but has raised the old bug-bear of "questions préalables" (the Saar, the Moselle, etc.). It appears that at present at least he is prepared to go no further than to back the admission of Germany to the Brussels Treaty Organization and defer any arrangement for German re-armament until such time as a closer political accord can be established between France and Germany. Eden is working steadily away on him and expressed hope that he may be able to bring him around, but certainly the situation is far from encouraging.

5. Eden is fully determined to proceed with the nine power meeting in London, and now considers that September 28 would be a suitable date. I propose to ask him at lunch whether he would still proceed with that meeting and risk a repetition of the Brussels failure (which this time would presumably mean a complete break-up of everything) even if he has not been able in the meantime to work out a line of agreement with Mendes-France.

6. In a separate telegram I shall try to set out some general thoughts on the situation which have occurred to me in connection with the recent developments.

NATO AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

We have been studying with great interest the reports which we have received from you and others, and which are greatly appreciated, on Eden's recent visit to Brussels, Bonn and Paris. There are, naturally some gaps to be filled in and some ambiguities to be cleared up, but on the whole we now have a good picture of the U.K. proposals and of their initial reception on the continent.

2. As already indicated, it is important to be clear about what is meant by German references to self-imposed limitations, and NATO's, and particularly SACEUR's functions in regard to armament limitation and control. Also, Adenauer's readiness to put the German forces "into an integrated army" needs clarification. Was he referring to some possible successor to the EDC Army, or to SACEUR's forces, (which are also called integrated)? We assume that Adenauer realizes that before any such step can be worked out, an understanding must be reached that Germany will assign all her forces to the future integrated army. (Your telegram 1161,† which has just arrived, throws considerable light on these and related matters.)

3. As I have already indicated, the dual Brussels cum NATO approach to the problem put forward by the British is ingenious but may have in it elements of danger for the future development of NATO and the Atlantic Community. Eden seems to regard the enlarged Brussels Pact as a convenient framework for closer political consultation, to which United Kingdom assurances along the lines of those given in the 3-power declaration of May, 1952, and of the United Kingdom declaration of April, 1954, can be extended.⁶² Adenauer, however, seems to be thinking in terms of developing a looser form of EDC which would include the United Kingdom. He talks, for example, of being prepared to consider a joint general staff for these countries (para. 5 of telegram 1143). Does he regard United Kingdom fuller participation than previously promised as a prerequisite to developments along these lines?

4. Furthermore, while Eden stressed in Paris that the new and enlarged Brussels arrangement "must not conflict with NATO", nevertheless, the possibilities of divorcement, if not of conflict, are inherent in the proposal that everything of a military nature should now be left to NATO, while European political, social and cultural co-operation should be centred in the Brussels arrangements. Mr. Wilgress well expresses our own worries in this matter in paragraph 3 of his telegram 712 of September 16.† You will also not have overlooked the emphasis that Bonn has placed on the Brussels arrangements as providing the new "European political grouping", while NATO will look after the armaments control machinery.

5. A related and important point is that raised in paragraph 7 of your telegram 1143. Eden and Adenauer seem to have agreed that a German defence contribution comes only second to a closer political association of Germany with the West; other reports seem to indicate that this has been the line pursued in other quarters throughout Mr. Eden's journey, from which Eden did not disagree. We have been looking at the problem the other way around and still think that it should be considered in this perspective. In the light of EDC experience, we feel that priority should be given to German rearmament, with adequate safeguards, within the Atlantic context. Once this has been agreed upon, the European countries would feel more at ease, because better protected militarily, to work towards closer political association with themselves. I am sure that you share our worry that if priority is to be given to any form of political association this will be used as a device for further postponements at a time we can ill-afford such delays.

6. We also see in such an approach a serious danger that the urgent problem of a German defence contribution would again be treated outside the NATO context, as it was when the EDC was under consideration. If this happens, we risk having a situation in which the United States (with the United Kingdom willy nilly training behind) would attempt to make their own arrangements with Germany behind the back of an isolated France. In such a case, NATO might lose all control of developments.

7. The stumbling block will probably be the French Parliament and it is a very serious one. If it were decided, however, to go ahead with the idea of an enlarged Brussels Treaty organization separate from Germany's association with NATO, it should be on the understanding that the two questions are separate and that neither is dependent on the other. In such a way, there may be some hope of an early settlement of the military issue and of retaining the valuable European idea. Otherwise, we would be worse off after the London Conference than we are now. The key to this part of the problem seems to me to remain in Paris, which is only one reason why I regret that Mr. Dulles apparently prefers Duck Island to that city as a port of call on his latest journey. Ends.

CANADIAN PROPOSAL FOR ARMAMENT CONTROL

1. The last opportunity for us to present the Canadian proposal for armament control to the Permanent Council will be at the restricted meeting which is to be held following the regular meeting of the Council tomorrow morning, September 22. If it is left until the London meeting, I fear it will be too late for those participating to give the proposal consideration. Discussion will then be concentrated exclusively on the Eden plan and the French plan with a probable attempt to effect a compromise between these two plans.

2. Since the Canadian proposal offers possibilities of providing the last chance for a solution along Atlantic as opposed to European lines, I would strongly urge that I be permitted to put it forward tomorrow in very general terms, but with sufficient clarity to enable the idea to take root. I would include a reference to the desirability of keeping to the forefront the concept of the Atlantic community.

3. In spite of United Kingdom misgivings, I have been induced to send you this message by reason of a sudden interest shown in our proposal by the United States. A member of the Bruce Mission rang up this morning and ask to have details of the Canadian plan about which he had received word from Washington.

4. I shall endeavour to reach the Under-Secretary by telephone this afternoon in order that he may get in touch with the Minister in New York. If we are to take the action recommended in this telegram it will be necessary for instructions to reach us early tomorrow (Wednesday morning).

NINE-POWER CONFERENCE ON GERMAN RE-ARMAMENT

At present writing it seems probable that the basis for discussion at the meeting will be the French proposals for German and Italian participation in a modified Brussels Treaty Organisation. The purpose of the conference has been spelled out by Mr. Eden and Mr. Dulles and cleared with M. Mendes-France in a statement intended to avoid misunderstanding. This statement, the text of which is appended, declared that the conference was intended to discuss measures required equally for the promotion of European unity and the defence of the free world through the expansion of the Brussels Treaty to include Germany and Italy, and of NATO to include Germany. The United States, United Kingdom, France and Germany would discuss among themselves plans for restoring German sovereignty. This statement has not been shown to non-participating governments.

2. The NATO Council was not given an opportunity properly to discuss the questions arising out of the collapse of EDC, nor to authorise any smaller grouping to act on behalf of the Council. The conference can presumably, therefore, discuss any matters the nine ministers decide are appropriate.

3. The only other concrete suggestions advanced for a solution of the problem of Germany are those made by Mr. Eden on his visit to capitals of the former EDC countries. The United Kingdom has indicated that it would accept the French proposals as the basis of discussions, but Mr. Eden has not given the French Prime Minister any assurance that they are necessarily acceptable to the United Kingdom.

4. The United States, so far as we know, has not produced any alternative. Mr. Dulles did tell Herr Adenauer in Bonn that he placed the highest value on continuation of the idea of European integration with supra-national institutions, but he did not feel that the extension of the Brussels Treaty offered any prospect of this. Mr. Adenauer is said to have agreed to this. Mr. Dulles, according to our Embassy in Bonn, revealed clearly to the Chancellor that the United States intends to press ahead for an agreement in principle on German admission to NATO so that German rearmament can commence immediately. He is reported to have urged the Germans to reject any detailed restrictions on their rearmament proposed by France.

5. There is a danger, therefore, of a clash between the ideas advanced on the one hand by M. Mendes-France and Mr. Eden (though there are many basic differences between them) and Mr. Dulles and Herr Adenauer on the other hand. In addition there would seem to be clearly a fundamental difference of approach.

6. I attach the following studies:

(a) A summary and analysis of the French proposals, relating them to EDC as modified by Mendes-France at the Brussels meeting;

(b) A summary and analysis of the United Kingdom proposals from the information available — no paper comparable to the French was apparently prepared or circulated;

(c) A comparative analysis of the two proposals;

(d) An analysis of the motives behind recent French, United Kingdom and United States moves on the subject of German re-armament;

(e) The Canadian Armament Control Plan;

(f) An analysis of the relationship of NATO to the French proposals.

7. In many ways the French proposals, if they could be linked with German admission to NATO, would be in accordance with past Canadian aims. We have felt that West European unity and solidarity, and therefore that of the whole western world, could best be served by closer United Kingdom association with it. The United Kingdom now seem prepared to give this movement greater support, though it is doubtful if they could accept all the French proposals. It is, however, a concrete and pragmatic step towards closer European co-operation and should probably be encouraged provided it takes place within the framework of NATO. The supra-national aspects of European unity are clearly not yet acceptable to the French and British and premature insistence on them might simply ruin the chances of closer co-operation.

8. One of the objections to the United Kingdom proposals is that they tend to concentrate all the political and psychological aspects of German association in the Brussels Treaty and the military controls in NATO, thus taking away from the latter much of its importance as the vehicle for developing an Atlantic community. The French proposals would tend to concentrate supervision of the military and armament controls in the Brussels Treaty Organization, in accordance with the requirements of the NATO Council acting on the advice of SACEUR.

9. The French proposals make no mention of German sovereignty, or of the question of the status of United States and Canadian forces in Europe. But presumably if the basis of the proposals were accepted these matters could be worked out. It would seem unlikely that the French will accept any proposals (such as the United States appears to have in mind) to issue separate declarations by the three occupying powers regarding German sovereignty until some acceptable plan for controlling German rearmament has been worked out.

10. I would suggest that we do everything possible at the London meeting to assist in reaching a compromise solution acceptable to both the British and the French, provided that it includes the admission of Germany to NATO and the restoration of German sovereignty, and a reasonable compromise in emphasis between the European idea and the Atlantic concept, though naturally we would prefer that the unity of NATO be preserved as the prime organ of Atlantic cooperation.

11. It would seem inappropriate for us to advance the Canadian suggestion for armament control in NATO so long as there is a chance of our objectives being achieved through a United Kingdom-French scheme which commanded general approval.

12. It is possible that this whole concept may meet with United States and/or German opposition, and if there were little chance of compromise, we might then introduce our ideas. Another possibility is that the French and British fail to reach agreement on the extent of United Kingdom commitments on the continent, in which case our ideas might provide an acceptable means of meeting the minimum demands of each.

13. Our proposals could also appropriately be put forward if, in the process of bargaining, the principals appeared to be reaching a settlement with which nobody was really satisfied, and which we ourselves saw as unsatisfactory for NATO as a whole.

14. There were suggestions from M. Mendes-France last week that he was going to introduce certain "questions préalables", such as the Saar and the Moselle. He made no mention of them to us or to the United Kingdom, but in his speech yesterday in the Council of Europe Assembly at Strasbourg he is reported to have stated that the proposed solutions also might help solve the problem of the future of the Saar. The introduction of these issues could well stop the whole process.

15. M. Mendes-France said formally that if his programme was accepted he would stake the life of his Government on its acceptance by the French Assembly before the end of the year. If we do give any support to his plan it would probably be wise to insist that some such conditions be attached to prevent any further delays.

LONDON TALKS

The purpose of the Nine Power Conference is to agree with a view to the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Council upon the measures required equally for the promotion of European unity and for the defence of the free world through the expansion of the Brussels Treaty to include the German Federal Republic and Italy and of NATO so as to include the German Federal Republic.

FRENCH PROPOSALS FOR GERMAN REARMAMENT WITHIN THE BRUSSELS TREATY ORGANIZATION (WESTERN UNION)

Mendes-France has now stated his terms for accepting German rearmament. He has proposed that they be discussed at the Nine-Power London Conference and if the result is acceptable to his Government, to stake the future of his Government on their acceptance by the National Assembly before the end of the year. The United Kingdom has accepted the French proposals as a basis for discussion at London.

2. The French claim that their proposals for German rearmament within the context of the Brussels Treaty are based on the following principles:

- (1) No discrimination.
- (2) The limitation of troop formations and armaments.
- (3) Control of troop formations and armaments.
- (4) The provisions will apply only to the armed forces placed under the command of SACEUR.
- (5) Full participation by the United Kingdom.

3. Subject to the conditions outlined below, the French require that the Brussels Treaty become the organization responsible for the security of Western Europe, and that Germany and Italy participate in the Treaty as has also been suggested by the United Kingdom. The French have proposed that the Brussels Treaty be modified by the incorporation of clauses of a technical military nature which would permit a German military contribution to the defence of Western Europe. This contribution would, however, be strictly supervised by the members of the Western Union. The French conditions are as follows:

(1) The Ministerial Conference of the Brussels Treaty Organization will agree to adopt a level of armed forces to be maintained in Europe by each of the member countries in accordance with the levels specified by the NATO Council acting on the recommendations of its Supreme Command. In carrying out this function the Brussels Treaty Council of Ministers is to take note of Article (7) of the Brussels Treaty which provides in part that the Council is to be convened "in order to permit the High Contracting Parties to consult . . . with regard to the attitude to be adopted and the steps to be taken in case of a renewal by Germany of an aggressive policy . . .". (The phrasing of this Article is no doubt to be suitably amended.)

(2) The minimum levels of NATO will become maximum commitments of the Brussels Powers. This will be guaranteed by inspection and controls which will be organized to operate in the areas covered by the Brussels Treaty, and presumably under the supervision of the Western Union Council, which would, of course, include Germany and Italy. Mr. Mendes-France is however reported in the New York Times as having said in Strasbourg that these maximum figures "may be the same figures as used by NATO, or different figures". Could it be more, or less? France would have a veto in NATO on what minimum NATO requirements for Germany would be. Would France be prepared to encourage Germany with the expectation that she would get some forces uncommitted to NATO, or would the Brussels Council set its sights lower than minimum NATO requirements?

(3) The French divide armaments into two categories for purposes of control. The first category includes atomic, chemical and biological weapons, missiles and unconventional mines, large naval vessels and submarines, and military aircraft. The second category comprises conventional weapons, excluding those already mentioned.

(a) The manufacture of weapons in the first category is to be prohibited in exposed strategic zones. The French have outlined these zones on a military map. Presumably the French consider that the zones have been drawn up so that there is no discrimination against Germany, and that the areas can be justified purely on military grounds. The Council of Ministers of the seven powers must have full authority to ensure that this provision of the Treaty is not violated.

(b) The manufacture of weapons in the second category will be subject to the discretion and control of the "Council of the Seven". The Council would have authority to apportion armaments between the member states and to receive United States weapons and divide them between the national forces. No continental country which is a signatory to the Treaty would be able to make any armaments without the authorization of the Council. The Council of the Seven, moreover, would be able to authorize armaments for export, and for other signatories of the Treaty, other than the member states.

(c) The French system of armaments control in terms of weapons in the second category would also be utilized for the rationalization of armaments between the member countries.

(4) At the present time the Consultative Council of the Western Union reaches its decisions unanimously. The French wish to have this changed so that decisions may be taken by simple majority, a weighted majority or unanimously. This procedure would give greater flexibility to the Council, would prevent Germany from vetoing consideration of its rearmament policies and programmes and could be utilized to protect the interests of France.

UNITED KINGDOM PROPOSALS

The United Kingdom proposals advanced by Mr. Eden during his tour of the European capitals are designed to meet two urgent requirements. The first and most important from the United Kingdom point of view is that Germany should be incorporated into the association of the Western democracies. The second is that Germany should participate in the defence programme which those countries are carrying out through NATO. The United Kingdom solution envisages the expansion and modification of the Brussels Treaty to include Germany and Italy and the admission of Germany to NATO together with adequate safeguards. In the United Kingdom view these two developments should take place simultaneously.

The Brussels Treaty

2. The United Kingdom apparently considers that an enlarged Brussels Treaty organization is not only an ingenious way of linking Germany politically with the West and of reviving the European concept inherent in the EDC, but a means for the exchange of political views and more comprehensive engagements than are possible within the broader and looser NATO structure. The admission of Germany to NATO would be a parallel development, but mainly for the purpose of obtaining a controlled German defence contribution.

3. The Brussels Treaty establishing the Western Union (France, Belgium, Luxembourg, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom) was signed on March 17, 1948 and has a duration of 50 years. It was evolved as a rather hurried measure to emphasize the unity of the Western European wartime allies and was couched in terms which emphasized the danger from Germany. In general terms the coalition of countries comprising the Union was formed for the following reasons:

(a) collective self-defence in the event that any member is the victim of armed aggression in Europe;

(b) to strengthen the economic, social and cultural ties between the members; and

(c) to provide for the settlement of disputes between members by peaceful methods involving either conciliation or litigation before the International Court of Justice.

4. The Treaty has functioned through a Consultative Council comprising the Foreign Ministers of the five powers and a Permanent Commission which acts on behalf of the Council between sessions, as well as several subordinate committees, boards and sub-committees of ministers or experts.

5. Many aspects of the Treaty have been superseded by the provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty, with the result that NATO has taken over the military functions of the Union. Its economic functions are now handled by OEEC. In the circumstances, the activities of the Union have been confined to cultural and social matters and agreements relating to these subjects have been signed by the member states. Politically and militarily therefore it has been almost a dead letter in past years, although it is the basis on which the Benelux countries are consulted on, or apprized in advance of certain decisions in regard to Germany.

6. To provide for the admission of Germany and Italy to the Brussels Treaty, the United Kingdom has suggested the delegation of those portions of the agreement which would be offensive to and discriminatory against the Federal Republic. (Although we have not received detailed information on this point, we envisage deletion of parts of the Preamble and Article 7 — see Annex A).

7. It is clear that the Treaty does not contain any safeguards which would be sufficiently binding to allay French fears about German rearmament. The United Kingdom would prefer to have any such safeguards included within the NATO framework, but appears to recognize that there may be a limit to which some NATO members, particularly the United States, would be willing to commit themselves in relation to the control and supervision exercised by NATO. In the circumstances Mr. Eden, in his conversation with Chancellor Adenauer, indicated that it might be possible for the Brussels Treaty members, including Italy and Germany, to agree among themselves to go farther in their commitments to NATO than the other NATO powers. Although we have no firm indications of the United Kingdom plan in this respect, apparently they are thinking in terms of listing in an annex to the Brussels Treaty a list of the forces which each of the signatories would assign to SACEUR, but without stating that these forces should not be exceeded.

8. Another suggestion which the United Kingdom appears to be considering is that two zones should be defined in the Brussels Treaty. The first would be the forward zone and the other the zone of lines of communications. All forces in the forward zone (which would include Germany) would be assigned to SACEUR.

9. The United Kingdom also intends to tighten up the Brussels Treaty organization and in particular to give special authority to its committee of Defence Ministers. It is not clear at this point how the United Kingdom plans to do this.

German Admission to NATO

10. The United Kingdom is anxious to bring about German membership in NATO on a basis of equality with the other members and to develop to the fullest possible extent existing NATO machinery as a means of controlling German rearmament and the deployment of German forces on a non-discriminatory basis. In effect, although the United Kingdom is prepared to admit that some safeguards might more conveniently be worked out within the Brussels Treaty framework, they stress that there should be no duplication or overlapping between the Organization and NATO and that the concentration of all military arrangements should be within NATO.

11. On the assumption that the initial size and character of the German defence contribution would be that envisaged under the EDC, the main features of the United Kingdom proposals are:

- (1) Any change in the German contribution would be negotiated within NATO.
- (2) The Annual Review procedure might be tightened up. At the present time firm commitments for forces are laid down for one year ahead and less firm commitments for the following two years.
- (3) All countries contributing forces to SACEUR should place them at his complete disposal with respect to location and movement.
- (4) SACEUR's control over the troops and matériel at his command would be made more effective.
- (5) German forces might be integrated within NATO along the lines of the procedure already adopted in the Northern Army Group and the Second Tactical Air Force. The United Kingdom did not consider that it will be possible to go any farther than the integration already achieved along these lines.
- (6) Arrangements could be made similar to those under Article 10 of the EDC Treaty to make it clear that in addition to the forces already committed to NATO, NATO members could only have forces required for non-NATO responsibilities, e.g., overseas commitments.
- (7) Some arrangements will have to be made to deal with armaments production. The United Kingdom consider it doubtful whether it would be possible to have an armaments pool such as the one envisaged under EDC since the political control and supranational institutions under EDC have been rejected. However, the United Kingdom would welcome any action which the six EDC governments might be able to take along these lines. The United Kingdom lays stress on the importance of maintaining the EDC conception of avoiding manufacture of certain key weapons in exposed areas such as West Germany. The list of armaments outlined in the annex to Article 107 of the EDC Treaty might serve as a guide in this connection.

(8) The life of the North Atlantic Treaty might be prolonged to fifty years and declarations concerning security and the eastern frontier of Germany might be made by the German Government and the NATO governments along the lines agreed by the United Kingdom, the United States and France with Chancellor Adenauer in December, 1953.

COMPARISON OF UNITED KINGDOM AND FRENCH PROPOSALS ON GERMAN REARMAMENT

The essential difference between the United Kingdom and French proposals on German rearmament at the present time is that the French plan makes no mention of German admission to NATO and provides for safeguards against uncontrolled German rearmament within the Brussels Treaty, whereas the United Kingdom plan is based on the assumption that Germany will be admitted to NATO and that the essential safeguards will be included in its framework. The French plan would entrust the supervision of German rearmament to the Council of Ministers of the Western Union (Brussels Treaty Organization). However, the administration of the supervisory function would be entrusted to NATO, on the basis of limits set by the NATO Council acting on the advice of SACEUR: there is no elaboration of how SACEUR is to act as the agent of the Brussels Treaty Council for this purpose; no German armaments or troop formations are to be permitted except for service in NATO: this appears to indicate that the French would expect that the Germans would dispense with a General Staff, which the British apparently have made no provision to prevent their setting up.

2. The United Kingdom, however, appears to recognize that there may be a limit to the extent to which some NATO members, particularly the United States, would be willing to commit themselves in relation to the control and supervision exercised by NATO. In the circumstances it appears the United Kingdom would be agreeable to the incorporation of such commitments within the Brussels Treaty framework.

3. A distinguishing aspect of the French plan is that the United Kingdom must maintain a fixed minimum level of forces on the Continent of Europe. Although Mr. Eden, during his discussions in the European capitals, hinted that the United Kingdom might be prepared to accept such an obligation, no firm proposals appear to have been made. (The United Kingdom paper on restrictions on German rearmament within NATO indicates that the United Kingdom would be prepared to declare their intention to keep their "fair share" of forces on the Continent as long as the threat exists).

4. On the question of producing certain types of weapons the French proposals go much farther than those of the United Kingdom in that they not only prohibit the manufacture of certain unconventional weapons but would strictly regulate the quality and quantities of conventional weapons manufactured in strategic areas on the Continent of Europe. The French, unlike the United Kingdom, also envisage the control by the Western Union Council of the import and export of weapons on the Continent, and the rationalization of armaments in the member countries.

5. Our general impression is that the United Kingdom proposals are more flexible than the French suggestions and consequently permit more room for manoeuvre at the London meeting. In addition the French plan is obviously more clearly discriminatory against Germany in the sense that it makes specific provision for action in the event of a German breach of its obligations under the Treaty. Further views on the comparison of the two plans, particularly in their relation to NATO, appear in Annex (F).

GERMAN REARMAMENT — MOTIVES BEHIND RECENT MOVES

The motives and aims of the United Kingdom, United States and France in their recent moves towards solving the problem of German re-armament are not in every case entirely clear. This paper attempts to examine what evidence we have on this subject.

A. United Kingdom

The United Kingdom proposal to revive the Brussels Treaty, expanding it to include Germany and Italy, and at the same time to admit Germany to NATO with adequate safeguards is clearly intended: (a) to produce a quick solution of the dilemma acceptable to France; (b) to save some measure of real Western European unity; and (c) to restore to Germany sovereignty and rearm it in the relatively safe context of NATO.

Mr. Wilgress has also suggested that the United Kingdom is attempting to regain the leadership of Western Europe which was almost in default after the French refusal to ratify EDC and the United States failure to produce any alternative. He explains in these terms Mr. Eden's European tour, the United Kingdom offer to give at least some semblance of support to the European idea, and the role which the United Kingdom apparently envisaged for NATO.

B. United States

Mr. Wilgress also explains Mr. Dulles' trip to Bonn as, at least in part, an attempt to restore United States initiative and to prevent the leadership of Western Europe passing to the United Kingdom. Certainly the report from Mr. Ritchie of the Secretary of State's conversations with Herr Adenauer tend to confirm that Mr.

Dulles was in part aiming at undoing Mr. Eden's work and to cast cold water both on the Brussels Treaty idea and the nine-power conference.

Other aims may have been to proffer a deliberate snub to the French in order by shock treatment to effect a re-assessment in Paris of the situation caused by the French refusal to face up to the result of their rejection of EDC. Mr. Dulles may have thought that his flight to Bonn and his wooing of the Germans would have such a frightening effect on the French that they would be forced to come into line. The facts that Mr. Dulles will press for an agreement in principle regarding German admission to NATO and has encouraged the Germans to reject any complicated plan for limitations on rearmament proposed by the French suggest that the United States is not averse to isolating the French. It is difficult to imagine what other aim Mr. Dulles could have had since he could hardly have decided on the visit to Bonn and London simply for the pleasure of administering to Mendes-France an expression of his disapproval, unless, of course, he is concerned about the need for dramatic action in an election year when the Senate has already registered its unanimous approval of granting Germany its sovereignty and bringing about an early defence contribution from Germany. It is also conceivable that he has in mind tactics which are intended to bring down the Mendes-France government although this would be difficult with the Assembly adjourned.

It is difficult to see what he had in mind in stressing in Bonn the idea of European integration with supranational institutions and at the same time rejecting the idea of a revived Brussels Treaty. So far as we know he proposed no substitute for EDC, and he must be aware that its revival is almost impossible. In the circumstances if he wished to stress European integration, it would surely have been wiser to take the Brussels Treaty as a tangible starting point. At any rate it is interesting to note that the Germans are not so convinced as Mr. Dulles is that it is either possible or wise to attempt to isolate France in trying to work out a method of rehabilitating Germany.

C. Germany

According to reports we have received the Chancellor was generally sympathetic to the ideas advanced by Mr. Eden during his recent visit to Bonn, but the Chancellor was careful not to commit himself to the British proposals. On the other hand he appears to have been much more forthcoming in his reaction to the proposals submitted to him by Mr. Dulles some of which ran contrary to the British suggestions. It seems clear that the Germans are aware of their powerful position at the moment and, as Mr. Ritchie has pointed out, Mr. Dulles's démarche gave them a dangerously exaggerated idea of their own importance.

The German Government for reasons of self-esteem appears to be motivated by a strong desire to obtain the best possible deal from the German point of view. At the same time the Chancellor must recognize that there is no strong feeling in favour of rearmament in Germany and that the German people might not go along with any solution which is unacceptable to the French, even though the Chancellor himself may be suspicious of the motives of the French Premier. It is our impression that the Germans above all at the moment wish to have full sovereignty as soon as possible and welcome the idea of membership in NATO more as a sign of respectability than as a means of protecting themselves and Western Europe against Soviet aggression. Chancellor Adenauer himself appears to be primarily concerned about the need to revive the European idea inherent in the EDC. In addition, in the background as an ever-present motivating force, is the strong urge for reunification.

Viewed in this light we may expect the Germans to continue to press strongly for an early return of sovereignty and a termination of the occupation and full membership in NATO. It is conceivable that, if the Americans moderate their strongly pro-German bent, Chancellor Adenauer might be prepared to go along with the French proposals provided they are not too obviously discriminatory against Germany and provided no unreasonable conditions are attached by the French to German admission to NATO. The Chancellor, despite his remarks to Dulles to the contrary, may see in the French proposals at least the shadow of the European idea inherent in the EDC. At the same time he may view them as less provocative to the USSR and as a more flexible arrangement than simple admission to NATO which might facilitate at some time any moves towards reunification of Germany.

D. France

Since the rejection of EDC by the French Assembly, the clearest statement of the foreign policy of Mendes-France is that which he made off the record to the Anglo-American Press Association on September 7, 1954. This statement, which was reported in Paris Telegram 417 of September 16, a copy of which is attached,[†] may be summarized as follows:

(a) The fundamental idea of the Treaty of Paris was the establishment of a close bond between Germany and the West. This must not be forgotten in the search for some other procedure;

(b) Germany cannot be neutralized for if it were it would some day throw itself in with the East in exchange for unity;

(c) The concept of supranationalism is unacceptable to France and must be abandoned;

(d) Franco-German reconciliation is essential but it is not possible unless the United Kingdom is closely associated with its manifestations;

(e) A German military contribution is necessary to Western defence; this contribution must be made within the framework of a system of control and guarantees established on the basis of non-discrimination;

(f) France cannot play its proper role internationally without the implementation of the necessary economic and social reforms.

5. These principles clearly mark the abandonment of European integration as the goal of French policy. Taken together with the proposals to be submitted by France to the nine-power conference, they indicate that France has given up the post-war hope of controlling Germany by itself in an essentially military "little Europe". Instead, what France now seeks is a scheme whereby the danger that Germany might constitute a threat to either the western European countries or to the Soviet Union will be removed. This aim, in the French view, can be achieved by:

(a) placing wide controls on German re-armament, German participation in western defence planning, and German territorial ambitions; and

(b) bringing about the association of the United Kingdom with the task of controlling Germany on the continent.

Present French thinking is, therefore, not in line with the United States desire to strengthen its European front against the Soviet Union by the inclusion of a re-armed Germany in NATO. It is also opposed to the granting of sovereignty to Germany without adequate guarantees against unrestricted re-armament.

If the United States refuses to consider the French proposals at the nine-power conference, it would add a further rebuff to the series which it has administered to Mendes-France since the Indo-Chinese settlement. Another United States rebuff may not harm the political standing of Mendes-France with the Assembly and may possibly improve it. A result of such a course of action by the United States, however, would be that Mendes-France would have an excuse for following the course of action which his enemies claim he intends to follow: that is, to destroy NATO and come to terms with the USSR. It must be admitted that United States policy has at times in recent months seemed deliberately formulated to assist such a process. While this seems unthinkable as a possible French policy, some recent actions of Mendes-France cannot permit us completely to overlook it.

On the optimistic side, if the United States relents and if an agreement is reached at London which Mendes-France endorses, the chances of its approval by the National Assembly would appear to be good. The recent vote against the EDC was 319 (including 99 Communists) to 264. While some of those who supported EDC will perhaps vote against an alternative plan, a good number of the opponents of EDC, and notably the 73 Gaullists, would vote for the Brussels Treaty alternative because of the removal of the supranational aspects of the EDC Treaty.

A PLAN FOR ARMAMENT CONTROL WITHIN NATO

The failure of the French Assembly to approve EDC has now confronted the Western Allies with the same difficult problems (though in a more highly charged atmosphere) to which the Paris Treaty appeared to provide the answer. These problems — West German sovereignty and a controlled German contribution to Western defence — must be solved together if we assume, as we must, that French co-operation in the formulation of Western policy with respect to Germany is essential to the unity of the North Atlantic Alliance. Of the two problems, the most difficult is that of German rearmament. When that is solved the problem of German sovereignty should prove relatively easy, since it is not German sovereignty itself but one of the important attributes of sovereignty (i.e. the right to national armed forces) which, in French eyes, raises the spectre of German militarism.

2. Our approach to a solution of these problem is based on the following assumptions:

(a) As agreed at the Brussels Meeting of the North Atlantic Council in 1950, a German defence contribution is essential to the defence of Western Europe;

(b) This contribution must be obtained in such a way that legitimate German aspirations are met while, at the same time, the members of NATO, and particularly France, are assured of adequate safeguards against misuse of German military power;

(c) To do this inevitably involves tackling the underlying problem of Franco-German relations, which in many respects is fundamentally one of an increasing unbalance of power between the two countries;

(d) With the failure of the EDC, NATO seems to provide the most practical framework within which the harmful effects of this unbalance could be counteracted by bringing in the United Kingdom and the United States to offset German military and economic strength.

(e) If NATO is used for this purpose, German admission must be brought about in such a way as to preserve the unity of NATO and to ensure (as far as it is possible) the permanent integration of Germany within the Atlantic Community.

3. These considerations have led us to the conclusion that the solution to the twin problems of German sovereignty and a German defence contribution which offers the best prospect of permanency is one involving the admission of a sovereign Germany to NATO after there has been instituted in NATO as a whole a system of armament control adequate to safeguard against a resurgence of German militarism. Any restrictions on German sovereignty retained as a condition of Germany's admission to NATO are unlikely to last for long and the strains among member countries which their removal would create might disintegrate the Alliance. Whatever controls on German rearmament we consider essential should be so established that they appear non-discriminatory, or as nearly so as possible.

The Plan

4. In the light of the foregoing it should be borne in mind that the basic idea behind the plan is that a system of armaments control should be instituted in NATO applicable to all members, although not necessarily to the entire area or to all forces. This does not mean disarmament. The plan is not designed to limit armament but to control it. A system along the lines we propose could work in both directions (either to limit or to maintain existing levels) according to individual circumstances. The main features of the plan are as follows:

(a) The forms of armaments supervision which already exist in NATO (the Annual Review, the activities of the Standing Group agencies and of the NATO Secretariat in the fields of standardization of arms and correlation of defence production, and the training and inspection responsibilities of the Supreme Commanders) should be strengthened.

(b) A system of inspection should be set up within NATO under the authority of the North Atlantic Council. This would mean shifting the emphasis from the present voluntary system of furnishing information, in which discretion is left to member governments in the last analysis, to one in which member governments would surrender a large part of this discretion to NATO. Under this system member governments would be required to allow supervision by a NATO inspection body of armed forces and armaments actually assigned to NATO. There seems no reason why, if member governments are agreeable to the introduction of such a concept (derived from the U.S. disarmament plan for the U.N.) into NATO, the Secretary-General and the Secretariat of NATO could not fulfil the functions of the Director-General and the Secretariat of the proposed U.N. Authority's Disarmament Division. Although NATO has nothing resembling the Corps of Inspectors which the United States proposal envisages, it is possible that provision could be made for the appointment of such a Corps by the Secretary-General on the nomination of member countries.

(c) To allow for flexibility, the arrangements for controlling armaments might be established in progressive stages, and/or variations in the scope of the plan might be introduced. A study of the possible variants leads us to the conclusion that our plan should provide for either:

- (i) inspection and control of armed forces and armaments actually assigned to NATO Commanders, or
- (ii) inspection and control of armed forces and conventional armaments only in all NATO countries.

The first, in our view, appears to be by far the best, in that it might be acceptable to the United States and the United Kingdom, it would be non-discriminatory, and it would meet our requirements for a reasonably permanent solution. If, combined with a solemn undertaking by Germany that she would devote the whole of her defence effort to NATO, this would ensure that all German armed forces and armaments would be subject to NATO supervision while leaving the most sensitive areas of United States and United Kingdom armament (the strategic air forces and strategic reserves) and certain French forces outside of its scope. The second variant would be less satisfactory in that it would leave beyond NATO control German atomic development for military purposes (unless, of course, Germany renounces its right to produce atomic energy). This may not be a problem at present or for the immediate future but it is almost certain to become an important factor in a matter of years. Moreover, an undertaking not to enter the atomic energy field is likely before long to be regarded by the Germans as a far more humiliating limitation on their sovereignty than an undertaking to assign all their forces and armaments to NATO.

(d) Coupled with the plan would be twin undertakings by the West German Government to:

- (i) Devote the whole of the West German defence effort to NATO. An alternative might be agreement by all NATO members including Germany that, apart from forces placed under SACEUR, no armed forces will be maintained except national police forces, troops for the protection of the Head of State, forces for international missions (e.g., U.N.) or forces which any NATO member requires to fulfil its defence responsibilities outside NATO.

(ii) Renounce force as a means of reuniting Germany or of recovering the lost German territories. (It is for consideration whether this should be a separate undertaking by West Germany or whether it might not be an undertaking, by NATO as a whole, as a means of underlining the essentially defensive character of the NATO alliance after the admission of Germany. In addition, it is conceivable that such a general undertaking by NATO could be some assurance against any tendency on the part of the United States to revive the idea of "liberating" the Soviet-occupied territories in Eastern Europe.)

ANALYSIS OF THE IMPLICATIONS FOR NATO OF THE FRENCH PROPOSALS

It seems clear that the French Government has seized on the idea of an expanded Brussels Treaty Organization as providing a substitute for the E.D.C. which would not have the supranational characteristics of the latter and which would have the advantage of closer United Kingdom participation. The French may also think that it would be less provocative to the Soviet Union than a solution involving only the admission of a rearmed Germany to NATO. In addition, the obvious omission of the French reference to German membership in NATO suggests that the French would prefer to avoid this difficult topic for the time being or would try to use the Brussels Treaty concept to make the pill more palatable to the French Assembly if the other Western countries insist on a German admission to NATO. At the moment the French appear to be veering around toward accepting the idea of German membership in NATO although (according to one comment we have received) they may envisage it as the final stage in a evolutionary process. In the circumstances it is assumed for the purposes of this memorandum that the French will not, in the final analysis, object to Germany being admitted to NATO.

Viewed in this light, it is for consideration whether the French proposals would diminish or alter the present authority and responsibility of NATO. The answer would appear to depend in part on the relationship in practice which the French envisage between NATO and the enlarged Brussels Treaty Organization, and in part on the extent to which the non-Brussels Treaty Organization powers would be prepared to strengthen NATO's functions.

On the first point, the French memorandum leaves many questions unanswered, particularly with regard to the authority and scope of NATO. There is some evidence, however, to suggest that the French Government may view their version of the Brussels Treaty Organization as little more than a facade which will have a useful psychological effect in France. The French Premier has admitted to Mr. Eden that for this reason he would like to have as many safeguards as possible against German rearmament added to the Brussels Treaty. It is true that under the French proposals the Brussels Treaty Organization would be responsible for the security of Western Europe and for the supervision and control of the German defence contribution. On the other hand, NATO would still be responsible for setting the levels of forces to be contributed by the member countries (which would serve as the maximum levels of the Brussels Treaty powers) and NATO machinery would be used as far as possible to inspect and control these levels.

On the second point, there are many unknown factors and the attitude of the United States is likely to be decisive. It is obvious that the admission to NATO of an important country like Germany would tend to change the present balance in the Organization. This tendency might be accentuated under the French proposals unless the non-Brussels Treaty powers were prepared at the same time to tighten up both the military and political cooperation within NATO. If they were to let NATO procedures remain precisely as they are and to leave all questions concerning Germany to the Brussels Treaty Organization, the primary emphasis would almost certainly shift from trans-Atlantic cooperation to European cooperation. There are already disquieting signs that Mr. Dulles would regard such a development with favour and that he is thinking in terms of German leadership in Europe. If the primary responsibility for German association with the West were given to the Brussels Treaty Organization, the United States might feel free to leave Western Europe to its own devices and to use NATO only as a vehicle for loose military cooperation with Western Europe.

Mr. Wilgress has already expressed concern that the United Kingdom idea of employing the Brussels Treaty Organization as a means of obtaining closer German political cooperation, while using NATO primarily to deal with the military aspects, might tend to reduce the role of NATO to that of a "military club". He now thinks that both the United Kingdom and the French proposals are designed to prevent Germany having an opportunity to join forces with the United States in order to control developments in Europe.

At present the Brussels Treaty Organization is most active in the fields of social and cultural cooperation. It also has machinery to facilitate the exchange of political views at various levels. But the emphasis in this field is on informality and flexibility. To this machinery would presumably be added, under the French proposals, certain agreements concerning the levels of forces of member countries and procedures for dealing with problems arising out of the implementation of these agreements. The important task of administering the inspection and controls would be NATO's. There is nothing in the French proposals as they stand to necessitate building up within the Brussels Treaty Organization functions that would compete with those of NATO. Nor do they suggest that NATO's present responsibilities would be reduced in any way. It is therefore quite possible that the French plan, or a compromise between the French and the United Kingdom plans, could be implemented without affecting NATO's functions as the prime organ of Atlantic cooperation. At the same time, great care would have to be taken to avoid the dangerous tendency noted above, and to guard against a shift of emphasis from NATO to the Brussels Treaty Organization.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS; LONDON NINE-POWER CONFERENCE ON GERMANY;
CANADIAN RESOLUTION ON DISARMAMENT AT UNITED NATIONS;
REPORT CONCERNING GENEVA CONFERENCE ON KOREA

17. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that, as a result of the Nine-Power Conference on Germany held in London between September 28th and October 3rd, the Canadian government would be called upon to reach decisions on several important matters. These questions could be dealt with in detail at the next meeting of Cabinet.

The nine countries participating in the London Conference had been the United Kingdom, the United States, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the three Benelux countries, Italy and Canada. The Canadian objectives had been,

(a) that NATO should be maintained and strengthened as the chief organ of Western collective defence and that the new Brussels Treaty Organization should be tied as closely as possible to NATO;

(b) that the Atlantic Community should remain the framework for co-operation in the non-military fields and that progress toward closer European unity should be made within this larger framework;

(c) that the interests of the other NATO countries not represented at the Conference should not be overlooked, and that adequate provision should be made for consideration by NATO of the conclusions of the Conference; and,

(d) that every effort should be made to find a solution acceptable to the countries most directly concerned (i.e. the former E.D.C. countries), provided it met the foregoing points.

In many ways the Conference had been difficult, not only because strong personalities with conflicting views had participated but also because some very important problems had been settled in the short period of five days. The Conference had nearly broken down on a few occasions over such matters as the re-arming of Germany and what some participants considered unreasonable obstinacy on the part of Mr. Mendes-France with regard to relatively unimportant matters. He felt perhaps, this was too harsh a judgement. In order to obtain the support of the French Assembly, which had subsequently been forthcoming, Mr. Mendes-France perhaps believed he had to adopt a more rigid attitude towards the other participants in the Conference, and particularly towards Germany, than might otherwise have been necessary.

Eventually, however, the more important problems had been solved. Of all the concessions made France's was perhaps the greatest in finally agreeing to the acceptance of West Germany as a full member of NATO. Chancellor Adenauer had also made a substantial concession in agreeing that West Germany would not manufacture atomic, chemical or biological armaments. Another major concession, and an important departure from traditional British policy, was the U.K.'s decision to maintain troops on the Continent of Europe for the life of the Brussels Treaty. Mr. Eden had been an excellent chairman and had conducted the meetings with remarkable skill. It was understood that he had experienced considerable difficulty in convincing some members of the U.K. government including the Prime Minister, to agree to the decision on maintenance of troops. Once the decision had been taken, however, Mr. Churchill had been most helpful in bringing about a meeting of minds between participants in the Conference, particularly between Mr. Mendes-France and Chancellor Adenauer. The decision, apparently, had been well received by the British public. The only dissenting voice had been the Beaverbrook controlled press.

The decisions of the London Conference were contained in the Final Act signed by the nine Foreign Ministers on October 3rd.⁶³ This Act was divided into six main parts:

Part I recorded the decision of the U.S. the U.K. and France to end the occupation régime in the German Federal Republic as soon as possible, to revoke the Occupation Statute and to abolish the Allied High Commission, retaining their special powers only with respect to those obligations under the Potsdam Agreement which they could not relinquish prior to a final German peace treaty.

Part II outlined the arrangements to allow Germany and Italy to accede to the Brussels Treaty and to give the Brussels Treaty Organization increased powers and responsibilities in controlling the levels of forces of all its members and the armaments production of its continental members (the levels of forces were to be controlled by fixing maximum levels which could be increased only by unanimous consent; armaments production was to be controlled by a special agency set up under the authority of the Brussels Treaty Council).

Part III referred to assurances made during the Conference by the U.S. (to continue its support for European unity), by the U.K. (to maintain its present forces on the continent of Europe), and by Canada (to discharge the continuing obligations arising out of its membership in NATO and to support the objective of European unity).

Part IV recorded the decision of the Conference to recommend to NATO that the German Federal Republic be invited to become a member and that the NATO machinery be reinforced to give SACEUR greater control over the forces on the Continent under his command (including powers of inspection to check the level and effectiveness of these forces).

Part V contained a declaration by the German Federal Republic to refrain from any action inconsistent with the strictly defensive character of the North Atlantic ⁶³ Pour la documentation sur l'Acte final de la Conférence de Londres, notamment la déclaration tripartite sur l'Allemagne, voir/For documentation on the Final Act of the London Conference, including the Tripartite declaration on Germany, see United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXI, No. 798, October 11, 1954, pp. 515-28.

Treaty and the Brussels Treaty and a joint declaration in reply by the U.S. the U.K. and France with which the three powers intend to invite the association of the other NATO countries.

Part VI outlined the procedure to obtain approval for and to implement these decisions.

The procedure called for a meeting of the four Foreign Ministers, on the question of German sovereignty followed by a meeting of the nine Foreign Ministers, which would take place in Paris the following Thursday. The decisions of the London Conference would then be submitted to a special meeting of the NATO Council on Friday, October 22nd. If approved, the protocol of accession of Germany to NATO and the other relevant documents would be submitted to the governments of the NATO and Brussels Treaty countries for ratification. Insofar as Canada was concerned, all the required measures could probably be taken by governmental action except the protocol of accession of Germany to NATO, which should perhaps be submitted to Parliament for approval prior to ratification.

Although it would be difficult, presumably, for Canadian ratification to be given much before the end of January, 1955, there seemed to be a general desire to obtain the required ratifications from all countries before the end of the year, so as to avoid any internal political difficulties that Mr. Mendes-France might have to face if final disposition of the matter were delayed unduly. Early disposition would also be helpful to Chancellor Adenauer, who had to face a hostile and increasingly powerful socialist party in West Germany.

18. Mr. Pearson also referred to the statement made by Mr. Vyshinsky at the United Nations on September 30th, when introducing a Soviet resolution on disarmament. This resolution was, in reality, a belated response to the Anglo-French resolution on disarmament, which had been made during the course of meetings of the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission of the United Nations the previous summer. Although, superficially, the Soviet resolution appeared to go a long way towards meeting the views of Western members of the U.N. on disarmament, it would be examined critically to ascertain whether in fact it provided a practical framework for international disarmament. He added that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was introducing that day a Canadian resolution on disarmament.⁶⁴ This was being presented by the Canadian delegation as a member of the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission because, for a variety of reasons, it had not been possible to obtain, as had been hoped earlier, a joint resolution by four of the five members of the Sub-Committee (U.K., U.S., U.S.S.R., France and Canada). When submitting the resolution, however, Mr. Martin would invite other members of the Sub-Committee to associate themselves with the resolution and it was understood that the U.K., the U.S. and France would then do so.

The Minister said further, that the fifteen countries which had participated in the United Nations police action in Korea were now attempting to draft an agreed report on the Geneva Conference. Some difficulty had been caused, however, by the U.S. supported South Korean contention that the report should refer to communist aggression and not simply to aggression. The U.S. and South Korea also held the view that elections in Korea should be supervised by the United Nations. It was clear that this might not be acceptable to the Chinese, since they were not U.N. members. In the circumstances, other countries engaged in the preparation of this report were generally prepared to agree that the Korean elections be supervised by any impartial international body that was acceptable to the United Nations. It was hoped that the U.S. would eventually come around to this view.

19. The Cabinet noted with approval the reports by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the London Nine-Power Conference on Germany, the Canadian resolution on disarmament recently introduced at the General Assembly of the United Nations and the preparation of an agreed report concerning the Geneva Conference on Korea, and deferred final decision on various matters arising out of the London Conference, on Germany pending further consideration at a meeting to be held the following Tuesday, October 19th.

NATO AND GERMANY

At the Nine-Power Conference held in London from September 27 to October 3, agreement was reached on principles to govern the association of the German Federal Republic with the West and on measures designed to obtain a German defence contribution with necessary safeguards. Although the decisions reached at London do not commit all the participating countries to the same extent, they are nevertheless of interest to all the NATO members. All these decisions form part of a single settlement which represents a delicate international compromise which could easily be upset by any undue insistence on purely national interests by any participant, including Canada.

2. The Final Act signed at London envisages three interrelated measures: termination of the occupation régime and restoration of full sovereignty to the German Federal Republic; admission of the Federal Republic and Italy to the Brussels Treaty Organization; and admission of the Federal Republic to NATO. At the same time, the machinery and functions of both NATO and the Brussels Treaty Organization are to be reinforced in order to provide adequate safeguards against any misuse of German rearmament. The Brussels Treaty Powers will set by special agreement the maximum levels for their forces on the Continent. However, NATO will continue to determine year by year the force goals of all its members, and the ceilings set by the Brussels Treaty Organization will not be reviewed or altered unless the force goals recommended by NATO for any particular year conflict with them.

3. To NATO will be given the function of inspecting the levels and effectiveness of the forces under the Supreme Commander on the Continent and authority to ensure that these forces are not used except with the approval of the appropriate NATO authorities.

4. To the Brussels Treaty Organization will be given the function of controlling the levels of armaments to be produced by its members on the Continent, these levels to be based on the requirements of the forces approved by NATO.

5. An additional safeguard is contained in declarations by the German Federal Republic and by the Three Powers, designed to ensure that the Federal Republic never has recourse to force to achieve the re-unification of Germany or the modification of present boundaries.

6. Since the end of the London Conference, working groups in Paris have prepared certain documents to give effect to the various parts of the Final Act. These documents will be submitted, first to a meeting of the nine Foreign Ministers in Paris on October 21, and then to a Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Council on October 22, both of which I shall attend. The following three of these documents are of direct concern to Canada and decisions are required on them:

(i) a resolution whereby members of NATO other than the United Kingdom, the United States and France will associate themselves with the Three-Power declaration on Germany and Berlin;

(ii) a protocol to provide for the accession of the Federal German Republic to the North Atlantic Treaty;

(iii) a resolution on the reinforcement of the NATO military machinery (including the amendment to SACEUR's terms of reference).

1. Association with Three-Power Declaration on Germany

7. Canada and other NATO countries have been invited to associate themselves with the Joint Declaration of the United States, France and the United Kingdom which in essence acknowledges the solemn pledges of the Federal Republic, never to have recourse to force to achieve the reunification of Germany or the modification of the present boundaries of the Federal Republic; reaffirms the resolve of the Three Powers to discharge the obligations contained in Article 2 of the United Nations Charter; and underlines their agreed existing policy with respect to a final German settlement, the reunification of Germany, and Berlin. The text of this declaration, and of the accompanying one by the Federal Republic, is attached as Annex "A". In addition, by way of a warning to the Federal Republic, the Three Powers agree to regard as a threat to their own peace and safety any recourse to force in violation of the principles of the United Nations Charter and pledge themselves to take appropriate action against the offending Government.

8. The association of other NATO members with the Declaration, in the form of a simple resolution of the Council (draft on which is attached as Annex "B"), to be released as a communiqué, is designed to enhance and widen the importance of the Declaration and to establish a close link in the public mind (particularly in France) between the admission of Germany to NATO and the attitude of the Three Powers towards any act in violation of the peaceful and defensive purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty. It is not intended that the act of association should modify in any way the obligations and commitments of the associating countries which exist by virtue of their membership in NATO. Nor is it intended to involve any derogation or alteration of the special rights and obligations of the Three Powers with respect to such matters as an all-German settlement and the security and welfare of Berlin resulting from the Potsdam Agreement of 1945.

9. The principles enunciated in the Joint Declaration are in my view in accord with existing Canadian policy as expounded in the North Atlantic Council and other international forums. The association of Canada with this Declaration would have a good effect on public opinion both at home and abroad and would not involve any modification in the commitments or obligations which already exist by virtue of our membership in the North Atlantic Treaty.

10. In the light of the above considerations it is recommended that:

(a) approval be given to the association of Canada with the Joint Declaration as contained in the Final Act of the Conference;

(b) in associating ourselves with the Declaration the Canadian representative at the Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Council should reaffirm our view, either individually or jointly with other representatives, that association with the Joint Declaration would neither involve any alteration in existing commitments or obligations under NATO, nor entail any derogation or modification of the rights and obligations of the Three Powers under the Potsdam Agreement.

II. Protocol on the Accession of the German Federal Republic to the North Atlantic Treaty

11. The draft protocol is attached to this memorandum as Annex "C". The substance paragraphs of the protocol employ the same language as was used in the protocol of 1951 on the accession of Greece and Turkey. The effect, when all the members of NATO have ratified it, will be to authorize the issuance of an invitation to the Federal Republic of Germany to accede to the North Atlantic Treaty.

12. It is assumed that, early in the forthcoming session of Parliament, both Houses will be given an opportunity to approve the protocol, by resolutions, prior to the deposit of an instrument of ratification by Canada. However, in the unlikely event that all the other members of NATO ratify the protocol before January and that Canada is holding up the accession of Germany to NATO, it may be necessary for Cabinet to reconsider the question of prior Parliamentary approval. This however need not be decided at the moment.

13. it is recommended that authority be granted for the signature of the protocol on behalf of Canada by me, or by the Permanent Representative of Canada to the North Atlantic Council (Mr. L.D. Wilgress), or by both of us, and that an appropriate Order in Council is issued forthwith.

III. Resolution on the Reinforcement of the NATO Military Machinery

14. Part IV of the Final Act of London contained recommendations on the measures that were considered desirable, in connection with the admission of the German Federal Republic to NATO, to enable the Organization to retain effective control over the forces placed under the Supreme Allied Commander on the Continent of Europe. The text of the relevant excerpt from the Final Act is attached as Annex "D". These recommendations have now been amplified by the NATO Working Group in Paris and are embodied in a draft resolution which will be submitted for approval to the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting. The text of this resolution is attached as Annex "E".

15. The main features of the plan now recommended, which if approved will necessitate the amendment of SACEUR's terms of reference, are the following:

(i) Acceptance by any Brussels Treaty Power of force goals, arising out of the NATO Annual Review, higher than the limits set by the Brussels Treaty Organization will be subject to unanimous approval by the Brussels Treaty Powers.

(ii) All forces of NATO countries in the area of Allied Command Europe will be placed under the authority of SACEUR, with the exception of forces for the defence of overseas territories and certain other forces to be specified.

(iii) The location of combat forces under SACEUR in the area of Allied Command Europe will be determined in agreement with the national authorities concerned and these forces will not be moved without the consent of the appropriate NATO authorities.

(iv) Integration at the army group and tactical air force level will be the rule, provided there are no overriding objections from the point of view of military effectiveness, and integration at lower levels will be achieved whenever military efficiency permits.

(v) SACEUR's responsibilities and powers for the logistic support of his forces will be extended to include the establishment of logistic requirements, priorities, and distribution and the co-ordination of infrastructure facilities for logistic purposes.

(vi) SACEUR will be granted increased authority to obtain, through reports and inspections, information about the forces placed under him, including reserve formations and their logistic support, within the area of his command.

(vii) SACEUR, with the approval of the NATO military authorities, will designate a high-ranking officer to transmit regularly to the Brussels Treaty Council the information relating to the forces of the Brussels Treaty Powers obtained through these reports and inspections.

(viii) The term "area of Allied Command Europe" will not include North Africa and will not alter the present status of United Kingdom and United States forces in the Mediterranean.

16. In general these measures should not cause Canada any special difficulty. All our forces in Europe are already assigned to SACEUR and are integrated at the army group and tactical air force level. The deployment of these forces has been agreed after consultation between SACEUR, ourselves and the host countries, and we would not wish to redeploy them without the consent of the appropriate NATO authorities. If there are proposals for integration at lower levels we shall have to ensure that they will not involve any alteration in the present organization of the brigade or air division. By agreeing to the present resolution, however, we do not commit ourselves in advance to accepting any particular proposals.

17. Since the logistic support of our forces in Europe is already integrated with that of either the United Kingdom or the United States, any new arrangements arising out of SACEUR's extended powers in this field will affect Canada only insofar as they affect the United Kingdom and the United States. It may be that the measures for increased integration of forces and of logistic arrangements will entail some increases in commonly financed items of expenditure such as infrastructure. If this proves to be the case, specific proposals will be submitted to the appropriate NATO bodies for consideration in the normal way. It is premature to attempt at this juncture to determine what these proposals might be and we shall of course retain the right to accept, reject or modify them when and if they come up for consideration.

18. It is recommended that authority be granted for approval of this resolution on behalf of Canada.

19. It is further recommended that I be authorized to accept at the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting minor amendments to the protocol and the resolutions noted above provided:

- (i) that they are generally acceptable to the other NATO members;
- (ii) that they are in consonance with the spirit of the Final Act of London; and
- (iii) that they do not affect Canada's interests adversely.

20. There are three other related matters on which Cabinet may wish to be informed though no decisions are necessary at this time concerning them:

(i) Discussions are proceeding in Bonn between the United Kingdom, the United States and France, as occupying powers, and the German Federal Republic, on the arrangements that will be necessary, once the Occupation Statute has been revised and the Allied High Commission abolished, to provide for the status of forces in Germany and other related questions dealt with in the Bonn Conventions. The Canadian Embassy in Bonn has been kept informed of developments by the United Kingdom High Commission and is concerned with ensuring that Canadian interests (arising out of the presence in Germany of the First Canadian Infantry Brigade Group and the First Canadian Air Division) are protected. A report on the proposed arrangements will probably be made to the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting by the Three Powers.

(ii) The draft protocol to the Brussels Treaty establishing an agency for the control of armaments contains the following provision: "The Brussels Council shall transmit to the agency the information it has received from the Governments of the United States and Canada with respect to the military aid to be distributed between the continental members of the Organization." This provision should not require any substantial alteration in the procedure for allocation of Canadian Mutual Aid. It would merely mean that, after the usual recommendations for allocation had been received from the Standing Group, we would inform the Brussels Treaty Council as well as the Brussels Treaty countries themselves of any arms or equipment allocated to them.

(iii) Although there is no explicit mention of it in the London Act, it is generally assumed that the reinforcement of the NATO machinery that is envisaged will probably involve some tightening up of the Annual Review procedure in the direction of making the yearly negotiation of force goals a more truly multilateral exercise. At present NATO countries decide first what they will do and then notify this to NATO through the Annual Review process, and force goals are fixed accordingly. The recommendations made during the Review, unless they are accepted by the countries to which they are directed, have the status merely of NATO Secretariat proposals. If this procedure remains entirely unchanged, the German Federal Republic may choose to set its own force goals at levels that will be in conflict with the maximum levels set by the Brussels Treaty Organization. We may therefore expect a move to modify the Annual Review procedure so that recommendations to member countries would become, like the rest of the matters dealt with in the Annual Review Report, the subject of general discussion and agreement in the Annual Review Committee. I think we should acquiesce in such a move.⁶⁵

DECLARATION BY THE GERMAN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND JOINT DECLARATION BY THE GOVERNMENTS OF FRANCE, UNITED KINGDOM AND UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The following declarations were recorded at the Conference by the German Federal Chancellor and by the Foreign Ministers of France, United Kingdom and United States of America.

DECLARATION BY GERMAN FEDERAL REPUBLIC

The German Federal Republic has agreed to conduct its policy in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and accepts the obligations set forth in Article 2 of the Charter.

Upon her accession to the North Atlantic Treaty and the Brussels Treaty, the German Federal Republic declares that she will refrain from any action inconsistent with the strictly defensive character of the two treaties. In particular the German Federal Republic undertakes never to have recourse to force to achieve the reunification of Germany or the modification of the present boundaries of the German Federal Republic, and to resolve by peaceful means any disputes which may arise between the Federal Republic and other States.

DECLARATION BY THE GOVERNMENTS OF
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, UNITED KINGDOM AND FRANCE

⁶⁵ Les recommandations contenues dans cette note de service ont été approuvées par le Cabinet le 19 octobre 1954.

The recommendations in this memorandum were approved by Cabinet on October 19, 1954.

The Governments of the United States of America, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the French Republic.

Being resolved to devote their efforts to the strengthening of peace in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and in particular with the obligations set forth in Article 2 of the Charter.

(i) to settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security and justice are not endangered;

(ii) to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations;

(iii) to give the United Nations every assistance in any action it takes in accordance with the Charter, and to refrain from giving assistance to any State against which the United Nations take preventive or enforcement action;

(iv) to ensure that States which are not Members of the United Nations act in accordance with the principles of the Charter so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Having regard to the purely defensive character of the Atlantic Alliance which is manifest in the North Atlantic Treaty, wherein they reaffirm their faith in the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and their desire to live in peace with all peoples and all Governments, and undertake to settle their international disputes by peaceful means in accordance with the principles of the Charter and to refrain, in accordance with those principles, from the threat or use of force in their international relations.

Take note that the German Federal Republic has by a Declaration dated October 3rd accepted the obligations set forth in Article 2 of the Charter of the United Nations and has undertaken never to have recourse to force to achieve the reunification of Germany or the modification of the present boundaries of the German Federal Republic, and to resolve by peaceful means any disputes which may arise between the Federal Republic and other States:

Declare that

1. They consider the Government of the Federal Republic as the only German Government freely and legitimately constituted and therefore entitled to speak for Germany as the representative of the German people in international affairs.

2. In their relations with the Federal Republic they will follow the principles set out in Article 2 of the United Nations Charter.

3. A peace settlement for the whole of Germany, freely negotiated between Germany and her former enemies, which should lay the foundation of a lasting peace, remains an essential aim of their policy. The final determination of the boundaries of Germany must await such a settlement.

4. The achievement through peaceful means of a fully free and unified Germany remains a fundamental goal of their policy.

5. The security and welfare of Berlin and the maintenance of the position of the Three Powers there are regarded by the Three Powers as essential elements of the peace of the free world in the present international situation. Accordingly they will maintain armed forces within the territory of Berlin as long as their responsibilities require it. They therefore reaffirm that they will treat any attack against Berlin from any quarter as an attack upon their forces and themselves.

6. They will regard as a threat to their own peace and safety any recourse to force which in violation of the principles of the United Nations Charter threatens the integrity and unity of the Atlantic alliance or its defensive purposes. In the event of any such action, the three Governments, for their part, will consider the offending government as having forfeited its rights to any guarantee and any military assistance provided for in the North Atlantic Treaty and its protocols. They will act in accordance with Article 4 of the North Atlantic Treaty with a view to taking other measures which may be appropriate.

7. They will invite the association of other member States of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation with this Declaration.

CONFIDENTIAL

DRAFT PROTOCOL ON THE ACCESSION OF THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY TO THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

The parties to the North Atlantic Treaty signed at Washington on 4th April, 1949.

2. Being satisfied that the security of the North Atlantic area will be enhanced by the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany to that treaty, and

3. Having noted that the Federal Republic of Germany has by a declaration dated 3rd October, 1954, accepted the obligations set forth in Article 2 of the Charter of the United Nations and has undertaken upon its accession to the North Atlantic Treaty to refrain from any action inconsistent with the strictly defensive character of that treaty, and

4. Having further noted that all member governments have associated themselves with the declaration made by the Governments of the United States of America, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the French Republic on the same date in connection with the aforesaid declaration of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Article 1.

Upon the entry into force of the present protocol, the Government of the United States of America shall on behalf of all the parties communicate to the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany an invitation to accede to the North Atlantic Treaty. Thereafter the Federal Republic of Germany shall become a party to that treaty on the date when it deposits its instrument of accession with the Government of the United States of America in accordance with Article 10 of the Treaty.

Article 2.

The present protocol shall enter into force when each of the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty has notified to the Government of the United States of America its acceptance thereof. The Government of the United States of America shall inform the other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty of the date of the receipt of each such notification and of the date of the entry into force of the present protocol.

Article 3.

The present protocol, of which the English and French texts are equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States of America. Duly certified copies thereof shall be transmitted by that government to the governments of the other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty.

In faith whereof the undersigned representatives duly authorized thereto by their respective governments have signed the present protocol.

TEXT OF PART IV OF THE FINAL ACT OF LONDON

The powers present at the Conference which are members of NATO agreed to recommend at the next ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Council that the Federal Republic of Germany should forthwith be invited to become a member.

They further agreed to recommend to NATO that its machinery be reinforced in the following respects:

(a) All forces of NATO countries stationed on the Continent of Europe shall be placed under the authority of SACEUR, with the exception of those which NATO has recognised or will recognise as suitable to remain under national command.

(b) Forces placed under SACEUR on the Continent shall be deployed in accordance with NATO strategy.

(c) The location of such forces shall be determined by SACEUR after consultation and agreement with the national authorities concerned.

(d) Such forces shall not be redeployed on the Continent nor used operationally on the Continent without his consent, subject to appropriate political guidance from the North Atlantic Council.

(e) Forces placed under SACEUR on the Continent shall be integrated as far as possible consistent with military efficiency.

(f) Arrangements shall be made for the closer co-ordination of logistics by SACEUR.

(g) The level and effectiveness of forces placed under SACEUR on the Continent and the armaments and equipment, logistics, and reserve formations of those forces on the Continent shall be inspected by SACEUR.

“The North Atlantic Council:

1. Recognising the necessity of strengthening the structure of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and of reinforcing the machinery for the collective defence of Europe and desirous of specifying the conditions governing joint examination of the defence effort of member countries:

2. Recalls that:

(a) The resources which member nations intend to devote to their defence effort as well as the level, composition and quality of the forces which the member nations are contributing to the defence of the North Atlantic area are each year subject to collective examination in the NATO annual review for the purpose of reaching agreement on force goals, taking into account expected mutual aid;

(b) The defence expenditures incurred by the member nations and the extent to which the recommendations emerging from the annual review have been carried out are the subject of periodical review during the year.

3. Agrees that with respect to the forces which the Brussels Treaty powers will place under NATO Command on the mainland of Europe, and for which maximum figures have been established in a special agreement concluded between these powers and agreed by the North Atlantic Council, if at any time during the NATO annual review recommendations are put forward, the effect of which would be to increase the level of forces above the limits established in this special agreement, the acceptance by the country concerned of such recommended increases shall be subject to unanimous approval by the Brussels Treaty powers, expressed either in the Brussels Treaty Council or in NATO.

4. Decides that all forces of member nations stationed in the area of the Allied Command Europe shall be placed under the authority of SACEUR or other appropriate NATO Command and under the direction of the NATO military authorities with the exception of those forces intended for the defence of overseas territories and other forces which NATO has recognised or will recognise as suitable to remain under national command.

5. Invites member nations to make an initial report for consideration and recognition by the Council on those forces which they plan to maintain within the area of Allied Command Europe for the common defence, but not to place under the authority of NATO, taking into account the provisions of relevant NATO directives bearing on that subject; the initial report will include a broad statement of the reason for which the above forces are not so placed. Thereafter if any changes are proposed Council action on the NATO annual review will constitute recognition as to the suitability and size of forces to be placed under the authority of the appropriate NATO Command and those to be retained under national command.

6. Notes that the agreements concluded within the framework of the Brussels Treaty Organization of the internal defence and policy forces which the member countries of that organization will maintain on the mainland shall be notified to the North Atlantic Council.

7. Agrees, in the interest of most effective collective defence, that in respect of combat forces in the area of Allied Command Europe and under SACEUR;

(a) All deployments shall be in accordance with NATO strategy;

(b) The location of forces in accordance with NATO operational plans shall be determined by SACEUR after consultation and agreement with the national authorities concerned;

(c) Forces under SACEUR and within the area of Allied Command Europe shall not be redeployed or used operationally within that area without the consent of SACEUR, subject to political guidance furnished by the North Atlantic Council, when appropriate, through normal channels.

8. Decides that:

(a) Integration of forces at army group and tactical air force level shall be maintained;

(b) In view of the powerful combat support units and logistic support organization at army level, integration at that level and associated air force level will be the rule, wherever formations of several nationalities are operating in the same area and on a common task, provided there are no overriding objections from the point of view of military effectiveness;

(c) Wherever military efficiency permits, in light of the size, location and logistic support of forces, integration at lower levels, both in the land and air forces, shall be achieved to the maximum extent possible;

(d) Proposals to the Council, indicating any increases in commonly financed items of expenditures, such as infrastructure, which might be entailed by the adoption of such measures, should be submitted by the NATO military authorities.

9. Agrees that, in order to improve SACEUR's capability to discharge his responsibilities in the defence of Allied Command Europe, his responsibilities and powers for the logistic support of the forces placed under this authority shall be extended.

10. Considers that these increased responsibilities and powers should include authority;

(a) To establish, in consultation with the national authorities concerned, requirements for the provision of logistic resources*

* By logistic resources should be understood all the material, supplies, installations and parts thereof necessary for the prolonged conduct of combat operations.

(b) To determine, in agreement with the national authorities concerned, their geographic distribution;

(c) To establish, in consultation with these authorities, logistic priorities for the raising, equipping and maintenance of units;

(d) To direct the utilisation, for meeting his requirements, of those portions of the logistic support systems made available to him by the appropriate authorities;

(e) To co-ordinate and supervise the use, for logistical purposes, of NATO common infrastructure facilities and of those national facilities made available to him by the national authorities.

11. Agrees that, in order to ensure that adequate information is obtained and made available to the appropriate authorities about the forces placed under SACEUR including reserve formations and their logistic support within the area of Allied Command Europe, SACEUR shall be granted increased authority to call for reports regarding the level and effectiveness of such forces and their armaments, equipment and supplies as well as the organization and location of their logistic arrangements. He shall also make field inspections within that area as necessary.

12. Invites nations to submit to SACEUR such reports to this end as he may call for from time to time; and to assist inspection within the area of Allied Command Europe by SACEUR of these forces and their logistic support arrangements as necessary.

13. Confirms that the powers exercised by SACEUR in peacetime extend not only to the organization into an effective integrated force of the forces placed under him but also to their training: that in this field, SACEUR has direct control over the higher training of all national forces assigned to his command in peacetime; and that he should receive facilities from member nations to inspect the training of those cadre and other forces within the area of Allied Command Europe earmarked for his command.

14. Directs the NATO military authorities to arrange for the designation by SACEUR of a high-ranking officer of his command who will be authorized to transmit regularly to the Brussels Treaty Council information relating to the forces of the Brussels Treaty Powers on the mainland of Europe acquired as a result of the reports and inspections mentioned in paragraphs 11 and 12 in order to enable that Council to establish that the limits laid down in the special agreement mentioned in paragraph 3 above are being observed.

15. Agrees that the expression "the area of Allied Command Europe" as used throughout this resolution shall not include North Africa; and that this resolution does not alter the present status of the United Kingdom and United States forces in the Mediterranean.

16. Directs the NATO Military Committee to initiate the necessary changes in the directives issued to SACEUR to give effect to the above policies and objectives of the North Atlantic Council."

Repeat Paris No. 82 (Immediate) for Stadacona and Canac; London No. 142. Please pass the following message to the Minister immediately on arrival.

When I saw Blankenhorn last night he said to me that there was one matter in which you could, if you agreed, be extremely helpful to the Chancellor. He went on to explain that the Germans envisaged that after the decision of the North Atlantic Council to admit Germany to NATO had been taken there would be further discussion in the Council of arrangements connected with the admission of Germany and in particular with the protocol to the treaty which would be necessitated by Germany's entry. The Germans very much hoped that at this second stage in the proceedings the Chancellor might be asked to take his place at the Council table. Blankenhorn's suggestion was that you might be prepared to further this development. He said that a similar procedure had been followed in the cases of Greece and Turkey and that their representatives had been invited to the Council at a comparable stage in the procedure for their admission. (I am not sure whether Blankenhorn's statement regarding Greece and Turkey is accurate, but I think from memory that it is.) Blankenhorn said that, of course, it would be perfectly clear that Germany's presence at the Council on this occasion would be purely provisional pending ratification of Germany's entry. He added that he did not anticipate that there would be much opposition to such a proposal. He thought in fact that several countries would be in favour and mentioned in particular the Belgians. I asked him whether the French had been sounded out on this proposal. He replied in the negative but said that he did not think they would object.

2. I told Blankenhorn that I would pass his message on to you but I of course did not commit you in any way. At the end of the conversation Blankenhorn said that this was not a — “formal” request by the German Government but simply a suggestion.

3. No doubt if you feel disposed to take any action on this “suggestion”, this would be much appreciated here and would be a good thing in terms of German-Canadian relations. On the other hand, I do not know how strong French opposition to the idea might be or what the general feeling in NATO circles on the subject would be. Blankenhorn will be accompanying the Chancellor to Paris if it is desired to get in touch with him.

4. Incidentally, you are aware that the Chancellor is leaving for the United States on October 26 to receive a degree at the Columbia University. There has been no suggestion of a visit to Canada on this occasion. My immediately following telegram† contains Blankenhorn’s assessment of prospects for Franco-German negotiations and the Nine-Power conference.

Memorandum from Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

EXTENSION OF THE BRUSSELS TREATY ORGANIZATION

The details of the new Brussels Treaty Organization when it includes Germany and Italy, and the site of the Council are not matters on which Canada can easily intervene. They are nevertheless of very great interest to us because the manner in which they are solved is likely to have considerable effect on NATO.

2. Lord Ismay proposed on October 11 in a Note to the NATO Council that administrative arrangements be worked out which would provide for the primary authority of NATO over the Brussels Treaty Organization. He suggested specifically that “The national Permanent Representatives should be the same on both the NATO and Brussels Treaty Organization Councils, it being understood that when in permanent session, both Councils should be situated in Paris”. Since this proposal was in accordance with the Canadian desire to see the primary authority of NATO asserted in both political and military matters, and also in order to assure the administrative efficiency of NATO, the Canadian Delegate supported Lord Ismay.

3. The French authorities, however, have indicated that they are in favour of a more or less autonomous status for the organization in NATO, and that they are not ready to accept Lord Ismay’s proposals as they stand. In telegram No. 823 of October 16, 1954,† the Canadian Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Council reported that “the French have shown an extreme sensibility to the publicity value of the proposed Brussels Treaty Organization.” The intention of the French Government seems to be:

(a) to reconcile through a strengthening of the Brussels Treaty those elements in France which are opposed to Germany’s admission into NATO. Through the BTO, a hard core of guarantees against Germany within NATO, might make German participation in Western defence more palatable to French opinion.

(b) The French also wish to preserve the idea of European integration and, as Mr. Wilgress states: "In their mind, the BTO should be presented as the starting point or the nucleus of European integration."

4. With a view to implementing those two aims manifestly brought up for internal political consumption, the French intend to press for:

(a) strengthening of the Armament Control Commission

(b) separate representation on both Councils of BTO and NATO.

5. We are particularly concerned in this memorandum with the possible effects upon the structure of NATO of the strengthening of the Brussels Treaty Organization. We note that the present French proposals are such that close co-ordination between NATO and BTO will become extremely difficult. Although the French insisted that the first meeting of the Brussels Treaty Working Party be held in the Quai d'Orsay, they have apparently joined with most of the other Brussels Treaty countries in agreeing to London as the permanent site of the BTO.

6. Mr. Wilgress has now reported in telegram No. 1312 of October 18[†] that the Brussels Treaty countries are now pretty well agreed among themselves that the headquarters of the Council should be in London, while the Armaments Agency should be located in Paris. He adds that "in view of the political and psychological importance which most of the Brussels Treaty countries, and perhaps more particularly France, attach to the developing of a separate identity to the Brussels Treaty grouping within NATO, I assume that neither we nor the Americans would wish to press any countervailing arguments we might see in a Paris location."

7. There are strong political and administrative reasons why, it seems to us, the Brussels Treaty mechanism should be closely co-ordinated with that of NATO. The most important is clearly that two separate organizations in different capitals are going inevitably to duplicate a good deal of work and the efficiency of the defence of Western Europe may be impaired. From a political point of view, it is not improbable that the Brussels Treaty countries may, in order to protect their common interests, tend to unite within NATO as a kind of "inner circle" which could have a preponderant influence in the shaping of NATO policy. This would create a problem for Canada, which has inevitably tended towards allying itself within the Council with like-minded middle powers, such as Belgium and The Netherlands. These countries being members of the Brussels Pact, Canada would be left in the Council without its now natural allies. At such a junction we would have to look elsewhere for partners, such as Norway, Denmark, Turkey and Greece. A grouping of Canada, within NATO, with these countries, would lead in effect to the formation of three "blocs" in the Council: the Standing Group of the United Kingdom, United States and France; a nucleus of Brussels Powers; and a peripheral zone of influence consisting of Canada, Norway, Denmark, Iceland, Portugal, Greece and Turkey.

8. This situation within NATO has already been viewed with a certain amount of apprehension by Norway. Norway's natural reaction to the formation of this bloc of Brussels Powers has been to strengthen her ties with Canada by hinting at Canadian participation in the Northern European Command. It seems that a re-grouping within NATO is already in preparation. We cannot help thinking that such a state of affairs might be prejudicial to the smooth working of NATO and to the unity of purpose of its members.

9. On the other hand, it should be recognized that there may be certain advantages in retaining London as the site of the Brussels Treaty Organization. In the first place, such a location would probably permit the United Kingdom to exert an influence on the policies of the Organization more in proportion to recent substantial British commitments to European defence than might be the case if the headquarters were in Paris. In the second place, a London site could serve to remind the British people of the increasingly important role which the United Kingdom will be playing in European affairs. Thirdly, if with London as the headquarters the United Kingdom were able to take a more active part in the work and deliberations of the Organization, this could serve to offset any strong German influence and thereby lessen French apprehensions of German predominance. Finally, there is, of course, the administrative convenience of retaining intact a headquarter which has already been established. In this connection, the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, Lieutenant-General Foulkes, has expressed his preference for London since it would be probably easier to maintain close contact with the military aspects of the Organization through the Military Liaison Officers attached to Canada House.

10. In the light of the above considerations, it seems clear that there may be a good deal to be said both for and against the French proposals and the proposal to have the headquarters of the Organization in London. However, as far as Canada is concerned, I think we must agree with Mr. Wilgress that it would be difficult and inopportune for us to raise objections to the proposals agreed among the Brussels countries themselves.

NINE-POWER MEETING

As he had done the previous day for the four power meeting, Mr. Mendes-France proposed that Sir Anthony Eden chair the meeting. Sir Anthony first invited the Secretary General of NATO and the Secretary General of the Brussels Treaty Organization to join in the deliberations of the conference. He also announced that the ceremony of signature of the four and nine power protocols would start at 2:45 p.m. on Saturday at the Quai d'Orsay.

2. The first item dealt with by the conference was the report of the four power's meeting. Sir Anthony simply reported that the four power meeting had agreed on the protocol terminating the occupation in the Federal Republic of Germany. Until Germany formally becomes a member of NATO, however, the right to station forces on German territory will be governed by a special convention which will only be signed by the four powers but which will be open to accession to countries maintaining forces in Germany. Sir Anthony, therefore, called for an immediate meeting of representatives of Canada, the Netherlands, and Belgium to discuss this point (see our telegram No. 847 of October 21).†

3. With regard to Item II on the agenda regarding the results of the Brussels Treaty working group in London, the following decisions were reached:

(1) Name of the organization. Although in London, Germany had suggested that the word "Western" be left out of the title "Council of Western European Union", the Chancellor did not press the point at the meeting. The Council will, therefore, be known as the Council of Western European Union.

(2) Voting procedure in the Council. The Belgians objected in London to a voting procedure based on the principle of unanimity. As Mr. Spaak did not find any support for a simple majority voting rule, the voting procedure provided for in the present protocol and based on unanimity remains unchanged.

(3) As you will recall, the London Final Act (paragraph 12, Section II) provides that the Council should report to the delegates of the seven powers of the Brussels Treaty of the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe. As there was considerable doubt in the London working group as to the exact meaning of this provision, the matter came up for rather lengthy discussion at the Ministerial meeting. It finally emerged that the delegates of the seven powers to the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe would constitute a small ad hoc assembly to which the Council of the Western European Union will submit an annual report on its activities. Council reports will not only deal with military matters but shall touch upon all the other activities of the Council including cultural and social activities. The French, Belgian, Dutch and United Kingdom Foreign Ministers favoured this arrangement rather than the Italian suggestion which would have linked the Council with the Consultative Assembly of the coal and steel community.

(4) On the general question of relationship between NATO and Western European Union raised particularly by Lord Ismay's memorandum, Mr. Dulles introduced the following text which was accepted without discussion: "Recognising the undesirability of duplicating the military staffs of NATO, the Council and its agency will rely on the appropriate military authorities of NATO for information and advice on military matters."

(5) It was also decided that the seat of the Council would be in London, while the armaments agency will be stationed in Paris.

4. Point 4 of the agenda relating to a declaration inviting Italy and the Federal Republic of Germany to accede to the Brussels Treaty presented no difficulty and was readily accepted.

5. The conference then considered each of the four protocols on the Brussels Treaty. As these protocols deal with matters of indirect interest to Canada as a non-Brussels Treaty power, I shall only dwell briefly on the main points that were discussed. On Protocol II dealing with the forces of the Western European Union, a prolonged discussion took place on the table of forces mentioned in Article I. The Chancellor took exception to the number of divisions mentioned in the table on the ground that one could arrive at a different set of figures if calculation was made on the basis of effective strength rather than on the basis of the formula suggested by Article I. Mendes-France on the other hand insisted that for political reasons the number of divisions and aircraft agreed upon in the EDC special agreement be included in the protocol. A new Article I will be redrafted which will refer to the special agreement to the EDC Treaty without, however, giving the exact figures contained in that agreement.

6. A prolonged discussion took place on Protocol III regarding the control of armaments. The Dutch Foreign Minister took exception to the list of weapons which the French want to fall under the control of the agency, on the ground that it would present a departure from the general principle adopted in London. In the face of the determined opposition of Mr. Adenauer and Mr. Beyen, Mendes-France agreed to reduce the list of weapons contained in Annex 4. He only gave way, however, on the control of machines specifically designed to manufacture arms on the condition that the matter would be referred for further study to the proposed Commission on Armament Production and Standardization.

7. Protocol IV of the agency led to a discussion regarding the appointment of the director of the agency. In order to emphasize and insure his independence, it was finally agreed that the tenure of the Director's office would be lengthened to five years and that in addition he will not be re-eligible. An interesting change took place on Article 22 dealing with foreign military aid between Mr. Mendes-France and Mr. Dulles. In view of the special importance of the discussion for us, I am reporting on it separately.

8. Mr. Mendes-France's proposal to call for December 1st a seven power conference to study the problem of production and standardization of armaments with a view to setting up an armaments pool, led to sharp exchanges between the French Prime Minister and Mr. Beyen. Mr. Beyen warned that the controversial nature of the plan would, in his view, encourage delays in ratification and that it would be particularly unwise to decide on holding such a conference on December 1 when the London Agreements would be under consideration by most parliaments. (In the course of this discussion, the Italian Foreign Minister said that it would not be possible for the Italian Parliament, in view of constitutional requirements to ratify before next February). Mr. Mendes-France said that he had been under criticism in the Assembly for having failed to obtain a firm decision in London on this point. Politically it was important to him that the plan be under active consideration before the London Agreements came for ratification in the Assembly. Mr. Spaak finally introduced a compromise solution which rallied general support. The London working group will be instructed to convene in Paris on 17th January, 1955 to study the French draft directives with a view to submitting proposals to the Council of Western European Union when it comes into being.

9. The meeting adjourned at 8:00 p.m. last night after having covered the whole agenda.

FOURTEEN POWER CONFERENCE

The Ministerial meeting of the Council met at 3:15 p.m. yesterday, and covered its agenda in a relatively short time. The item relating to the results of the nine power meeting, more specifically the protocols to the Brussels Treaty, gave rise to some discussion. Prior to the meeting there were rumours that Norway and Denmark would question the protocol on forces of the Western European Union, and that Turkey would insist that a specific clause be included in the protocol modifying and completing the Brussels Treaty providing for the accession of other countries to the Brussels Treaty. In fact, although these interventions took place, their tone was moderate and need not give us any concern.

2. The Norwegian Foreign Minister said that Protocol 1 of the Brussels Treaty offered a difficulty for those countries which had not attended the nine power meeting. Article 1 referred to a special agreement annexed to the EDC Treaty, a document which had not been officially communicated to the other NATO countries. His government would therefore ask that the agreement in question be made available. Sir Anthony said that this document, although it had not been published, was known to most governments concerned, but if necessary, there should be no objection to formally communicating it to the NATO governments. The Chairman asked whether this suggestion was agreeable to the six EDC governments, and no objection being raised, it was decided that the text of the special agreement would be formally brought to the attention of the interested governments for their information.

3. With regard to the resolution instructing a working group to convene in Paris on January 17 to study the problem of production and standardization of armaments, Mr. Pearson suggested in order to avoid any duplication of work between NATO and the Western European Union, that this group should invite in due course members of the Production and Logistics Division of the NATO international secretariat to assist the group in its task. This suggestion met general support, and was adopted. The Greek representative in supporting Mr. Pearson's suggestion, proposed that the working group should come under NATO, but this point was not taken up by the meeting.

4. The Turkish Foreign Minister made a general statement in which he praised the Big Four leaders for having successfully brought Germany into the western system of defence, and furthered the cause of European unity. He said that his government considered the Brussels Treaty in its new form as a foundation of European integration. He expressed the hope that the protocol providing for the accession of Germany and Italy to the Brussels Treaty would not be interpreted in such a way as to prevent other countries to accede to the Treaty. The eventual extension of the Brussels Treaty was predicated, however, upon the establishment of the closest co-operation between NATO and the Western European Union.

5. Upon an earlier suggestion made by the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary, the meeting considered the omnibus resolution on the results of the nine power meeting, mentioned in your telegram No. 775 of October 19, 1954.† Mr. Pearson said that in order to remove any impression that the results of the nine power conference weakened in any way Atlantic co-operation, the resolution should express confidence that the closest co-operation between NATO and the Western European Union would be established. He also hoped that the resolution would record the fact that NATO remains the foundation of the security and progress of the Atlantic community. A drafting group was convened during the meeting to work out a new text and the wording suggested in your telegram under reference was included in the new text. This text is being forwarded to you in the following telegram.†

6. We are reporting separately on the NATO items of the agenda.

MINISTERIAL MEETING OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL ON OCTOBER 22

The Council completed the business on its agenda in short order and with few points causing difficult discussion. The atmosphere of complete agreement on all important points appeared somewhat unreal since everyone had in their minds the question, of which no mention was made, of the unresolved problem of the Saar. Up to the very end of the session, there was doubt whether there would be agreement upon the release of the communiqué announcing that the various documents would be signed on the following day, but when the time came there was no objection. Presumably, Mendes-France believed that he and Adenauer could come to an understanding before the time for signature.

2. The first items on the agenda related to the Brussels Treaty and the various documents were those which had been approved by the nine power meeting the previous day. Several points of interest emerged in discussion of these documents, and we are reporting on these matters separately.

3. The first item of strictly NATO business was the resolution of association with the 3-power declaration of October 3. On this subject I made a brief statement which has been reported in the draft verbatim record as follows:

"Mr. Chairman.

My government welcomes the important and valuable declaration with regard to the future of Germany and the security and welfare of Berlin. The discharge by the three powers concerned of their special responsibilities in these matters has I think represented an important contribution to peace and security, and we should be grateful to them for that.

"My own government is not in a position to share in all these responsibilities, these special responsibilities, which flow from the Potsdam Agreement, but it fully endorses and associates itself with the declaration which has been made. We will do what we can, or should, to ensure that the objectives behind the declaration to which we subscribe are realized".

4. Similar declarations were made by the other countries concerned, some of whom made reference at the same time to the German Government's declaration also made on October 3 in London. Following these declarations the Council approved the resolution as drafted.

5. The Council then approved the protocol providing for the accession of Germany to NATO. In the course of his statement of this protocol, the Danish Minister referred to the problem of the Danish minority in Schleswig-Holstein, and his remarks were supported by Norway. It was agreed that the protocol should be signed at the Palais de Chaillot on Saturday at 4.30 p.m. following the signature at the Quai d'Orsay of the documents relating to German sovereignty and the various documents involving the present or prospective members of the Brussels Treaty Organization.

6. The Council agreed to hold its next ministerial session in mid-December, when the Chairman hoped that the military authorities would be able to present a preliminary report on the "new look study". The exact date will be determined later by the permanent council.

7. Under other business, Italy and Portugal made statements on Trieste and the Portuguese territories in India respectively. The Italian statement was unexceptionable, and the Portuguese statement added little to previous statements made in the permanent council but at the same time reiterated Portugal's intention if the situation should demand it of calling for consultation under Article 4.

8. Dulles, Mendes-France and Eden then made statements concerning the developments of the last few weeks. Dulles' remarks were notable for their skill, temperance and modesty, a very effective intervention.

9. Following an interval for drafting, the Council then approved an omnibus resolution along the lines which we have considered desirable concerning the collection of agreements recently worked out. Finally, an undistinguished but adequate communiqué was agreed with little discussion.

10. As all of these various documents are being issued to the press and will be available to you from other sources, we do not propose to send the texts by telegram.

ARTICLE 22, PROTOCOL IV, REGARDING MILITARY AID PROVIDED BY THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA TO THE BRUSSELS TREATY POWERS

This matter came up for discussion at the end of the Ministerial meeting yesterday in a manner which caused us some surprise. Mr. Dulles said that he had been asked to give his opinion on a French proposal which he had just received. The other delegations were unaware of the contents of the paper which Mr. Dulles had before him.

2. Mr. Dulles proceeded to say that he could add nothing to what he had already said in London on this subject. It was quite natural that if the United States were making grants of military aid, they should also decide what happens to them. The United States did not wish to establish a formal consultation machinery which might prove cumbersome and result in delays in allocating the military aid which they were providing to their allies.

3. Mr. Pearson said that evidently a new proposal had been made, but unfortunately, he was unaware of its content.

4. Mr. Mendes-France said that in London he sought the acceptance of the same principle that had been agreed upon regarding EDC whereby foreign military aid would be assigned directly to the community and allocated according to the requirements of the member countries. Mr. Dulles, however, had been opposed to this as applied to the Brussels Treaty Organization although he (Mr. Mendes-France) was unaware that Mr. Pearson had voiced any objection at the time. For this reason he had seen fit to seek the views of Mr. Dulles, and he wished to apologize for not having brought his new proposal to the attention of the Canadian Minister. The French Prime Minister then proceeded to explain that the ideal solution would be, of course, that the proposed agency assume the control of foreign aid, but failing this, there should at least be a procedure of consultation set up comparable to that which existed within the framework of OEEC regarding Marshall Plan aid and which enabled the discussion on a multi-lateral basis of the allocation of American aid to recipient countries.

5. Mr. Pearson, who had by then been given a copy of the French paper, said that as the proposal concerned American aid exclusively, there was no need for him to make comments at this stage.

6. The Dutch Foreign Minister said the allocation of foreign aid to the Brussels Treaty powers was a matter of common concern, and that if the matter was to be discussed further, it should not be confined to a dialogue between the United States and France, but the other powers concerned should be given an opportunity to make their views known.

7. Upon Mr. Mendes-France's insistence that Mr. Dulles give assurances that the United States would be prepared to reconsider the matter, the Secretary of State simply added that although the United States were eager to help in strengthening the agency, he could only say that they were opposed to piling-up administrative machinery as he was convinced that this would only defeat the purpose we all had in mind. When the agency had come into existence, if it became apparent that some sort of consultative machinery was essential for the efficiency of its operations, it would then be the time to reconsider the matter. Mr. Dulles said that he had no objection to his statement being included in the record if this was considered helpful. Mr. Mendes-France asked that the discussion of this point be reproduced in the conference minutes.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION AND GERMANY

53. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 19th, reported on the meetings of the nine foreign ministers and of the North Atlantic Council, which he had attended in Paris the previous week. Prior to these two meetings, there had been a meeting of the three Occupying Powers and the Federal Republic of Germany, at which final agreement had been reached on ending the occupation of the Republic, the restoration of its sovereignty and the status and interim financing of the troops remaining in Germany. An agreement supplementing the NATO Status of Forces Agreement was also being worked out to deal with the privileges and immunities of foreign forces. The Nine-Power Conference had concluded successfully with the approval of protocols to the Brussels Treaty providing for the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy to the Treaty, the setting of maximum levels of the forces in Europe of the Treaty powers, and the establishment of an agency for the control of arms produced by the continental members of the Brussels Treaty. The Conference had also adopted, at the insistence of the French, a resolution to convene a working party of the Treaty powers to study the question of the production and standardization of armaments. From now on, the Brussels Treaty Organization would be known as the Western European Union.

The NATO Council had met and noted with approval the reports of the two previous meetings and itself approved the protocol providing for the accession of Germany to NATO, a resolution associating other NATO countries with the Three-Power Declaration on Germany and Berlin, a resolution on the reinforcement of NATO's military machinery, and a resolution to ensure the closest co-operation between the Western European Union and NATO. A convention on the presence of foreign troops in Germany had been agreed to and provision had been made whereby non-occupying powers having troops in the Federal Republic could accede to it. Appropriate financial arrangements had been made whereby the Federal Republic would contribute to the cost of the foreign forces in Germany for the interim period between the termination of this occupation and the entry of Germany into NATO and for a 12 month period thereafter. Towards the end of the meeting considerable apprehension had been created by the decision of the French Cabinet that Mr. Mendes-France was not to sign any document unless arrangements suitable to France with respect to the Saar had been made. After a good deal of difficulty and much hard work, such arrangements were concluded, largely due to the good offices of Sir Anthony Eden and the concessions made by Chancellor Adenauer. France was able to adhere to all the agreements which had been reached previously. The Western European Union headquarters would be established in London, the Armaments Control Organization, within the Union, in Paris, and the machinery for the inspection of forces would be provided by SACEUR under NATO.

It seemed likely that all the appropriate agreements and protocols would be ratified by the legislature of the NATO countries, but no steps would be taken by others until the French Parliament had placed its stamp of approval on the new agreements. There was no danger of Canada holding up Germany's accession to NATO by failure to ratify the protocol before January 15th. There would, in all probability, be no great difficulty about the Annual Review procedures, as it was no longer planned to make any substantial changes in them. On the other hand, the possibility still existed that there might, in the future, be minor changes of emphasis within the present procedures arising out of the arrangements accompanying the admission of Germany to NATO. In any case, none of the decisions being taken at this stage would prejudice what attitude Canada might adopt towards such changes when and if they did arise.

54. In the course of discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) The reaction of the Soviet Union to the events which had occurred in the last few weeks had been quite mild. The only card which the Russians could play in the circumstances was that of reunification of Germany, but this would have to be subject to free elections which it was quite clear that the Soviets would not concede. The Canadian Ambassador to Moscow had expressed the firm belief that the new Russian régime was anxious to avoid war. Its domestic propaganda dwelt largely on the possibility of improving the standard of living of the Russian people and did not appear to be indoctrinating them further with fears of the West nor preparing them for war.

(b) The new arrangements involved considerable risks, but there was no alternative than to accept those risks. Germany was growing stronger at a rapid rate and it was far better to have such a development take place within the framework of the Western European Union and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization than free from any foreign control. Already it was clear that the Germans would play an active part in the Union and in NATO.

(c) It seemed unfortunate that the C.B.C. broadcast from Paris on this general subject the previous evening had been so critical and pessimistic, and apparently at variance not only with Canadian views but with most shades of French opinion as well.

55. The Cabinet noted with approval the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the meetings of the nine foreign ministers and of the North Atlantic Council concerning the integration of the Federal Republic of Germany with the Western European Community.

My Dear Colleague:

You will recall that on the 5th May, Mr. Wilgress reported in message No. 1382† on a meeting of the Council with the Standing Group held on April 30th. The Standing Group explained to the Council the procedure for processing the study by the Supreme Commanders on the capabilities planning, taking into consideration use of mass destruction weapons. This report gave the following outline:

July 1st—Results of the work of the Supreme Commanders to be sent to the Standing Group,

Sept 1st—U.K., U.S. and French Chiefs of Staff to examine and comment upon the Supreme Commanders' studies,

Oct 15th—The Standing Group to reconcile any conflicting views of the U.S., U.K., and French Chiefs of Staff that might emerge,

Oct 15th—The studies to be sent to the Military Committee (National Chiefs of Staff) through members of the Military Representatives Committee,

Dec 1st—The final reports to be ready for consideration by the Council.

This report was reviewed by the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, who was alarmed at the suggested procedure whereby the results of the studies would be examined by the Standing Group for the months of July and August, and then sent to the U.K., U.S. and French Chiefs of Staff for their comments to the 15th of October, and then after the conflicting views of the U.S., U.K. and French Chiefs of Staff were reconciled, the paper would then be sent on to the other eleven Nations, presumably for concurrence.

General Foulkes has raised this matter at a special meeting with the Standing Group held on 7 June, 1954. I am attaching a copy of the Standing Group's report on these discussions.[†] As there were some private discussions held later between the Chairman of the Standing Group and General Foulkes, I am attaching also a report of these discussions.

I am sure that you will agree with me that the stand taken by the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, represents the views of the Government and that we should be prepared to raise this matter in the Council should the Standing Group decide to ignore the representations of the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff.

I consider that this review of the shape and size of the forces in the future, taking into consideration the use of mass destruction weapons, is one of the most important military problems facing NATO, and that our experience in the past has shown that once the military authorities of U.S., U.K. and France have settled their differences, they secure governmental approval of their views and it is virtually impossible to have any change made.

I would suggest that Mr. Wilgress should be advised of these discussions and should be informed that they are fully endorsed by the Government and he should advise Lord Ismay of our views. It is suggested that in case the Standing Group do not agree to reconsider the procedure of handling the studies, that Mr. Wilgress be asked to take this matter up in the Council.

Yours sincerely,

BROOKE CLAXTON

[Ottawa], June 17, 1954

REPORT OF GENERAL FOULKES ON HIS DISCUSSION WITH THE STANDING GROUP ON 7 JUNE 54 WITH REGARD TO THE PROCEDURE WHICH THE STANDING GROUP PROPOSE TO ADOPT IN PROCESSING THE STUDIES OF THE SUPREME COMMANDERS, PARTICULARLY THE STUDY UNDERTAKEN BY SHAPE, TO DETERMINE THE EFFECTIVE PATTERN OF NATO MILITARY STRENGTHS ON THE BASIS OF THE FORCES WHICH WERE ESTIMATED WOULD BE AVAILABLE IN 1957, TAKING INTO ACCOUNT THE EFFECT OF NEW WEAPONS

1. I referred to the report of the Standing Group meeting with the Council on 30 April. The report reads as follows:

"The Standing Group appreciated that the Council wished to move forward as rapidly as possible with this work. However, the Standing Group, on careful consideration, felt that it would not be possible to reflect the conclusions of the studies in the 1954 Annual Review. The best that could be hoped for was that the results could be included in whatever guidance would be issued for the 1955 Annual Review. At present, the Standing Group thought that the most optimistic timetable for completing the studies was as follows:

July 1st—Results of the work of the Supreme Commanders to be sent to the Standing Group.

Sept 1st—U.K., U.S. and French Chiefs of Staff to examine and comment upon the Supreme Commanders studies.

Oct 15th—The Standing Group to reconcile any conflicting views of the U.S., U.K., and French Chiefs of Staff that might emerge.

Oct 15th—The studies to be sent to the Military Committee (National Chiefs of Staff) through members of the Military Representatives Committee.

Dec 1st—The final reports to be ready for consideration by the Council.

As wide areas of disagreement at the various stages could easily unsettle this programme, the Standing Group did not wish to be held strictly to the above timetable.

In reply to a question by Lord Ismay, the Chairman of the Standing Group said that, as far as possible, National Chiefs of Staff would be kept closely informed on the progress of the work as it developed, through members of the Military Representatives Committee."

2. The Canadian authorities are disturbed at this proposed procedure. The main objections to the procedure are:

(a) Canada will not see the paper until 15th October.

(b) That the US, UK and French Chiefs of Staff are going to have an opportunity to examine and comment on the studies before the National Chiefs of Staff see this paper.

(c) That the Standing [Group] are going to attempt to reconcile the conflicting views of the US, UK and France. In other words they are going to settle their policy before they have had an opportunity of hearing the views of the other 11 military members of the Military Committee.

(d) How are the members of the Military Committee to have the opportunity to discuss the paper with the Supreme Commanders?

3. This study was requested of the Military Committee by the Council at Lisbon in February 1952. It is perhaps the most important military study since the TCC study. It may have far reaching effects on all nations and certainly on national forces. This is not just a re-shuffle in the Command set up or a review of strategy which is a purely Standing Group matter, but a study affecting the shape, size and composition of our future NATO forces for the years to come, prepared by the Supreme Commanders who are responsible to all NATO governments not just the big three, and who report to the Military Committee.

4. There is some doubt as to whether the Standing Group can deal with this question in the manner suggested within their terms of reference. When the Standing Group was set up at the first meeting of the Military Committee on 6 October, 1949, provision was insisted upon so that representatives of non-Standing Group countries could make their views known in anticipation of any Standing Group resolution or decision. In elaborating on the functions of the Standing Group, General Bradley when questioned stated as follows:

"I would say that in all of our actions we act through the Military Committee and if there is any doubt as to the action we should take we should refer it to you" (the Military Committee).

5. It will be noted that the Standing Group is required to take full account of the views of the Military Representatives Committee in all military matters involving action by any of the National Chiefs of Staff or their Governments. There is no doubt in my mind that this is a subject which vitally affects all nations. This is a subject of vital NATO military policy which must be decided on equal terms by all the 14 Chiefs of Staff and we cannot agree with the Standing Group countries making up their minds, the other 11 countries being expected to accept the stand taken by the three national governments. This position is unacceptable to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff on the grounds that:

(a) This may vitally affect Canadian participation, present and future, and therefore should be dealt with as a Military Committee matter and not a Standing Group matter.

(b) It is beyond the terms of reference of the Standing Group to deal with this subject as a Standing Group matter.

(c) We cannot agree that the three NATO nations have a monopoly on military thinking and military planning.

(d) As this may involve financial and other policy matters of the Canadian Government, the Government will require the Canadian Chiefs of Staff to be in accord with the recommendations, and decisions on policy must be arrived at as equal partners any time they involve Canadian participation.

6. Therefore, we make the following suggestions:

(a) That on receipt of the results of the work of the Supreme Allied Commanders, they be studied by the Standing Group and the Standing Group prepare its comments on the studies.

(b) That the Supreme Allied Commanders' study and the comments of the Standing Group be then circulated to all Chiefs of Staff through the Military Representatives Committee and the views of all the National Chiefs of Staff be dealt with by the MRC or, if it is felt advisable, at a special meeting of the Military Committee.

(c) That no attempt be made to reconcile the views of the three members of the Military Committee which might prejudice an adequate consideration of the views of the other 11 members.

(d) That the report be not circulated to the Council until it has been adequately dealt with by the Military Committee.

7. This is a matter of such vital import to all the NATO nations that the Standing Group should carefully examine the views of all the NATO nations without prejudice and an opportunity should be given for a full-scale discussion of the views of the 14 nations and the Supreme Allied Commanders together, so that the best possible results and greatest possible cooperation can come from this study.

8. We have been very concerned with the meagre accomplishments of the MRC over the past year. I have had reason to review what has been achieved. A review of the agendas and minutes reveal that startlingly little has been accomplished. Something like 20 meetings of three-quarters to an hour and a half with only seven items of major import and most of these in preparation for a Military Committee meeting. Certainly this hardly justifies maintaining an Admiral and considerable staff for this meagre accomplishment. Now when a major policy matter does come it is ignored until the Big Three harden their policy and amend the paper.

9. After much discussion in the Standing Group it was agreed that the Standing Group would review this question bearing in mind the observations which we had made and would advise us of what revisions they are prepared to make in their timetable.

10. After the meeting General Whiteley asked me to come privately to his office so he could explain the situation. He pointed out that there were two things that worried him that he could not discuss very fully at this meeting. The first was security in regard to nuclear weapons and the second was security regarding certain political recommendations. He said I must realize that this paper would have certain reference to nuclear matters in which there was considerable security. I emphasized that this argument did not hold water at all. General Gruenther was well aware of the security regulations of the McMahon Act and he would not put in his paper anything which was prohibited by the McMahon Act and, furthermore, if it was alright for the Standing Group to see this paper it was certainly alright for Canada. It is common knowledge that the worst security in NATO is in a country which is represented on the Standing Group. I could not accept the fact that anything which could be seen by France could not be seen by Canada or any of the other NATO nations. General Whiteley soon saw the logic of this argument and dropped the matter of security. He then mentioned political security and said that there was a possibility that this paper would reveal that we would not be able to defend Denmark and part of Holland without the EDC and that this would be a very tricky question to be given to the 14 nations. I again pointed out that this was no secret. This had been stated to the Military Committee ever since forward strategy had been suggested and Generals Ridgway and Gruenther had made it quite clear that they could not carry out forward strategy without the EDC. Furthermore, the Danes were well aware of their isolated position and the Danish Chief of Staff had spent two and a half hours explaining the Danish isolated position to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff about a year ago. I emphasized to Whiteley that I could not agree that there was anything security-wise, either military or political, which could be discussed with the members of the Standing Group and not with the members of all the 14 nations. If there were difficult military and political problems to be solved I was not at all convinced that the Standing Group could solve them any better than the Military Committee. Furthermore, from my experience in NATO most of the difficulties have arisen from the failure of the Standing Group nations to reach agreement on military matters and not the whole 14 nations. As an example, I pointed out the difficulties in setting up the Mediterranean Command in which the Standing Group nations could not reach agreement and which had to be referred to the Military Committee without the UK and US being able to agree, and yet this matter was successfully solved by the Military Committee. I further pointed out that the setting up of the Iberian Command has been holding fire for over two years because of lack of agreement between the UK and US. I reiterated that we were not prepared to agree to the handling of this important military matter, which may affect our forces in future, for us by the Standing Group. I was quite sure that there were other NATO nations who felt exactly the same way. Whiteley said that Norway had already raised the same problem with General Collins when he visited Norway last month.

11. General Whiteley then suggested that he might be able to arrange that they would send out a preliminary paper and ask for comments and then the Standing Group would work on these comments and produce a second paper on which perhaps a meeting could be held. I said that I would be quite happy for the matter to be dealt with in the initial stages by the MRC and finally by the Military Committee, but I was not prepared to accept the paper after the Standing Group nations had reconciled their views and passed the paper on to us, expecting us to agree. From my experience in the past there was no hope of getting things changed once the Standing Group had agreed because they get Government approval of their military views and then there is little hope of any change. I was giving notice now that we were not prepared to accept this kind of an arrangement on this study. Whiteley assured me that he would go into this very thoroughly with the Standing Group when General Collins returned and would advise me of the results.

FUTURE NATO DEFENCE PLANNING

Mr. Claxton wrote Mr. Pearson on June 17 and expressed concern at the procedure which the Standing Group proposed to follow in dealing with the SHAPE studies on Capabilities Planning and 1957 Force Requirements in the light of new weapons. In our memorandum of June 30 (attached) we suggested:

(a) that we endorse the views of National Defence: (i) that the procedure for handling the SHAPE studies should be a matter for decision by the Military Committee or Military Representatives Committee and not by the Standing Group alone; and (ii) that the review of the studies themselves should be carried out in continuing consultation with the Military Representatives Committee;

(b) that Mr. Wilgress be asked to inform Lord Ismay of the Canadian position and be prepared to raise the matter in the Council if the Standing Group does not agree to modify the procedure it now proposes for handling the SHAPE studies; and

(c) that, if it becomes necessary for Mr. Wilgress to make representations to the Council, Cabinet approval be sought for the line to be taken.

2. In the meantime, however, General Foulkes had heard from Washington that the Standing Group had made a further study of this problem and had agreed to modify their procedure. Attached is a copy of General Foulkes' letter to you of June 30 along with a copy of Memorandum MRM-46-54 of June 23† to the Military Representatives Committee informing them as follows:

"In amplification of the memorandum (MRM-29-54) outlining the program which it was hoped to follow in presenting the new weapons studies to the Council, the Standing Group wishes to make clear to members of the Military Representatives Committee that it is their intention to invite the comments of members of the Military Representatives Committee before firming up their final report to the Military Committee."

3. This move by the Standing Group was undoubtedly made in response to General Foulkes' previous representations and is intended as a mollifying gesture. For the following reasons, however, I have doubts whether it will in practice mean any significant modification of the procedure to which we objected:

(a) MRM-46-54 is described merely as an "amplification" of the previous memorandum outlining the procedure for handling the SHAPE studies. This in itself would indicate that the Standing Group does not now envisage any basic change in that procedure.

(b) MRM-46-54 further states that the Standing Group intends to invite the comments of the Military Representatives "before firming up their final report to the Military Committee." In my view this means that the Standing Group will draft their own report on the SHAPE studies and will circulate it to the Military Representatives for comments before it is submitted formally to the Military Committee. This is tantamount to the original procedure whereby members of the Standing Group were to reconcile their own national views before sending their report to the Military Committee through members of the Military Representatives Committee.

(c) There is no mention of dates in MRM-46-54 and it must therefore be assumed that the original timetable will be maintained and that members of the Military Representatives Committee will not see the Standing Group report until October 15.

(d) There is no suggestion in MRM-46-54 that the Military Representatives will see the SHAPE studies in their original form or that they will be asked for comments during preparation of the Standing Group's report; indeed, mention of the "final report" would seem to confirm that this is the only form in which the Military Representatives will see it.

4. If this reasoning is correct, I think we still have important grounds on which to object to the Standing Group's procedure. As pointed out in our previous memorandum under reference, the Standing Group, by its own terms of reference, is under an obligation when dealing with matters of a policy and planning nature to consult with the member nations concerned "while studies are still in the preliminary stages" and Working Teams of the Standing Group are supposed to call upon the staffs of the Military Representatives for assistance and advice "during preparation of papers which are of concern to them." The procedure originally proposed by the Standing Group manifestly did not adhere to this principle and the Chairman of the Standing Group admitted as much to General Foulkes during their private discussion in Washington. The "amplification" contained in MRM-46-54 goes no further toward meeting our legitimate objections.

5. I would therefore suggest that you speak to General Foulkes:

(a) confirming our support for the position he had previously taken in objection to the Standing Group's procedure;

(b) expressing doubts about the practical value of the Standing Group's recent message to the Military Representatives Committee; and

(c) asking if he saw any objection to our informing Mr. Wilgress, as previously intended, and asking Mr. Wilgress to pass our views on to Lord Ismay.

FUTURE NATO DEFENCE PLANNING

You may be interested in the progress report given to the North Atlantic Council recently on the Capabilities Planning Study and the 1957 Force Requirements Study, which are intended to indicate what NATO's military capabilities will be in 1957 in light of the effect of nuclear weapons. (Letter No. 2252 of July 27 from our NATO Delegation in Paris, copy of which is attached).

2. You will note that the original reports by the Supreme Commanders (of which SHAPE's report was by far the most detailed and important) were submitted to the Standing Group on July 1st, that they have been studied by the Standing Group itself and are now being examined individually by the United States, United Kingdom and French Chiefs of Staff, and that the Standing Group's draft report to the Council would be submitted to the Military Representatives Committee for comments on October 1st. Whether the report to the Council will be put in final form in time for consideration by the Council at the next Ministerial Meeting (assuming it is held in the second week in December) depends on how long it takes the Military Representatives Committee and the Military Committee to deal with this important matter. If the report is not ready for this Ministerial Meeting, it may be impossible to incorporate its conclusions in the plans for the 1955 Annual Review.

3. Mr. Claxton and General Foulkes, when they first heard of this timetable, expressed concern lest the Standing Group's procedure for handling of the Supreme Commander's studies should prevent effective consideration by the Chiefs of Staff of non-Standing Group countries of a matter which will have an important bearing on the size and nature of future national forces. Accordingly, General Foulkes discussed the proposed procedure with the Standing Group in June, as a result of which the Standing Group agreed to modify their procedure somewhat. The Standing Group has undertaken to keep member countries informed in a general way and to invite the comments of the members of the Military Representatives Committee before firming up their final report to the Military Committee.

4. It still appears likely, however, that member governments will not have very long (about two months) to examine in detail and comment on the Standing Group report before Ministers may be asked to consider it in December.

STANDING GROUP TIMETABLE FOR "NEW LOOK" STUDY

At the Council Meeting on July 21 the Standing Group Liaison Officer reported on his recent visit to Washington. In particular, he gave a fairly detailed progress report on the so-called "new look" exercise, technically known as the "Capabilities Study".

2. Opening his remarks, he wished to make it clear that the name "Capabilities Study" had some real meaning. At the Council's request, this study was being carried out to form an estimate of what could be done by NATO with the military forces expected to be available in 1957 and taking account of the impact of unconventional weapons. Hence, it was not a special weapons study alone; it was a study of the military capabilities which NATO might expect to have when new weapons were generally available.

3. The SGLO reported that individual supreme commanders had presented their individual studies to the Standing Group on schedule on July 1st. These reports from the supreme commanders were now being studied by the Standing Group itself, and would shortly be examined individually by the Chiefs of Staff of the U.S., the U.K. and France as well. (A special technical team was visiting each of the three capitals in turn in order to explain and elaborate upon these reports; it had already visited the U.S. Chief of Staff, was believed to be in the U.K. on July 21, and would go to Paris from London.)

4. This timetable, and the proposed timetable for the future was outlined at a meeting of the MRC attended by the SLGO during his Washington visit. At that meeting it was announced that by October 1st the Standing Group expected to complete their draft of a report to be submitted by the Military Committee to the Council. This draft would be distributed to Military Representatives on that date, and revision of the draft would be carried out by a date in the second half of November. This would allow a final period of about three weeks for the Military Committee members to reach a final decision on the report which they might wish to submit to the Council, assuming a Ministerial Meeting in perhaps the second week of December. It might be that the Military Committee would have to meet during that time but as the original Standing Group draft would be available from October 1st, it was hoped that the Military Committee might reach agreement through the MRC without having themselves to assemble. With luck final report might be ready by December 1st.

5. The SGLO reminded the Council that the present target date for the Annual Review Report is November 15, although it was always possible that that date might not be met. At a later stage it would probably become necessary to decide whether the Capabilities Report and the Annual Review Report should be considered at a single Ministerial Meeting perhaps about December 10, or whether the Annual Review Report should be considered separately, possibly at an earlier date.

6. Concluding his statement, the SGLO observed that the timetable was certainly tight, but in his judgment it should be possible to meet it.

7. During discussion of this statement, the SGLO said that the Standing Group had in mind the possibility that the Council might wish to hold a joint meeting with the Standing Group during the Autumn (possibly late September or early October). Such a meeting might arise primarily in connection with the Annual Review, but if it were held, it would no doubt be possible to have some advance discussion of the Capabilities Report at the same time. The question of whether or not a meeting of the Military Committee might be necessary prior to Ministerial examination of the Report would really depend on the reactions to the Standing Group's first draft, and, therefore, the general views of national military authorities should be available some considerable time before an agreed Military Committee text was approved.

8. We intervened to ask whether the Standing Group had yet formed a view as to whether or not the Capabilities Report would have a serious effect upon the directives for the 1955 Annual Review. If it appeared likely that it would, this would have an important bearing on whether or not the Report should be considered at the same time as the 1954 Annual Review Report — assuming that directives for the 1955 Annual Review would be considered at the same time as the report on the 1954 Review.

9. In reply, the SGLO said that he had no indication of the Standing Group's views on this question, but speaking personally, he was quite sure that there would be a very considerable effect. He was unable to suggest how great the effect might be or what direction it would take. Nevertheless, it was certainly a possibility that consideration might have to be given to the convening of a second Ministerial Meeting in the Spring of 1955 at which the implications of the Capabilities Report for Annual Review purposes could be assessed, and applied to the Annual Review procedures. This question would become important if it proved impossible to take adequate account by the time of a December Ministerial Meeting of the implications for Annual Review purposes of the Capabilities Report.

10. Commenting on this question, Lord Ismay observed that in the old days it had been customary to hold meetings of a Defence Ministers' Committee; during the last two years this practice had been virtually abandoned. It might be that the problem of marrying these two reports could be turned over to a Defence Ministers' Committee. As a second point, he thought that there would be unfortunate consequences, if a decision were taken to hold a second Ministerial Meeting early in the Spring. He considered that inevitably the purpose of the meeting (in effect to take account of the use of atomic weapons in NATO planning) would become public with unfortunate consequences. We agreed with Lord Ismay's second point, that it would be desirable to avoid a second meeting in early Spring. As for his reference to a meeting of Defence Ministers, we reminded the Council that it had been decided at the Ottawa Meeting in 1951 to suppress the meetings of Defence and Finance Ministers and to have all three Ministers concerned sit as regular members of the Council. Certainly, it was still possible, and frequently desirable, for Defence Ministers to gather during Ministerial Meetings, but it was scarcely practicable to turn major problems over to such a group for final settlement as the important problems invariably are of almost equal concern to the other Ministers. Hence, the operation of marrying the two reports in question appeared to us one that must ultimately be carried out by the Council as a whole. Certainly, we would see no objection, however, to a plan whereby Defence Ministers could have a first crack at the Capabilities Report before its submission to the full Council.

JOINT MEETING WITH STANDING GROUP — PROGRESS REPORT ON CAPABILITIES STUDY

At the joint meeting of the Council and the Standing Group on September 15, General Collins of the Standing Group presented a progress report on the capabilities study. He reviewed the proposed timetable for the capabilities study as follows: Supreme Commanders' reports by July 1, distribution to National Chiefs of Staff of censored version by September 13, a Standing Group draft report based on the Supreme Commanders' reports by October 1, discussion within the Military Representatives Committee leading to a Military Committee meeting to approve a final report by December 1, and examination of this report by Ministerial meeting in mid-December. He stated that this timetable has been met up to the present and believed it would be possible to hold to it for the future.

2. Stating that he did not wish to prejudge final conclusions on the subject, he said the Standing Group were already agreed on four points relating to the study:

(a) This report should not be regarded as a final and definitive study of the subject, but rather as the first in a series of studies on these complex questions. This series of studies would probably turn out to be a continuing process extending over a period of approximately three to five years;

(b) The changes in military organization and planning which might result from this series of studies would be more evolutionary than revolutionary. Thus, there would be a gradual process of integrating new weapons, as they became available, within existing military organizations rather than the abrupt replacement of existing armaments;

(c) Nothing had so far emerged in the course of the study to provide any reason for delaying the implementation in full of the military goals stated in the 1953 annual review and those now being considered in the 1954 review;

(d) The study to date fully reinforced the conviction already held that an effective German participation in the defence of Western Europe was absolutely essential.

3. General Collins, then spoke not as chairman of the Standing Group, but as United States member, stating that the United States Chiefs of Staff felt themselves unable to comment upon this study until the matter of German participation in Western European defence was clarified. In response to a question, he said this did not mean that the United States Chiefs would not actively consider these studies but it did mean that they would withhold judgment until the German position was clarified. This was in no sense intended to impose a deadline for solution of the German question but the practical fact emerged that if the German question had not been clarified by a date somewhere between November 15 and December 1, then it would not be possible to submit an agreed Military Committee report for the consideration of ministers until later. The Netherlands and the United Kingdom delegations observed there would, in any event, be adequate material available relating to other aspects of the annual review to justify a Ministerial meeting in December.

4. In response to a question, General Collins explained that the document which would be circulated by October 1, (in accordance with the timetable), would be a draft report prepared by the Standing Group staff, and would not have the status of a Standing Group document — i.e. one approved by the Chiefs of Staff of the three Standing Group countries.

JOINT MEETING WITH STANDING GROUP — PROGRESS REPORT ON AIR DEFENCE STUDIES

General Valluy (France) gave the progress report on air defence studies. These studies arose out of a report by the Chiefs of Staff of the three Standing Group nations, together with SACEUR, prepared in 1953 which emphasized the seriousness of the problem of air defence of Europe. The NATO Council in considering the matter recognized the urgency of the problem, and asked for a definition of the steps required to meet the situation. As a consequence, SACEUR was asked to study all aspects of the air defence of the NATO European area, such a study to take account of new weapons and techniques and to cover the three years July, 1954 to July, 1957.

2. General Valluy went to some pains to explain the magnitude of the task facing SACEUR and the consequent necessity, as the study developed, of setting ahead the target date from the original one of June 1, 1954 to the present estimate that the report would not be ready for communication to the Standing Group prior to the first week of October. Although it was not possible at this date to give a summary of the study, the chapter headings have been prepared, and General Valluy commented upon them as follows.

3. The first chapter heading was "The Threat". It was clear that the aggressor had the capabilities of reducing or possibly destroying the NATO potential by surprise attack. The second chapter heading concerned the vulnerability of the area being studied. It had to be recognized that the enemy air power may envelop or penetrate the area without detection or without sufficient warning being given to NATO forces to repel the enemy. The third chapter would deal with the necessity for a comprehensive system of air defence for Europe. It was envisaged that such a system would have to function as a complete entity without regard for national frontiers. The fourth chapter would deal with the present defensive system and the recommendations required to improve it. General Valluy stated categorically that the present air defence system of Europe was poor, the main reason for this being that it was parcelled out in too many bits and pieces (fractionné). He forecast that the recommendations arising out of the study would be costly, difficult to implement, and undoubtedly contrary to some presently existing ideas of national sovereignty.

4. Although it would not be possible to present the recommendations on air defence for December next, it was hoped to provide a brief summary in the form of a progress report. The recommendations themselves were expected to be presented in the early Spring of 1955.

5. The Representative of Belgium asked whether the air defence of the European NATO area could be contemplated without German participation. The answer given by General Valluy to this question was "no", and he added that considerations relating to Germany would be included in the study. At this stage General Collins intervened to add an explanatory word on the connection between Germany and air defence. Due to the speed of present day aircraft and also the very high operating heights, the first requirement of modern air defence was a radar screen giving as early a warning as was possible. To do this, it is necessary to have your radar as far forward as was possible. With a radar screen limited to positions west of the Rhine, it would be impossible to get fighters alerted and carry out an interception in time to defend such places as Brussels, Paris, etc. Further, with enemy positions along the Rhine, all the Western Europe and U.K. channel ports would be within guided missile range. General Collins felt that the Russians would have this capability by 1957.

6. The Representative of Denmark referred to statements by General Gruenther indicating that a week's warning of attack by land could be reckoned with, and wished to know whether a warning of the same length would hold good for air attack. In reply General Collins referred to the possibility of an enemy initiating an attack solely by air. If such an attack were launched without the benefit of preliminary moves on land or of submarines, the enemy would sacrifice the full value of surprise but would gain in the effectiveness of their air attack. In this event, the only warning which the West would receive would come from the radar chain and any reports by agents in enemy territory. The lesson to be drawn from this was the importance of an adequate radar screen as far forward as was possible.

7. The Representative of Greece expressed concern at the lessons drawn from the Malta manoeuvres which indicated that Greece and Turkey could not at present be defended by air. Hence all the ports in this area would soon be lost, and he wished to know whether or not this fact, with the consequent problems of supplying these countries, concerned the Standing Group. General Collins stated fairly vigorously that they were currently analyzing these problems and looking for solutions. He then referred in some detail to the experience of the Normandy Invasion and the Pacific campaigns of World War II whereby all supplies had to be landed without the benefit of ports. This matter had been reviewed that day by the Standing Group in an effort to determine first if we had the proper organizations set up to deal with these matters and secondly whether these organizations had proper directives to accomplish their tasks.

8. The Representative of France felt that the conclusions and decisions taken on these studies should have an effect on the 1954 Annual Review and he wished to know whether the conclusions of the air study would influence decisions currently being taken on infrastructure. For example, might it be necessary to modify current views on the need for constructing advance air fields? General Collins replied that the indications to date from these studies were that of the three main elements of infrastructure, i.e. air fields, pipelines and communications, the requirements would, if anything, be increased with the advent of new weapons. More airfields would be required for dispersal against surprise atomic attack, pipelines would, if anything, have to be extended and signals would undoubtedly have to be improved. Since the present studies had been prepared by the Supreme Commanders, he felt that these Commanders would undoubtedly feed into the 1954 Annual Review, recommendations based on their conclusions from these studies.

9. The United Kingdom observed that although the timing for the submission of the air study was set back, it appeared that this study and the capabilities study would finish up about the same time. Because the two studies were so closely inter-related, this appeared to him as a fortunate circumstance. The important point to bear in mind was that the studies should be available for guidance for the 1955 Annual Review, the indications being that this would be possible.

10. The Chairman asked whether there might be some usefulness in submitting the air study in two parts, the first part to be a statement of the problem and the second, the recommendations. This might enable a portion of the report at least to come forward at an early date. General Collins undertook on behalf of the Standing Group to give full consideration to this possibility, but did not hold out any great hope that the report could be split in this manner.

CAPABILITIES PLAN ALLIED COMMAND EUROPE

Attached for your information are copies of two letters from the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff to the service Chiefs of Staff, giving summaries of the Capabilities Reports by SACEUR and SACLAN. A progress report by the Standing Group on SACEUR's Report was submitted at a secret NATO Council meeting of September 15, 1954, a record of which was sent to you under cover of our memorandum of September 23, 1954.

2. You will recall that each of the capabilities studies is intended to be a re-assessment of defence policy in the light of the changes brought about by the new nuclear weapons. It is not intended to serve in itself as an operational directive.

3. As you will note, SACEUR's Report is based on the assumptions that atomic weapons must be used in a major war by the Allies, without delay, and regardless of the Soviet use of such weapons; that the major re-adjustments in forces necessary to adapt them to atomic war conditions will be implemented; and that an effective German contribution will be available in 1957.

4. SACEUR's primary objective is to avoid losing the war quickly and to put his command in a good position to continue it successfully. While the current posture of allied forces would not permit them to survive an atomic effort of the magnitude envisioned for 1957, this situation can be corrected "with a very high degree of probability" if forces, organization and tactics are adapted to atomic warfare conditions. There is also a high degree of probability that those defence objectives essential to the carrying out of planned mobilization and reinforcement would be accomplished, and a better than even probability that forward defensive operations and a high degree of protection against sustained enemy atomic attack and attacks on shipping could be carried out.

5. SACLANT, however, complains of inadequate defensive power owing principally to the comparatively small number of units available to him. He appears to fear that a Soviet attack on ports could hamper or prevent the deployment of the Striking Fleet Atlantic, his principal atomic delivery force, and hints at the necessity of a re-allocation of forces by the Standing Group. SACLANT intends to offset these deficiencies by increasing his offensive strength in order to deny access to the sea to the Soviet forces.

6. SACEUR seems confident that the whole of the fabric of the major Soviet industry could be demolished and that Soviet control of government, military and economic resources could be nullified. Both SACEUR and SACLANT credit the Soviet with the advantages of greater strength in conventional forces and of initiative but state that NATO possesses superior atomic resources.

7. It may be that SACEUR considers that to arrive at any other conclusions than he has would be a counsel of despair, but it seems to me there are several questionable points in his thesis:

(a) SACEUR concedes to the Russians the strategic initiative, but does not seem to assign to them any military advantages resulting therefrom. If the Russians started with an effective H-bombing campaign against Europe and/or the USA I am sceptical that SACEUR would be able to keep fighting, even if his own forces were largely intact, and even if SAC was able to retaliate by H-bombing Russia.

(b) SACEUR's fundamental premise is that atomic weapons must be used in a major war by the Allies, without delay, and regardless of Soviet use of such weapons. The question in my mind is whether this concept is really valid, and whether we are not approaching the time when it should be re-examined in the light of the political realities stemming from the development of the H-bomb. Studies now being made in the Department of National Defence indicate that quite a small number of super-bombs could knock out either side in a war, and point to the possibility that no country would dare to initiate nuclear warfare unless it could be sure of destroying the enemy's capacity to retaliate in a single Pearl Harbour-type of attack. I shall be sending you a memorandum on this subject within the next week or two.⁶⁶

⁶⁶ Non retrouvé./Not located.

8. I agree with SACLANT's concern over the defence of his forces, and particularly of his base ports, but I don't follow the logic of his proposal to offset his deficiencies by an increase in offensive strength.

SACLANT CAPABILITIES STUDY 1-57 (CS 1-57)

1. One copy of SACLANT Serial 823 dated 21 June 1954,⁶⁷ SACLANT Capabilities Study 1-57 (CS 1-57)† is attached hereto.

2. A résumé has been made of this study for the purpose of setting down, in abbreviated form, what were considered to be the most important factors brought out by the Study. The résumé follows.

Problems

3. To determine the most effective pattern of military strength which SACLANT can devise within the resources which it is anticipated may be made available for his use in the year 1957.

Assumptions

4. SACLANT's basic assumptions are that combat operations in Europe will continue beyond D-60, and that replenishment of diminished European stock-piles will be mainly dependent upon safe conduct of trans-Atlantic shipping.

Forces

5. As a basis for the evaluation of the 1957 forces SACLANT has used the final 1953 Annual Review Report, CM(53)150, together with information obtained in 1954 by his travelling team, and other pertinent information available such as MDAP programmes, etc.

6. Forces which may be assigned for the defence of Island Bases and Home Territories have not been included in SACLANT's estimate.

7. The 1957 naval forces shown in the appendices are "in commission" forces.

Infrastructure

8. The estimate of infrastructure to be available to SACLANT in 1957 is based on the tabulation of facilities available in Annex P to SACLANT's EDP 1-54 and no marked variations in availabilities are to be noted.

⁶⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Not sent to E[xternal] A[ffairs]

New Weapons

9. SACLANT has considered new weapons and developments that will be available to forces assigned to him by 1957. In so doing he has had to make many assumptions in order to arrive at reasonable conclusions. He has dealt separately with weapons and developments affecting the protection of shipping and with weapons and developments used primarily in offensive operations.

10. SACLANT has also assumed that an adequate number of atomic weapons of all categories will be available for planned operations, that radiological warfare will not be employed on a large scale and that personnel will be adequately trained in the use of new equipment and weapons.

11. The conclusions which SACLANT has reached from his study of weapons available to him are as follows:

(a) Sonar, radar and ECM detection equipment in surface forces will be much improved by 1957 and will be available to SACLANT forces in limited numbers to be a factor in the anti-submarine campaign.

(b) Guided missile ships will enhance the air defence capabilities of escort forces and when combined with escort ships improved AA capabilities will have a strong effect on the air defence aspects of shipping protection. The AA defence of other surface forces will be strengthened through improved electronic control and improved weapons including guided missiles.

(c) Improvements in airborne detection equipment and methods should limit the ability of U-boats to operate on the surface or at snorkel depth.

(d) Helicopter borne sonar equipment will augment the search capabilities of surface forces.

(e) Target seeking torpedoes used by surface, sub-surface and air forces have greatly increased the "kill" probabilities of anti-submarine forces.

(f) Considerable improvement will have been made in the detecting, locating and destruction capabilities of forces earmarked for assignment to SACLANT during 1957.

(g) The striking power of carrier air forces will be improved to a considerable degree through the general use of atomic weapons and improved aircraft performance and operating capability.

(h) The offensive capabilities of submarines will be significantly increased. The striking power of these submarines will be slightly greater than at present.

(i) Improvement in the capability of maritime/patrol aircraft to detect, track and destroy conventional U-boats may be expected.

(j) Some increase in the mobility of amphibious forces is probable.

(k) The speed of replenishment at sea may be expected to improve.

Estimate of Soviet Bloc Capabilities as They Affect SACLANT in 1957

12. In general SACLANT concedes that the overall objectives of the Soviet leaders are to strengthen the existing Soviet Bloc, to weaken the non-Communist nations and to establish throughout the world a Communistic régime directed from the Kremlin. SACLANT recognizes the fact that the Soviets possess the initiative and will use it wherever possible to extend their domination by peaceful means. He also considers that the Soviet Union will be in a position, economically, to support its campaigns.

13. As far as Soviet U-boat offensive capabilities at the end of 1957 are concerned, SACLANT considers it probable that, in the initial stages of a war, the Soviets will operate their U-boats in focal areas and on coastal shipping routes where targets are likely to be plentiful and easy to locate. He considers it unlikely that U-boat operations will occur in ocean areas on a significant scale in the early stages of a war.

14. Appendices b, c, d and e show the Soviet Naval Forces Order of Battle, the Soviet Air Forces Order of Battle, Possible Deployment of U-boats on Sustained Operations and Possible Deployment of U-boats on Intensive Operations.

Estimated Effects of 1957 Capabilities of Opposing Forces

15. There is little appreciable change in SACLANT forces except for some increase in the number of escort vessels. However, Soviet increases in total forces are of the following order of magnitude; an additional 4 cruisers, 121 destroyers and 189 improved ocean patrol U-boats. While SACLANT does not consider that the increase in cruiser and destroyer forces changes the threat, he does view with concern the significant increase in U-boat strength without a balancing increase in his own escorts. He emphasizes the fact that this U-boat increase creates a need to destroy the U-boat force by offensive action against its operating and construction bases.

16. SACLANT indicates that the Soviet atomic capability will be less than that of NATO, but he states that, since the Russians possess the initiative coupled with the element of surprise, this inferiority of weapons or means of delivery will be, at least partially, compensated. He emphasizes that the NATO atomic warfare potential being greater than the Soviet will cause them to give highest priority to the prosecution of attacks against NATO atomic delivery facilities. In this respect SACLANT points out that in only a few instances is he charged with the responsibility for defending the targets which might affect him the most.

17. The Striking Fleet Atlantic, constituting SACLANT's principal atomic delivery force, can be considered to represent a high priority target for early destruction by Soviet forces. If the fleet is at sea it is considered fairly adequate defence can be provided, but if the fleet is not at sea, it is considered the Soviet may attack principal naval bases and fleet anchorages in an attempt to hamper or prevent its deployment.

18. SACLANT also considers that the Soviet, with the knowledge that NATO forces on the continent cannot exist long without substantial logistic support and reinforcement from overseas, will probably make attacks on ports and merchant shipping concentrations and associated industrial facilities.

19. The availability of atomic weapons and improved methods of delivery will considerably enhance SACLANT's capability to carry the offensive to the Soviet. However, SACLANT points out that his atomic capability is limited by the number of weapons assigned to him by the Standing Group, which number is roughly one-third of the total initial requirement generated in a separate staff study not currently available for distribution.

20. SACLANT considers, in the field of direct protection of shipping, that the considerable improvement in the effectiveness of anti-submarines equipment expected to become available to him, progressively from December 1956, will to a large degree be counteracted by the increased range, under-water speed and possible reduced noise level at high speed of the U-boat, as well as the use by the enemy of the long range target-seeking torpedo and passive ECM measures.

21. In the early stages of a war it is considered that the size of the Allied Command Atlantic escort forces will be inadequate for the protection of convoys. This situation will be further aggravated should the Soviet choose to attack convoys with atomic weapons, since this will result in the smaller composition of a convoy or greater dispersion within a convoy.

22. Due to the increased number of U-boats available to the Soviet it is estimated that his minelaying capability will be greatly enhanced. While the mining threat in the ACLANT region as such is comparatively small, the probable mining of European terminal ports constitutes a serious threat to keeping the sea lines of communication open.

23. It is not expected that Soviet anti-submarine effectiveness will keep pace with improvements in SACLANT submarine capabilities.

24. Although small in number, allied nuclear powered submarines are expected to have a very high unit effectiveness against all types of large surface vessels, as well as against U-boats.

Analysis of Operations and Operational Concept for SACLANT in 1957

25. Inasmuch as the Allies do not possess the initiative at the outset, SACLANT considers that he must be prepared to conduct a large variety of operations over a wide area. He indicates that the operations he will need to undertake to accomplish the mission assigned to him are as follows:

- (a) Offensive operations, including denial of the seas to the enemy;
- (b) control of vital sea areas and protection of the sea and air lines of communication;
- (c) defence of home territories and island bases;
- (d) support of SACEUR and other NATO and National Commands.

26. With regard to the availability and readiness of forces there will, by 1957, be no appreciable change in the size of D-day forces from the 1954 force levels.

27. SACLANT having conceded that the potential enemy will have the initiative in commencing hostilities, states it as one of his aims to deprive the enemy of this initiative for which purpose the means he will use will be offensive operations comprising the atomic offensive, carrier striking force, submarine operations, offensive mining, anti-U-boat transit offensive, hunter-killer carrier operations, offensive surface force operations and offensive operations by Maritime/Patrol aircraft.

28. If the convoy system is in operation SACLANT indicates that limited "through" surface escorts will be provided for all trans-Atlantic convoys. However, he points out that with the limited forces actually available it will be possible to provide only one "through" escort for each convoy, increasing to two after D-30.

29. An exception to the one "through" escort per convoy principle arises where a convoy would transit a threatened area throughout its entire passage. In this case the "through" escort will be made up of 2 or 3 escort vessels.

30. Where enemy air attack is expected on shipping it will be countered by SACLANT offensive operations supported by national shore-based fighter cover, carrier based fighter protection and provision of escorting forces with AA armament.

31. In the event that Soviet surface raiders might operate against Allied sea lines of communication the EASTLANT cruiser force has as its primary mission operations against enemy surface forces.

32. SACLANT considers that enemy atomic attacks on ports or on convoys in the early stages of a war might make it necessary to employ small convoys and independent sailings for all shipping in order to reduce port congestion, and the utilization of secondary ports and beaches. He concludes that this would increase the U-boat threat to shipping and would generate an increased requirement for escort forces.

33. By D-90 SACLANT considers that the strategic situation should have become fairly well established and the course of subsequent operations should be apparent. He states that he will certainly have to continue his basic naval functions.

34. The pattern of offensive operations will be affected by the production, if any, of additional new weapons, the development of existing weapons and the natural modifications to techniques arising out of their use.

Reassessment

35. A review of the above makes it fairly apparent that, although SACLANT will possess certain increased strengths resulting from technological improvements, he will continue to be plagued by the weakness resulting from deficiency in numbers, especially in aircraft carriers and escort craft. The principal sources of increased strength will be:

(a) A larger number of atomic weapons available and more effective means of delivery on target;

(b) the larger CVS type carriers as replacement for the small CVE/CVL type carriers in Hunter/Killer groups;

(c) a few nuclear powered submarines which should be effective in anti-submarine roles;

(d) improved submarine detection equipment which should increase the detection range of individual surface and air units.

36. In devising a new or improved pattern of strength, the first inclination would be toward attempting to decrease the source of weakness; but, to do this would require assignment of additional units, which could be obtained only by transfer of such units from some other command in NATO. It is not within the scope of SACLANT's study further to develop the question of re-allocation of forces within NATO, since that is properly the province of the Standing Group.

37. There is always a possibility that some radical change in concept for defence of shipping might result in an overall reduction of forces required. Many such radical concepts have been considered, including the so-called "Sanitized Sea Lane", which visualizes a single heavily defended sea lane from North America, through Bermuda and the Azores, thence to European or Mediterranean ports. This concept also includes offensive anti-submarine forces as barriers to the passage of enemy submarines from their home waters to the vicinity of the single sea lane and employment of the Striking Fleet in attacking the source of enemy U-boat strength. None of the radical concepts so far considered have produced encouraging prospects for enabling measurable reductions in defensive force requirements, even when equipment of anticipated improved performance is taken into account.

38. Since it is not within the capacity of SACLANT to increase the number of units available to him, the only area of consideration for improving his military pattern lies in the application of his increased offensive power so as to compensate for the deficiencies in defensive power.

39. In view of the foregoing, it is concluded that the most effective pattern of military strength which SACLANT can devise within the resources which may be made available for his use in the year 1957, must be predicated on early and effective application of his increased offensive strength, in the endeavour to reduce enemy opposition and thus enable his otherwise inadequate defensive forces to accomplish their assigned tasks with an acceptable degree of effectiveness.

40. Standing Group undertook to draft a report to Council concerning this capability study and it was to have been distributed to the Military Committee by the 1st of October. An opportunity for examining it by the Chiefs of Staff of the respective countries is thus provided, and Standing Group hopes that by the 15th of November, it will have received comments on the first draft. After the comments have been assimilated, a second draft will be prepared and it is possible that there may be a meeting of the Military Committee late in November, possibly in Washington, to approve the final report by 1 December in order that Ministers may have an opportunity to study it before the Ministerial meeting in Paris.

41. The draft report will be circulated when it arrives and it is requested that Service comments be completed by 1 November in order to permit discussion in Chiefs of Staff Committee.

CAPABILITIES PLAN ALLIED COMMAND EUROPE

1. In SGM-53-54 dated 12 Jan 54 the Standing Group requested the Supreme Allied Commanders to prepare as a matter of priority a capability study of the most effective pattern of military strength in each command for the year 1957. Attached hereto is:

(a) Capabilities Plan Allied Command Europe 1957 which is the formal study prepared by SACEUR;

(b) Report on Measures Essential for the Support of the Capabilities Plan, in which areas of risk disclosed by the Capabilities Plan are examined and recommendations to reduce these risks without requiring additional major units are presented;

(c) Report on Supplementary Planning Project prepared by SACEUR for the Standing Group which is actually a résumé prepared by SACEUR.

It is not practical to further condense the Capabilities Plan; however, following is a short summary of the salient points in the Plan.

2. SACEUR's study was made to determine if an adequate degree of military security could be provided for Allied Command Europe within the expected force levels, and, if so, what changes, modifications and programme readjustments would be required, other than major force increases, to achieve or better this capability. This study is not intended to serve in itself as an operational directive.

3. The plan is a capabilities plan only insofar as numbers of major force units are concerned. Specifically it is based on employment of major force units in the numbers estimated to be available in mid-1957. The plan and the assessments therein are not dependent for their execution upon the provision of additional major force units. They are dependent, however, upon the satisfactory completion of an important series of measures and corrective actions to develop the necessary state of operating effectiveness and readiness, and the capability of supporting the major forces shown.

4. The fundamental premises of the plan are that atomic weapons must be used in a major war by the Allies, without delay, and regardless of Soviet use of such weapons, that the major readjustments in forces necessary to adapt them to atomic war conditions will be implemented and that an effective German contribution will be available in 1957.

5. The first and key task of Allied Command Europe in the event of hostilities is to survive the initial period of intense atomic activity. Therefore, in planning operations for a war in 1957 primary attention and effort has been focussed on vital objectives — the things that must be done in order to avoid losing the war quickly, and to put Allied Command, Europe, in a good position to continue it successfully.

Operations incident to SACEUR's plans fall into distinct though inter-related campaigns. These are as follows:

- (a) to defend against and to destroy the Soviet air and atomic threat;
- (b) to interdict the Soviet build-up, support and lines of communication;
- (c) to arrest the Soviet land advance in Central Europe;
- (d) to protect Allied shipping, sea lines of communication and naval forces;
- (e) to arrest Soviet advances against Denmark, Norway, Italy, Greece and Turkey.

6. In carrying out the above campaigns, SACEUR will receive external support from forces which have not been specifically assigned to the European theatre. This support will come from the US Strategic Air Command, UK Bomber Command and on or about D-15 a SACLANT carrier task force with an atomic delivery capability. The successful delivery of a major proportion of the SAC effort contemplated in the event of war in mid-1957, should practically demolish the whole of the fabric of the major Soviet industry, and should deprive the Soviets of any considerable control over, or direction of, their governmental, military or economic resources. Soviet forces in being, and such material resources as were not subjected to atomic attack, would be dependent for their future support entirely upon their existing supplies.

7. As a substantial part of the total forces available to Allied Command Europe have a relatively fixed allocation, certain forces, such as post D-day reinforcements, forces based in the UK, and a large segment of the air and naval air atomic delivery forces available to SACEUR are pooled for use where required at the time, or against objectives of overall concern. Major ground force reinforcements constitute in effect a "strategic reserve".

8. In view of its purpose, this plan has been prepared in a form which facilitates the linking of forces and operations to carefully delimited objectives, and not in a form directly capable of implementation.

9. The current posture of Allied forces (organization, tactics, deployment, etc) would not permit them to survive an atomic effort of the magnitude envisioned for 1957. This condition must be corrected. The introduction of atomic and thermonuclear weapons in quantity on both Soviet and Allied sides necessitates major revisions in the operational posture of Allied forces — their tactics, force dispositions and organization. An initial determination of such a revised posture, prepared for use as a basis for the planning of the various campaign plans is set forth in Enclosure J to the Capabilities Plan and detailed proposals for revised tactics and organization are also included.

10. The plan concludes that the Soviet is credited with the advantage of greater conventional strength and initiative, but that SACEUR possesses superior atomic resources. Furthermore, because SACEUR will be on the defensive initially, he can choose and prepare the site of the initial battle. The outcome may depend upon the relative progress made by both sides in adapting forces, organization and tactics to atomic warfare conditions. This study further concludes that if Allied forces are readjusted for Atomic war generally as recommended, the Soviet advantage of the initiative can be offset, his strength concentrations — should he keep them — would become atomic targets and SACEUR could:

(a) with a very high degree of probability accomplish those defensive objectives essential to avoid defeat;

(b) with a high degree of probability, accomplish those defence objectives essential to the carrying out of planned mobilization and reinforcement; and

(c) with better than even probability undertake and successfully carry out forward defensive operations and a high degree of protection against sustained enemy atomic attack and attacks on shipping.

11. Standing Group undertook to draft a report to Council concerning this capability study and it was to have been distributed to the Military Committee by the 1st of October. An opportunity for examining it by the Chiefs of Staff of the respective countries is thus provided, and Standing Group hopes that by the 15th of November, it will have received comments on the first draft. After the comments have been assimilated a second draft will be prepared and it is possible that there may be a meeting of Military Committee late in November, possibly in Washington, to approve the final report by 1 December in order that Ministers may have an opportunity to study it before the ministerial meeting in Paris.

12. The draft report will be circulated when it arrives and it is requested that service comments be completed by 1 November in order to permit discussion in Chiefs of Staff Committee. In this connection Appendices I to L of SACEUR's capabilities study will be of particular interest.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING, DECEMBER 1954:
MILITARY CAPABILITIES STUDY

You will see from the attached telegrams No. 1034 and 1037 of November 24, from our NATO Delegation in Paris, that the important question has been raised of what action the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting will be asked to take on the report the Military Committee is to submit on the most effective pattern of military strength for the next few years. This is the report based on the Supreme Commanders' capabilities studies on the effect of new weapons.

2. You will note that the present understanding in Paris is apparently that the Ministerial Meeting will be asked to approve the Military Committee's report in principle as a basis of further military planning (i.e., to approve the planning assumption that atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons will be used by the NATO forces in any future war regardless of whether or not they are used by the enemy).

3. We have not yet seen the Military Committee's report, but I have written to the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, asking for copies of this and of any report he may have prepared on the recent Military Committee meeting that he attended.

4. A decision, even in principle, to use atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons in any future war, regardless of whether or not they are used by the enemy, has of course the gravest implications and it could be argued that it is premature for member governments to take such a step before they have fully considered these implications. All of which adds urgency to the inter-departmental study which we have proposed.⁶⁸

THE NEW LOOK

Lord Ismay today held one of his monthly luncheons for the permanent representatives. This was followed by a discussion of the standing group paper on the capabilities study or "the new look." This document has been approved by the Military Committee this week and is coming up for the consideration of the Ministerial Council on December 17.

2. The discussion was provoked by a statement of the standing group liaison officer at this morning's meeting of the Council when he said that the Ministerial Council would be expected to give their approval to the document which had just been passed by the Military Committee. There was a good deal of criticism that in such a short space of time governments would have to make up their minds on the document of such major importance, carrying far-reaching political, economic and financial implications. This led to a rather acrimonious discussion between representatives of standing group and non-standing group countries. The former argued that the document had been in the hands of governments for some time since it had been given to the military representatives at the beginning of October. The representatives of the non-standing group countries argued that, so far as they were aware, the document had not been considered by governments in the respective capitals since it had been treated in the first instance merely as a document for consideration by the Military Committee and not for reference to governments until that body had approved it.

3. Martin, the Acting United States Permanent Representative, showed himself to be the most familiar with the document in question and he explained that the action recommended to be taken by the Ministerial Council had been carefully thought out with a view to making it possible for governments to approve the document at the December meeting. He himself had taken part in the consultation with the President, at which time it had been pointed out to the President that, while the document carried far-reaching financial implications, all that could be asked of governments initially was for them to give their approval that military planning should proceed on the basis of the document. On the political question that was worrying the Permanent Representatives, what would be asked of Ministers would be to approve that military planning should proceed on the basis that atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons may be used in the future war. It was felt that this was as far as it was necessary to go at this time since the actual decision, as whether or not to use the weapons, could only be taken on the outbreak of hostilities in the light of the circumstances prevailing at that time. This explanation by Martin served to calm down the discussion which had become somewhat heated. The general consensus of view, however, was that governments should have been given more time to consider the document, even though domestic procedures may have been at fault in that governments did not take up the matter as soon as the document had been referred to Chiefs of Staff.

4. At the end of the meeting it was agreed that the whole question would be discussed again by the Permanent Representatives after they individually had had the opportunity of studying the document. Copies are now being sent from Washington and are expected in Paris at the beginning of next week. Martin again intervened to say that what was important was not so much what we did, but what the Russians thought we would do and, therefore, it was all important that there should be no disagreement when the document was presented to the Ministerial Council for approval. For this reason he considered it very wise that the Permanent Representatives should consider the matter again in a restricted meeting without advisers. I should appreciate learning if the Minister has misgivings about the recommendations included in the document for action by the Ministerial Council at its December meeting.

AGENDA FOR MINISTERIAL MEETING

At its meeting on November 24 the Council re-examined document C-M(54)102, the report from the agenda working group. The draft agenda annexed to that document was approved, except for the deletion for the time being of item 4. Supplementing the information which we have reported earlier, the SGLO said that the standing group now wished to recommend that this paper should be dealt with by the Permanent Council as a routine item and that it would not be necessary to discuss it at the joint meeting of the Permanent Council and the Military Committee. Permanent Representatives were prepared to agree that this course might ultimately be satisfactory, but the heading assigned to the subject has given rise to a good deal of interest in national capitals. For this reason the subject could not at present be regarded as routine. Until the paper was available, at which time it might become clear that it raised no major questions, it was agreed to leave it on the agenda for the joint meeting on December 15.

2. A most interesting discussion arose in connection with item 5 of the draft agenda. It was the general impression that the Council should consider prior to the ministerial meeting what action Ministers might be expected to take on the capabilities report, and what follow-up action might subsequently be required. Summing up the discussion, Ismay observed that Ministers could scarcely be expected to do more than approve the document in principle as a basis for further planning studies. This led the Danish representative to suggest that possible political and constitutional difficulties might be avoided if a formula could be worked out that would avoid "approval" of the document by Ministers. As we have not seen the text, the significance of this remark was not entirely clear to us during the meeting. Subsequently, the Danish representative informed us that he had seen the text and that it calls on governments to approve a policy under which the NATO military authorities would be authorized to use nuclear weapons even prior to any use of them by the prospective enemy. If this is indeed the case, we would imagine that a number of governments might have difficulty at the present time in "approving" the document.

3. It was agreed that the SGLO would do everything in his power to arrange for early distribution of the text to delegations, and that when it was available the Council would reconsider the question. For our part we should be grateful if you could arrange to send us the text as soon as possible, in case there are delays in obtaining its release to the Council through the standing group. In addition, the problem which is, rightly or wrongly, foreseen by the Danish representative would clearly be an important one and we should be grateful if you would let us know whether it is in fact likely to arise at the forthcoming ministerial meeting. If so, it would be of assistance to receive an early indication of your general approach.

1. Enclosed, herewith, is a report of the discussions at the Military Committee meeting held in Washington on 22 Nov 54.

2. Your attention is drawn particularly to the discussion of the paper on "The Most Effective Pattern of Military Strength for the Next Few Years", (M.C. 48) which is attached, as this paper will be required to be approved by Ministers at the next Ministerial meeting of the Council. It will be noted that this paper has been considerably modified from the original draft and now Ministers will not be asked to approve the use of mass destruction weapons, but rather to approve the authorization for NATO military authorities to plan and make preparations on the assumption that atomic and thermonuclear weapons will be used in defence from the outset.

3. I am enclosing a second copy of the report and M.C. 48 (FINAL), as it is suggested you may wish to forward these to your colleague, Mr. Pearson.

The following items were discussed in the order as shown:

1. The Most Effective Pattern of Military Strength for the Next Few Years (M.C. 48).

1. THE MOST EFFECTIVE PATTERN OF MILITARY STRENGTH FOR THE NEXT FEW YEARS (M.C. 48)

General Guillaume, Chairman of the Military Committee, in presenting this paper for discussion, stated that the paper was based on an additional narrative by the Standing Group on the Capabilities Studies of the Supreme Commanders relative to the overall problems of such studies. The paper, being based on these studies, was designed to reflect the problem of the nature of a future conflict and the method to be adopted in combatting it; and therefore was valuable as it provided a common basis for comments on the integrated studies of the Supreme Commanders. It was the intention to continue such studies and this was the first report which the Military Committee had been asked to approve and send to the Council.

The main discussion of the paper was opened by Admiral Sir R. McGrigor, the United Kingdom Representative, who stated that he was concerned with the reference to priority of the provision of forces in the initial phase, with a subsequent build-up of forces being given a lower priority, as contained in para. 34. He felt that this needed clarification in view of the statement in para. 9 that "it cannot safely be assumed that hostilities will terminate at the end of the initial phase and our forces must be prepared to conduct subsequent operations of much longer duration". Because of this he felt that in the conclusions we should make clear what it meant by such priority. He was concerned with placing too much emphasis on the initial phase being the determinate factor as he felt sure the enemy did not consider he would be defeated in the initial phase and would attempt to isolate our land forces by attacks on ports and communications. He felt that the battle for the control of sea communications (as referred to in para. 26), including the transfer of personnel and war material from ships to ports, would start immediately on the outbreak of a war. In view of this he considered that, on the outbreak of war, the naval forces "in being" referred to in this paragraph should have the same priority as all other forces in the initial phase.

General Hasselman, the Representative of the Netherlands, stated that he felt too much emphasis was being placed in the conclusions on the possibility that the enemy might capitulate after the initial phase. In his opinion it was just as likely that the enemy might not capitulate after the initial phase, and as the Council would have to approve the conclusions, he felt that this particular conclusion might be interpreted as assuming that the most likely outcome of the initial period would be the capitulation of the enemy, and this could then tend to a decrease in the defence effort. In view of this, he proposed a modification of this aspect of the conclusions, which was agreed.

Admiral Wright, the Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic, stated that, while he was in complete agreement with the conclusions and the recommendations in this paper in that we needed the capability of tolerating an atomic attack by the enemy and also the capability of retaliating with an atomic attack of our own, he felt there was a grave danger if it became assumed that the next war would be a short one and this assumption was used as a basis for future planning. The Soviet Union had a large Navy, in fact larger than all the Allied Navies, and he considered that they proposed to use it; and therefore they were not planning on a short war. At the outset he was certain that the Soviet Navy would not be concentrated in their ports, where they would be subject to atomic attacks, but would be dispersed in other places. He felt therefore that the future pattern of NATO military strength needed to include adequate provision for the controlling of the seas. His concern therefore on this paper was that there appeared to be an over-estimation of the achievement of atomic weapons in the initial phase, which would not allow us to have sufficient forces for the second phase. In this connection he agreed fully with the remarks of Admiral McGrigor.

General Foulkes, the Canadian Representative, stated that he was somewhat concerned with the trend of this discussion. It appeared to him that most of the discussion was emphasizing the second phase of the battle and the importance of making sure that we would be in a position to meet that phase. However it would appear from the report of the Standing Group that the greatest danger to NATO was that we might get defeated in the first stage. He considered that one of the greatest difficulties which the military would have to face when taking this paper to the political authorities would be to convince them of the necessary measures to be taken to ensure that we can win, or at least not lose, the initial phase, because the steps which would have to be taken to ensure this are difficult for democracies to accept. One of these steps was the alerts measures, which are now under study by national governments, and these are the measures which must be taken in order that we may move from a peace to a war footing immediately. He felt that in a war of attrition the West could win, and therefore the only way in which the Soviet Union would have an opportunity of defeating NATO would be by a sudden blow. However, as the initiative will always rest with the Soviet Union, it will be very difficult for the military to plan to meet the initial onslaught unless sufficient priority is given to these measures to ensure survival. He considered that in presenting our plans to the political authorities, we would find that the most difficult part would be in getting agreement to the adoption of the measures necessary to place us in a position to withstand the first destructive blow. Therefore, although he appreciated that there were further complications in what we might have to do if the enemy did not capitulate after the first phase, he considered that there was a danger that if we were not successful in obtaining political clearance to take the measures necessary in dealing with the initial phase, we might be the ones who would have to capitulate after the first phase.

He would like, therefore, to emphasize that it was the preparation for meeting the initial onslaught, which might come without warning, which was the most important problem and the one on which emphasis should be placed.

Admiral Radford, who represented the United States, stated that he fully subscribed to the views of General Foulkes.

Air Marshal Dawson, representing the Supreme Allied Commander Europe, and Admiral Wright, the Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic, assured the Committee that there was no fear of conflict developing between SACEUR and SACLANC regarding the priority of their roles or the build-up of their forces. SACEUR fully realized the importance of sea communications at the outset and the need for further studies in this sphere.

General Guillaume, the Chairman of the Military Committee, in concluding discussion of the paper, stated that he felt that the main essence of the discussion had been that we must be able to withstand the shock of the enemy in the initial phase and if possible win the war in that phase, but if we had any doubts about this, we must also, at the same time, prepare for the second phase.

The paper, with certain minor amendments, was then approved by the Military Committee for despatch to the Council.

CAPABILITIES STUDY

After the council meeting today I had a talk with Steel and Hughes about the possibility of arranging an informal meeting of the ABC countries on the afternoon of Thursday, December 16, to consider a draft resolution on the capabilities study. Hughes said that he expected Dulles and his party to arrive on December 15 and I said that our party would probably be arriving on December 14. Steel is going to try to get the United Kingdom party to arrive in the morning of December 16, but in any event they would arrive early in the afternoon.

2. Afterwards Steel told me that the United Kingdom had a draft which was awaiting Cabinet approval as soon as they could get over "celebrating the Old Man's [Churchill's] birthday". It was intended to submit this draft both to the United States and Canadian Governments, but since agreement will be difficult to achieve by telegram the United Kingdom had concluded that it would be best to try to arrange a meeting of the three ABC countries and then show an agreed text to the French.

3. Steel has promised to keep me informed about the time and place of the meeting.

4. It is obvious from what he said that the United Kingdom Government is very worried about the possible political repercussions of the capabilities study and they are doing their best to see that a resolution is drafted which will cause the minimum difficulty not only in the United Kingdom but also in the Scandinavian and other countries including Canada.

FUTURE NATO DEFENCE PLANNING

As you know, we have just received from National Defence one copy of a report by the Military Committee (M.C. 48 (Final) of November 22). This report, which is based on the studies on military capabilities in the light of new weapons which the NATO Supreme Commanders have been carrying out for the past year, is to be submitted to the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Council under Item V of the agenda. It is intended to be only the first of a series of studies which the NATO military authorities intend to make over the next few years with a view to reassessing the most effective pattern of NATO military strength.

2. In this report the Military Committee is asking the Council to approve certain conclusions and to approve in principle certain measures as being most necessary to adapt NATO forces for a future major war. These conclusions and measures are intended to serve as a basis for further military planning. The summary of the Military Committee's report is contained in Annex A.

3. You will note that, if the Council approves the Military Committee's recommendations, it will be formally authorizing the NATO military authorities to plan and make preparations on the assumption that atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons will be used by the NATO forces from the outset in any future major war.

4. We have also received from National Defence a brief prepared on this subject for the Canadian Delegation to the next Military Committee meeting, a copy of which is attached. The conclusion of this brief is that M.C. 48 (Final) is "in a form which, as far as Canada is concerned, can be accepted in its entirety." This conclusion is based on the following reasoning:

(a) that the Ministerial Meeting will not be asked to approve the actual use of mass destruction weapons, but rather to approve giving the military authorities authorization to plan and make preparations on the assumption that such weapons will be used;

(b) that the Council approved at the December 1952 Ministerial Meeting the paper on strategic guidance which envisaged the carrying out of strategic bombing promptly by all means possible and with all types of weapons without exception;

(c) that atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons could in any case be used by the United States, on the direction of the President, irrespective of any NATO decision.

5. The question of what action the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting should take on the Military Committee's report has been discussed in a restricted session by the Permanent Council in Paris and several of the Permanent Representatives have expressed misgivings about the recommendations to be submitted to the Ministerial Meeting (see telegrams 1034 and 1037 from our NATO Delegation and our Memorandum for the Minister of November 26). Our Delegation has asked for an indication of our general approach in preparation for a further discussion. The Minister noted on our Memorandum under reference his view that "A decision of this importance should not be thrown at the NATO Council so suddenly."

6. Apart from the question of whether or not a prior decision to use atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons from the outset in any future war is desirable, it has the gravest implications for Canada and for NATO and should not be taken without the most serious consideration by governments. There is not sufficient time between now and the Ministerial Meeting to give the consideration required. It would therefore seem desirable that the Council should not approve at this Ministerial Meeting the Military Committee's conclusions, or at least the conclusion contained in paragraph 37 of M.C. 48 (Final), but should only note them pending further study by governments. If necessary, the Council could perhaps agree that further military studies could proceed for the time being on the assumption that nuclear weapons would be used, provided this did not pre-judge the final decision by governments.

7. It is true that the North Atlantic Council in 1952 approved a paper on strategic guidance which assumed the use of atomic weapons and which has not been revised since. However, that approval was given under very different circumstances than those obtaining today. (It was before the development of tactical atomic weapons or thermo-nuclear weapons, for example.) It recognized an already known fact — that the United States SAC would retaliate with atomic bombs against any overt Soviet aggression — and it did not envisage the actual issuing of atomic weapons to NATO forces. Indeed, the studies on which the present Military Committee report has been based, which were submitted to the Standing Group last July 1, were prepared before the factors of "fall-out" became known. Formal approval by the Council of the Military Committee's recommendations in present circumstances would therefore, in effect, constitute a new decision. Moreover, the purpose of the present studies, of which this Military Committee report forms part, is to reassess the previously accepted bases of NATO defence planning, and the decision that NATO should use mass destruction weapons from the outset is surely one of the most important conclusions that could come from this reassessment.

8. In the light of these factors, I would recommend that Cabinet should if possible consider this matter before the Ministerial Meeting, or at least that it should be discussed with the Prime Minister before the departure of the Canadian Delegation.

BENJAMIN ROGERS

[PIÈCE JOINTE 1/ENCLOSURE 1]

TOP SECRET

SUMMARY OF M.C. 48 (FINAL)

The argumentation of the Military Committee's report runs as follows:

(a) NATO's hope to deter Soviet aggression lies in convincing the Soviet Union that they cannot quickly overrun Europe and that they would be subjected at the outset of any aggression to a devastating counter-attack employing atomic weapons.

(b) It is assumed that, if this deterrent fails, Soviet aggression will take the form of a surprise atomic attack aimed at the sudden destruction of NATO's atomic capability.

(c) NATO's chief, and almost its only, defence against Soviet atomic attack will be an immediate and intensive atomic counter-attack mainly against the Soviet means of delivery.

(d) There is only a remote possibility that the Soviet Union would attempt to take advantage of their preponderance in land and tactical air forces to overrun Europe without employing atomic weapons. If they did, however, it is considered that NATO would be unable to stop them without using atomic weapons both strategically and tactically immediately ("Any delay in their use — even measured in hours — could be fatal", according to the Military Committee).

(e) It is assumed that the NATO powers have — and will retain for "the next few years" — sufficient superiority in atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons, and in the ability to deliver them, to give NATO the major advantage in the initial phase of intensive atomic exchange and to provide a residual supply for use in the subsequent phase of operations.

(f) Offensive measures against Soviet atomic attack are stressed and the only defensive measures envisaged are those (such as the establishment of a satisfactory alert system, the improvement of intelligence and communications and dispersal) designed to protect the strategic air force and the atomic striking forces in Europe.

The most important of the conclusions, which the Military Committee recommends that the North Atlantic Council approve, are:

(a) that it is militarily essential that NATO forces should be able to use atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons in their defence and that the NATO military authorities should be authorized to plan and make preparations on the assumption that atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons will be used in defence from the outset;⁶⁹

⁶⁹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
This is para. 37.

(b) that, should war occur, the best defence against atomic attack lies in the ability of the Allied nations to reduce the threat at the source by immediate and intensive atomic counter-attack; and

(c) that priority in defence planning should be given to the provision of "forces in being", having "an integrated atomic capability" and supported by atomic delivery forces, which will be able to contribute effectively to success in the "initial phase" of intensive atomic exchange of any future major war.

The measures recommended as being most necessary to increase the deterrent and defensive value of NATO forces are:

(a) the provision of "an integrated atomic capability" (i.e., the ability to integrate the delivery of atomic weapons with the delivery of present type weapons);

(b) the provision of a fully effective alert system;

(c) steps to give forces the maximum possible warning of attack;

(d) the allocation of high priority to "forces in being";

(e) dispersal and redeployment measures to enable NATO forces to survive atomic attack.

[Ottawa], November 30, 1954

BRIEF ON M.C. 48 (FINAL) — THE MOST EFFECTIVE PATTERN OF MILITARY STRENGTH FOR THE NEXT FEW YEARS

1. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff, after reviewing this paper along with the capabilities studies of the Supreme Commanders, considered that the paper was suitable for presentation to the North Atlantic Council as a first report on this problem noting, however, that further comprehensive studies will be needed from time to time to cover the later years ahead.

2. When this paper was approved at the Military Committee meeting held in Washington on 22 November, 1954, the main discussion revolved around the reference to priority of the provision of forces in the initial stage with the subsequent build up of forces being given a lower priority; particularly with reference to the Naval forces in being which both the United Kingdom representative and SACLANT felt should be given equal priority with those in the initial phase. Apart from this, discussion centred on the emphasis that we must be able to withstand the shock of the enemy attack in the initial phase and not lose the war in that phase. This would include the difficult task of obtaining from the political authorities adoption of the measures necessary to place us in a position to withstand the first destructive blow which would include approval of those measures which must be taken in order that we can move from a peace to a war footing immediately. However, as there is no assurance that all the enemy forces will capitulate after the initial phase, we must make whatever preparation is possible for the second phase which will not interfere with the preparation and build up necessary for the first phase.

3. It will be noted that this paper, M.C. 48 (Final), has been considerably modified from the original draft and that now Ministers at the Ministerial meeting will not be asked to approve the use of mass destruction weapons but rather to approve giving the military authorities authorization to plan and make preparations on the assumption that atomic and thermonuclear weapons will be used in defence from the outset. In view of this, it is considered that this paper is in a form which, as far as Canada is concerned, can be accepted in its entirety.

4. As far as the authority for the use of mass destruction weapons is concerned, it is felt that any discussion on this aspect would be academic for the following reasons:

(a) It will be recalled that in a North Atlantic Council meeting on 3 December, 1952, as referred to in Council Document CR(52)31, the Council approved "The Strategic Concept for the Defence of the North Atlantic Treaty Area (M.C. 3/5 (Final))" which, in particular, stated in paragraph 7 the following:

"7. Overall defence plans must provide in advance of war emergency, specifically for the following basic undertakings in furtherance of the common objective to defend the North Atlantic Area. The successful conduct of these undertakings should be assured by close coordination of military action as set forth in overall plans.

(a) Insure the ability to carry out strategic bombing promptly by all means possible with all types of weapons, without exception. This is primarily a U.S. responsibility assisted as practicable by other nations.

(b) Arrest and counter as soon as practicable the enemy offensives against North Atlantic Treaty powers by all means available, including air, naval, land and psychological operations. Initially, the hard core of ground forces will come from the European nations. Other nations will give aid with the least possible delay and in accordance with overall plans."

From this it is considered that the Council have already authorized the military authorities to use all weapons available.

(b) With regard to this particular paper, M.C. 48, it will be recalled that this report was written on the express direction of the North Atlantic Council requesting the Military Committee to initiate a reassessment of the most effective pattern of the military strength for the next few years within the resources which it is anticipated may be made available, taking into account the use of new weapons and techniques referred to in North Atlantic Council resolution of 23 February, 1952, Document D9-D/20.

(c) It will be appreciated that for some time to come the bulk of atomic and thermonuclear weapons will be provided by the United States and that the decision to use them rests with the President. Therefore such weapons could be used by the United States on the direction of the President, irrespective of any NATO decision, as long as the operational use of such weapons is initiated solely from U.S. bases.

FUTURE NATO DEFENCE PLANNING IN LIGHT OF THE EFFECT OF
NEW WEAPONS

We have now been approached by the United Kingdom High Commissioner's Office here with respect to the Military Committee's report on future NATO defence planning, which is on the agenda for the forthcoming NATO Ministerial Meeting. Our tentative views are contained in our immediately following telegram.

2. Following is the text of the C.R.O. telegram to Earnscliffe. Begins:

Ministers have been considering the difficult question of the authority for Saceur to use nuclear weapons which will arise at the forthcoming NATO Ministerial meeting.

2. Problem arises in the following way. In the report by the Military Committee (MC 48 (final)) it is stated that Saceur's ability successfully to adopt a forward defence of Europe, depends on the NATO forces being able to use atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons in their defence from the outset of a new war. Paragraph 37 of this paper concludes that NATO military authorities should be authorised to plan and to make preparations on this assumption, and paragraph 40 (a) recommends that the North Atlantic Council "approve the above conclusions noting the significance of" this assumption.

3. We do not question the military necessity for Saceur to plan on this basis. In its present form, however, the proposed recommendation removes from member governments of the North Atlantic Council the responsibility to take final decisions about the use of these weapons. Moreover, under the system of alerts set out in SG 129/4 (revised final) of May 8th, 1953 (paragraph 10, enclosure (a)) it would be possible for Saceur to take action without reference to governments in the event of an armed aggression taking place in the North Atlantic Treaty area. It would therefore be possible for Saceur to begin a thermo-nuclear war in certain eventualities without reference to governments.

4. We are sure that public opinion in the west would not, in general, be willing to accept this situation. Nor can member governments abdicate their responsibility on so grave an issue as this. The French Ambassador called on Foreign Secretary yesterday, December 2nd, and left with him a memorandum expressing the opposition of the French Government to leaving these absolute powers in the hands of Saceur, and suggesting that this problem should first be discussed with the members of the Standing Group (see Foreign Secretary's despatch 837 to Paris, copy of which follows by bag).

5. Our present thought is that the best solution would be for the Ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Council to adopt a resolution which would both leave it free to Saceur to continue to plan in accordance with military necessity, and, at the same time, reserve to member governments the ultimate responsibility to take final decisions. The following draft resolution expresses what we have in mind: "The North Atlantic Council accept as a basis for military planning, that the measures in the enclosure to the report are necessary to adapt our military forces for a future major war, but emphasise that except in the event of a prior atomic or thermo-nuclear attack by an aggressor it must remain the ultimate responsibility of member governments to take final decisions, particularly in regard to the use of atomic or thermo-nuclear weapons."

6. This formula has the advantage that if Saceur is attacked with atomic or thermo-nuclear weapons, he can retaliate at once with similar weapons, but that, in all other cases, the decision to use these weapons rests with governments.

7. If this resolution were to be adopted by the Council, it would, I think, be also desirable for the elaborate system of alerts contained in SG 129/4 (revised final) to be re-examined in order to see whether it is appropriate to the conditions of thermo-nuclear war, but this exercise could be undertaken by the experts after the meeting of the Council.

8. United Kingdom Ambassador has been instructed to approach Mr. Dulles urgently and enquire whether he agrees with our thought that a resolution on the lines set out above would be the best way of resolving our difficulties. Please make similar approach to Canadian authorities.

9. As regards procedure, Foreign Secretary told the French Ambassador yesterday, December 2nd, that he did not think it likely that the NATO powers would be willing to hand over the problem to the Standing Group. Please say that personally we would rather suggest that as soon as our two governments, together with the United States Government whom we are also approaching, have reached agreement we should try to obtain the agreement also of the French Government and thereafter of the other NATO governments.

10. Foreign Secretary has already proposed to Mr. Dulles that they might discuss this further in Paris on the afternoon of December 16th, and we would hope that Mr. Pearson would be ready to join them. It will, however, be necessary to give the French a preliminary reply next week. We therefore hope that the Canadian Government will be able to send us their views without delay. Ends. Message Ends.

FUTURE NATO DEFENCE PLANNING IN LIGHT OF THE EFFECT OF

The United Kingdom views have been discussed with the Minister (who is in New York) whose views are as follows:

(a) He concurs in the approach expressed in the proposed United Kingdom resolution given in C.R.O. Telegram No. 1362 of December 4.⁷⁰

(b) He will be glad to meet Mr. Eden and Mr. Dulles before the Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Council to discuss this matter. He plans to arrive in Paris on the morning of December 15.

(c) It is of the utmost importance to avoid controversy and debate at the Ministerial Meeting, word of which would be almost sure to leak to the public.

(d) If agreement cannot be reached in advance of the Ministerial Meeting on a resolution along the lines of the United Kingdom draft, it would be advisable for the Council merely to note the Military Committee's report and to request the NATO military authorities to pursue their present studies. This would enable member governments to give further consideration to the matter and to take more positive action either in the Permanent Council or at the subsequent Ministerial Meeting. Meanwhile, the NATO military authorities could continue to plan in accordance with the terms of the strategic guidance adopted in 1952 and still in force.

2. The above have been given to Earnscliffe as our preliminary views, subject to confirmation or amendment after discussion with the other Ministers concerned.

3. The United Kingdom has made a similar approach in Washington and we understand Mr. Dulles to have given as his preliminary view that this matter should be approached as far as possible on an informal basis by discussion among the powers principally concerned.

FUTURE NATO DEFENCE PLANNING IN LIGHT OF THE EFFECT
OF NEW WEAPONS

On the assumption that the question raised by the report of the NATO Military Committee to the Council would be discussed in Cabinet we prepared a draft memorandum which it was thought you might wish to pass around to your colleagues at the Cabinet meeting. Subsequently we learned that the Prime Minister had decided that, instead of having a discussion in full Cabinet, he would prefer to discuss it with you and Mr. Campney. I attach three copies of the draft memorandum. You might wish to give copies to the Prime Minister and Mr. Campney when you are discussing the matter with them; or you may prefer simply to regard the draft memorandum as a brief.

2. I also attach three copies of Top Secret Telegram No. 1097 of December 6 from the NATO Delegation. This contains an account of a briefing given the Council by General Gruenther. The telegram states very clearly the attitude of the military on the very important question whether they should make their plans and preparations on the assumption that atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons will be used by the NATO forces from the outset in any future major war. It does not, however, introduce any new considerations.

3. One of the very difficult problems that has not yet been resolved in NATO is the question of what political decision, if any, is required before the NATO forces can engage in hostilities (except to defend themselves). Approval of the Military Committee's report would not, in express terms, prejudice this question. There can be no doubt, however, that it would strengthen the belief of the military that they had been given authority to use nuclear weapons immediately on the outbreak of war. I believe that urgent consideration should be given to the whole problem, but that it is of such crucial importance that it should not be decided hastily in the fortnight preceding the Ministerial meeting.

4. We have given Earncliffe informally your tentative views, emphasizing that you had not had an opportunity of discussing them with your colleagues. We said that we would give them considered views later. The British Embassy in Washington reports that the State Department appears to accept the necessity of a Council resolution — (presumably, something along the lines of the United Kingdom draft) — but may come up with an alternative draft.

FUTURE NATO DEFENCE PLANNING IN LIGHT OF THE EFFECT
OF NEW WEAPONS

One of the items on the agenda of the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Council is a report by the Military Committee on "The Most Effective Pattern of Military Strength for the Next Few Years" (Document M.C. 48 (Final) of November 22). A summary of the contents of this document is annexed.⁷¹ This report, which is based on the studies on military capabilities in the light of the new weapons which the NATO Supreme Commanders have been carrying out for the past year, is intended to be only the first of a series of studies which the NATO military authorities are making over the next few years with a view to reassessing the basis of NATO defence planning. The Military Committee's report raises the difficult question of the NATO Supreme Commanders' authority to use nuclear weapons. If the Council approves the Military Committee's recommendations it will be formally authorizing the NATO military authorities "to plan and to make preparations on the assumption that atomic and thermonuclear weapons will be used by the NATO forces from the outset in any future major war".

2. The question of what action the NATO Ministerial Meeting should take on the Military Committee's report has been discussed in a restricted session by the Permanent Council in Paris and several of the permanent representatives have expressed misgivings that governments should have to make up their minds in such a short space of time on recommendations having such far-reaching political, military and financial implications.

3. Misgivings have also been expressed by the United Kingdom in approaches made to the United States and ourselves in the last few days. The United Kingdom Government are afraid that the proposed recommendation will remove from NATO Governments the responsibility of taking final decisions about the use of nuclear weapons and, under the system of alerts now being worked out, would enable SACEUR to begin a thermonuclear war in certain eventualities without reference to governments. The United Kingdom have, therefore, suggested that the best solution would be for the Ministerial Meeting to adopt a resolution which would leave SACEUR free to continue to plan in accordance with military necessity but would at the same time reserve to member governments the ultimate responsibility to take final decisions. Sir Anthony Eden has proposed that Mr. Dulles and I might discuss this matter in Paris on the afternoon of December 16 (the day before the Ministerial Meeting begins). He has in mind the following draft resolution:

"The North Atlantic Council accept as a basis for military planning that the measures in the enclosure to the report are necessary to adapt our military forces for a future major war, but emphasizes that, except in the event of a prior atomic or thermonuclear attack by an aggressor, it must remain the ultimate responsibility of member governments to take final decisions, particularly in regard to the use of atomic or thermonuclear weapons”.

4. I understand that Mr. Dulles, in reply to this approach, agreed that political control in this matter must be assured but said he would be opposed to any suggestion to set up any mechanism within the NATO Council for giving such authority to SACEUR. His preliminary view was that this matter should be approached as far as possible on an informal basis by discussion among the powers principally concerned.

5. I also understand that the French Government have approached both the United Kingdom and United States Governments expressing opposition to the delegation of powers of final decision in this field to SACEUR.

6. It is true that the North Atlantic Council in 1952 approved a paper on strategic guidance which assumed the use of atomic weapons and which has not been revised since. However that approval was given under far different circumstances than those obtaining today (viz. before the development of tactical atomic weapons or thermonuclear weapons). It recognized the already known fact, that the United States Strategic Air Command would retaliate with atomic bombs against any overt Soviet aggression, and it did not envisage the actual issuing of atomic weapons to NATO forces in Europe. Indeed, the studies on which the present Military Committee's report has been based, which were submitted to the Standing Group last July 1, were prepared before the facts of “fall out” became known. Formal approval by the Council of the Military Committee's recommendations in present circumstances would, therefore, in effect constitute a new decision. Moreover, the purpose of the present studies, of which this Military Committee report forms part, is to re-assess the previously accepted bases of NATO defence planning and the decision that NATO should use mass destruction weapons from the outset is one of the most important conclusions that can come from this re-assessment.

7. It is my own view that a decision of this importance should not be taken by member governments without more considered study than there is time for between now and the Ministerial Meeting. I have, therefore, informed the United Kingdom that my tentative views, subject to discussion with my colleagues, are as follows:

- (a) I agree with the general approach expressed by the United Kingdom;
- (b) I will be glad to meet Sir Anthony Eden and Mr. Dulles before the Ministerial Meeting to discuss this matter;
- (c) It is of the utmost importance to avoid controversy and debate at the Ministerial Meeting, word of which would be almost sure to leak to the public; and
- (d) If agreement cannot be reached in advance of the Ministerial Meeting on a resolution along the lines of the United Kingdom draft, it would be advisable for the Council merely to note the Military Committee's report and to request the NATO military authorities to pursue their present studies. This would enable member governments to give further consideration to the matter and to take more positive action later, either in the Permanent Council or at the subsequent Ministerial Meeting. Meanwhile the NATO military authorities could continue to plan in accordance with the terms of strategic guidance adopted in 1952.

BRIEFING BY GENERAL GRUENTHER TO NATO COUNCIL ON CAPABILITIES STUDY

As indicated in our telegram under reference, General Gruenther gave a briefing at SHAPE on December 3 to the Permanent Representatives on the capabilities study and the military thinking behind it. Wilgress and Burbridge from this delegation attended.

2. Gruenther, as usual, was very forthright, forceful, and persuasive in outlining the problems now facing NATO military authorities. Throughout he emphasized repeatedly the necessity of NATO forces in the event of a Soviet attack, making use of atomic weapons including the bomb from the outset even though there was no immediate evidence of the enemy using such weapons. Among other things he pointed out the following:

(a) The basic assumption on which SHAPE started its consideration of the capabilities study was the forces which were estimated to be available in mid 1957. This date was entirely arbitrary and had no special significance. In fact it now appears to be a bit early because it seems unlikely that the German contribution would be available by that time.

(b) It was estimated that the Soviet Union would have the following military potential available around the above-mentioned date:

(i) The present 175 divisions with improved equipment and training. It was not estimated that these divisions would increase in number.

(ii) The present Soviet Air Force with an increasing percentage of jet aircraft and the beginnings of a reasonably effective long range air force.

(iii) Approximately 89 satellite divisions which would be slightly improved in quality but still relatively weak.

(iv) A satellite air force of approximately 2400 planes and probably not very effective.

(v) Some improvement in the 162 air fields which intelligence sources indicate are now available.

(vi) Approximately 600 submarines of which 450 would be available for use in the NATO area and the remainder would be long range submarines. Gruenther said that of this total Soviet military potential he thought an attack on Western Europe might involve 134 Soviet divisions and 80 satellite divisions, supported by about 22000 aircraft.

(c) Against these Soviet forces SHAPE estimated that NATO could have available by D plus 15:

(i) 84 divisions plus 23 brigade groups

(ii) 9724 aircraft. This figure exceeded that shown in NATO force goals because it includes some aircraft under national command.

(d) It was assumed that the enemy would use atomic weapons, if not from the outset, at least shortly after, and that the order of priority of attack by the Soviet would be the following:

(i) Combat forces: atomic potential, striking power with conventional weapons, command posts and lines of communication in that order

(ii) Centres of government

(iii) Depots and sources of supply

(iv) Ports and sea lanes

(e) The conclusions emerging from the SHAPE study include the following:

(i) The most important and probably difficult task for the Western powers would be to survive the initial and likely surprise attack.

(ii) In view of the comparative forces mentioned above, in order to survive the initial attack it would be necessary for the Western powers to use immediately all atomic weapons at their disposal.

(iii) Priority must necessarily be placed on combat-ready forces and on the first 30 days of war. In this connection he said there was some confusion about a "30 day war". He stressed that this period did not (repeat not) mean that SHAPE felt that a future war would be limited to 30 days or that navies or reserve forces had no importance. He said that the intensity and the devastation would probably be greatest in this initial period following which there may be a lull allowing each side to remuster and settle down to a long war, but that the gains made in the first 30 day period would probably influence the outcome.

(iv) It will be absolutely essential for the Western forces to destroy at the outset the atomic potential, including production facilities and atomic bomb carrying aircraft, of the Soviet Union.

(v) In order to hold the line and survive the first Soviet attack it is essential to greatly improve the NATO system of air defence.

(f) Regarding the various defence lines which the Western powers might hold, he stressed that it was always assumed that 31 divisions at D-day and at least 65 at D plus 30 would be essential to maintain a defensive line on the Rhine. It would require at least 60 divisions at D-day and 75 at D plus 30 for the West to hold, with conventional weapons, a line east of the Rhine in order to defend Western Europe and particularly Denmark. He said such forces were beyond the economic and political capabilities of the NATO powers and concluded that the only choice remaining was to use atomic weapons fully integrated into the forces which were estimated would be available by 1957.

(g) Without the use of atomic weapons the NATO forces would be hopelessly vulnerable. With the use of such weapons the Western forces would have a distinct advantage in attacking Soviet lines of communication and concentrated Soviet forces. He said the military had no reason to believe that the traditional Soviet practice of using tremendous manpower in concentrated attacks would not be again employed. Such concentrations of course would be ideal targets for atomic weapons.

(h) Among the conclusions flowing from the SHAPE study, Gruenther mentioned the following:

(i) Western forces would have to be dispersed much more in a future war than in past wars as a protection against possible Soviet atomic attack.

(ii) The effective defence of the Central European Sector, particularly with respect to air fighter forces, required that the protection of Southern Denmark be entrusted to the Central Command.

(iii) Future NATO divisions would need to be smaller and more mobile and have greatly improved communications. This was a most difficult problem and probably would not be solved until well on into next year.

(iv) The pattern of NATO airfields might require alteration. This involved two questions. The first, whether it was appropriate to plan on deploying as many as 75 aircraft per airfield, which is the present planning assumption, and secondly whether long runways could be eliminated. He did not think they could, at least within the next five years.

(i) During the question period, Gruenther said that the recent decision of the Moscow conference to integrate Soviet forces in the event the Paris agreements were ratified had no effect on the present situation. He said Soviet forces were already integrated as closely as possible. He mentioned that the Soviets were already trying to raise an East German army and that his figures on Soviet strength mentioned above included 7 East German divisions.

FUTURE NATO DEFENCE PLANNING IN LIGHT OF THE EFFECT OF NEW WEAPONS: NATO ANNUAL REVIEW, 1954

I attach for your signature a draft telegram to our NATO Delegation in Paris in reply to their telegram No. 1109 of December 7 (copy of which is also attached) giving the draft of a resolution on the 1954 Annual Review to be submitted to the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting.

2. You will note that paragraph 1 (a) of this draft resolution asks the Council to note that an effective defence policy for NATO requires in particular action to implement the decisions of the Council on Document MC 48 (the Military Committee's report on the most effective pattern of NATO military strength for the next few years). This paragraph obviously assumes that the Ministers will give full approval at this meeting to the Military Committee's recommendations and that they will be prepared to approve now the financial implications of reorganizing the NATO forces to use atomic weapons.

3. In the draft reply which I attach, we suggest that the Delegation should hedge on this paragraph of the resolution.

4. We have not so far brought the Department of Finance into the picture with respect to the Military Committee's report. We had hoped that we could reach agreement with the Department of National Defence on a common line before doing so. Under the circumstances, however, we have asked one of the officials of the Department of Finance to come to the East Block today in order that we might outline to him the present position.

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE 1954 ANNUAL REVIEW

We have just received the text of the International Staff's draft resolution on the 1954 annual review, Document AC/19-D/129 of December 7. The full text is as follows:

Text Begins:

The North Atlantic Council:

Having considered the report on the annual review 1954 and the comments of the Military Committee thereon, in which the committee state that Soviet military strength will remain at least undiminished, and in respect of submarine, air, and atomic capabilities will increase, during the period covered by the report;

Recognising, particularly in the light of the Council report on trends of Soviet policy that the threat to the security of the North Atlantic Alliance remains; and Recognising that the defence effort of the North Atlantic Community must be correspondingly sustained;

1. Notes that an effective defence policy for NATO requires, in particular:
 - (a) action to implement the decisions of the Council on MC.48;
 - (b) the active participation of the Federal Republic of Germany in NATO defence;
 - (c) the build-up of forces to a level not lower than that of the 1956 planning goals, agreed in the course of the 1953 annual review.
2. Notes that the recommendations made by the NATO military authorities in the course of the 1954 review reflect the general trend of the current capabilities studies.
3. Reiterates the paramount importance which the Atlantic Community attaches to the rapid entry into force of the agreements signed on 23rd October 1954 which will provide for the early participation in Western defence of German forces.
4. Notes that despite the progress made in the course of 1954, existing forces are below the firm goals agreed in 1953.
5. Notes with satisfaction that many recommendations of the NATO military authorities, tending to increase the size or effectiveness of the NATO forces, have been accepted by countries in the course of the annual review.
6. Notes, nevertheless, that the defence plans submitted by several countries in respect of 1955, 1956 and 1957 envisage smaller contributions than forecast in the 1953 review; and that it may be necessary for some countries to allocate resources for defence at a higher level than currently indicated in order to make adequate provisions for their forces as now planned.
7. Adopts the force plans set out in Annex I of each country study in Part III of the report and summarised in the revised force tables in Part II of the report as firm goals for 1955, provisional goals for 1956, and planning goals for 1957;

Urges governments individually and collectively not only to meet their commitments with respect to the 1955 goals, but also to take all steps in their power at least to attain the goals for 1956 and 1957.
8. Notes that the Council will study the statements made by ministers at this meeting, and the comments of member governments contained in Annexes III to the country report in Part III of the report, in order to assess by 1st February 1955 the results of the 1954 review.
9. Requests member governments to maintain close touch with the NATO military authorities — and the International Staff where appropriate — regarding contemplated changes or adjustments in their defence plans, including those designed to enable them to implement, as far as possible, recommendations in accordance with the guidance on military priorities set out in the report.
10. Requests member governments to furnish a brief written statement to the Council by 15th April 1955 upon their progress towards implementing the firm force goals for 1955 and the recommendations made to them, whether so far accepted or not.
11. Recognises the increased importance of raising the effectiveness and capability of forces available at the outset, and the need to form certain units, which are essential for the common defence.

12. Accepts as military guidance the comments by the Military Committee on the 1954 annual review report; and Calls the attention of governments especially to the conclusions to these comments (annexed).

13. Notes with satisfaction that a short-term study on national military service has been completed, and that a further study is to be undertaken in the coming year;

Invites member governments to give their most careful consideration to the measures described in the short-term study and to take all practicable steps to put into effect such measures as might appropriately be adopted by them.

14. Notes that despite further progress during 1954, there is a continued shortage of certain types of matériel, particularly of aircraft, electronics and communication equipment, ammunition, escort vessels, and minesweepers, and a continued inadequacy of operational reserves.

15. Emphasizes the vital part played by the continued supplies of military equipment to the European countries under mutual aid from the United States and Canada;

Notes the important statements made by the Canadian and United States governments relating to assistance in maintaining equipment of North American origin provided to European forces:

Recognises also the great value of the continuation of the Canadian aircrew training programme and of the offshore procurement programme of the United States Government in assisting European member countries to overcome various limitations on their own efforts.

16. Invites member governments to take appropriate action towards implementing the recommendations on equipment and production and end-item aid contained in special reports Nos. 3 and 4 of Part II of the report.

17. Notes that the conclusions of the current study on annual recurring costs will be presented to the Council as soon as possible; and Invites the active participation of member governments in seeking solutions to the problems raised by the long-term maintenance of NATO forces.

18. Notes that economic developments in many member countries have been very encouraging during the past year, and that economic circumstances should not prevent most countries from increasing the planned level of defence effort.

Considers, nevertheless, that given the prospect of the continuance of the present degree of tension over a long period, defence programmes must take account of long-term politico-economic considerations and that, so far as these permit, member governments should be prepared to allocate to defence a proportion of any future increases in national resources when necessary to meet important military needs.

19. Recognises that the well-being of the North Atlantic Community depends on the maintenance of high and rising levels of production and trade.

Notes that member governments, in seeking to improve their defence efforts and to raise living standards, are faced in varying degrees by political and economic problems.

Urges member governments, in the light of the changing situation, to strengthen individual and collective efforts to provide durable solutions to these problems, and thus to ensure a sound social and economic foundation for lasting political and defensive strength. Text Ends.

2. This draft is to be discussed by the Annual Review Committee on the afternoon of December 8. We appreciate that it might be impossible for you to get comments or instructions to us for the December 8 meeting. It is possible, however, that the draft resolution will be discussed at Council meeting on the morning of December 10. If you have any comments or amendments to suggest, we would be grateful to have them by that time.

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW, 1954

We are somewhat concerned with the firm assumption made in paragraph 1 (a) of the draft resolution given in your telegram under reference that the Ministerial Meeting will give full approval to the Military Committee's report. It may be that the decision of the Ministerial Meeting will be something less than full approval and, if that is the case, it would cause less difficulty if there were alternative wordings for paragraph 1 (a) or if the wording were at least less categorical.

2. You will be aware of the United Kingdom views and of those of the Minister from our telegrams number 940 and 941 of December 6. I would therefore suggest that you somehow reserve our position for the time-being with respect to this paragraph.

ACTION TO BE TAKEN ON M.C. 48

Following is text of telegram No. 2656 from British Embassy Washington to Foreign Office, Begins: SACEUR

When I finished speaking to Dulles last night about the proposed Bangkok meeting [of SEATO] (your personal telegram No. 6065), he reverted to the question of the authority to be given to SACEUR in the matter of atomic weapons.

2. He said (as reported in my telegram No. 2632) that he had hoped to give me his views on your draft resolution and perhaps to suggest some amendments.

3. However when he and the Secretary of Defence had discussed the question with the President, they found that he had decided views on the matter. Mr. Dulles would not therefore now be able to give a definite view before he had discussed the matter with you in Paris.

4. The President is evidently most reluctant to see this matter made the subject of formal action by the NATO Council. He is inclined to regard the report of the Military Committee as a planning paper containing the assumptions on which SACEUR will proceed, and as not giving him authority to take action. If the time for that ever came, circumstances rather than any formal procedure would dictate the manner in which the authority to SACEUR was given. The President seems to be thinking in terms of an understanding between the heads of the Governments who would have the principal responsibility. This understanding which would clarify the political channels through which decisions would be conveyed to SACEUR would be reached in informal discussion. His preference therefore is for the adoption of the Military Committee's report by the Council without any formal resolution, but on the basis of an informal understanding between us, the Canadians and presumably the French.

5. Mr. Dulles said that according to his information, the lesser members of the Council had not shown much interest in this matter, and that it was rather the French Government and ourselves who were most deeply concerned.

6. I said that I was not fully informed on the latter points, but I thought you must have reason to suppose that other Governments would raise the question, and that some action was necessary to calm their fears and enable SACEUR to continue his planning unhampered. I again went over the points in your telegram No. 6014 and concluded by saying that you had felt that something should be said to the French this week in order to keep them quiet. Mr. Dulles replied that M. Mendes-France probably had other things to think about. The State Department had not responded to the French memorandum, and the French had not followed it up in any way. He believed therefore that the situation could be held until he could sit down with you and Mr. Pearson in Paris next week; in the meantime he had an open mind on how to proceed. He realised that it was necessary to get a meeting of minds with you and Canadians before tackling the French.

7. Mr. Dulles said at one point that he had been toying with the idea of including in a resolution some provision enabling SACEUR to use atomic weapons automatically if the other side used them first. The President however had objected to this on the ground that the decision would certainly come out and might give the impression that the Russians were being offered a standstill in the use of atomic weapons in Europe. This might encourage them as far as Europe was concerned to rely on this implied undertaking, and base their plans on the use of conventional forces and weapons in which they had such a decided advantage. It was only our superiority in atomic weapons, and our powers of atomic retaliation which now helped to hold the balance of military power even in Europe against the Soviet Union, and NATO could not possibly afford to have two establishments, one for atomic and one for non-atomic war. The President was not in favour of anything which might imply a limitation on the use of atomic weapons in defence.

8. No doubt Mr. Dulles will elaborate his views on these matters in conversation with Mr. Pearson and yourself, and I do not propose myself to seek further clarification unless you wish me to do so.

ACTION TO BE TAKEN ON M.C. 48

Following is text of Foreign Office telegram 6116 of December 10 to British Embassy, Washington, Begins: Your Telegram No. 2656.

SACEUR

I understand the President's preoccupations on the substance of this matter. We must of course consider these issues carefully. But the problem which faces the NATO Council next week is the Military Committee's report which recommends that the Council should "approve" the conclusion that NATO forces will be able to use atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons in their defence from the outset of a new war, and should "note the significance of" the assumption that NATO military authorities be authorised to plan and make preparations accordingly.

2. If the Military Committee's Paper did not contain this specific recommendation we might proceed as the President has suggested, but unfortunately this is not the case. My only object is to enable Saceur to get on with his planning without causing some at least of the NATO Governments political difficulties. The draft resolution which I have proposed would achieve this, but if the Americans can think of a better formula I am of course ready to consider it. From our reports from Paris it is not only the French but others who are troubled. I greatly doubt whether we can solve the difficulty by the simply adoption of the Military Committee's report, and to try and do so might create the political difficulties which would endanger Saceur's planning.

3. The French have followed up their memorandum here on several occasions. I had hoped to be able to give them my draft resolution this week to think about. But I shall now tell them that I do not expect to be able to reply to their memorandum until I see the French Prime Minister on Thursday.

4. Please inform Mr. Dulles of the above. Ends.

For Mr. Campney from General Foulkes.

1. Reference our discussion in Mr. Pearson's office. I have had a discussion with Admiral Radford and General Truesdale. They are prepared to have MC 48 (Final) amended as Mr. Pearson suggested as follows:

Paragraph 37 last line delete word quote will unquote and substitute the word quote may unquote and paragraph 40 sub-para (a) delete the last phrase quote noting the significance of the assumption in paragraph 37 unquote. I have been unable to get in touch with Air Chief Marshal Dickson the UK Representative who has not as yet arrived in Paris but hope to get in touch with him later tonight. I have arranged a meeting at 0900 hours Monday with ADM Radford, ACM Dickson and Gen Gruenther to confirm the deletion of the above by the Military Committee to be sponsored by the Standing Group. Will report later on Dickson's reaction. Radford agrees that if at all possible there should be no discussion on these matters at the Council if this could at all be avoided. Will report later on discussions held on Monday.

2. Will you please advise Mr. Pearson of above.

For Mr. Campney from General Foulkes.

1. With further reference to my Telegrams No. 116 and No. 117. Have been negotiating all morning with the UK and USA to find suitable wording to amend paragraphs 37 and 40(a) without much success as both countries were asking for instructions.

2. Admiral Radford and Air Chief Marshal Dickson suggested that I should sponsor this revision to paragraphs 37 and 40(a) as it would create difficulties for both the UK and US who are both Standing Group countries as they had previously secured political clearance on this paper before the Washington meeting. I was not anxious to put forward any UK amendment as a Canadian suggestion however at a meeting of the Military Committee this afternoon General Gruenther made a statement regarding this paper and referred specifically to paragraph 37 in which he said he understood that there would be certain political difficulties in getting the Council to approve paragraph 37 and General Gruenther emphasized the difficulties he would be in if approval was not given to this paper. I seized on this opportunity and stated that if the situation was as reported by General Gruenther and it was expected that there might be political difficulties in approving this paper in the present wording of paragraph 37 I suggested to the Military Committee that we should have another look at this paragraph at the next session of the Military Committee to be held tomorrow afternoon and see whether we could not devise a suitable wording which would meet the requirements of General Gruenther and yet not raise political difficulties. There was quite a bit of discussion on the appropriateness of this suggestion but it was finally accepted by the Military Committee and the Standing Group was instructed to produce a new wording for the meeting Tuesday afternoon.

3. This will now allow the French to be brought into these discussions without disclosing the previous concern of the UK. It will also give us an opportunity of ensuring that the revised wording will be politically acceptable to us.

4. I made it abundantly clear in my statement today that we considered this paper as the first of a series of planning papers and not an authority for the use of mass destruction weapons.

OF NEW WEAPONS

While I am in general agreement with the views expressed by the President of the United States, we may have to do something to meet the United Kingdom position (as reported in our telegrams under reference). In my view the course least likely to cause debate at the Ministerial Meeting or to draw unwanted public attention to the question might be to adopt a resolution along the following lines:

"The North Atlantic Council

Notes the report of the Military Committee on the most effective pattern of NATO military strength for the next few years (M.C. 48);

Requests the NATO military authorities to continue their planning on the assumption that atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons may have to be used in defence from the outset in any future major war; and Agrees to keep under review what further decisions for action may be necessary on this and subsequent reports on this subject."

2. Such a resolution would accomplish the following objectives:

(a) It would correctly state the assumption, which is that atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons may have to be used, rather than that they will;

(b) It would meet the political objections to the Council's approving the Military Committee report in full as it stands;

(c) It would allow NATO military authorities to get on with their planning; and

(d) It would enable member governments to give more adequate consideration to the whole problem before reaching any final decisions.

3. I have communicated these views to the Foreign Office.

4. I very much deplore the leak which already seems to have occurred in Paris and is responsible for an article in the New York Times by Thomas Brady dated December 10. This, of course, can only make our consideration of this matter more difficult.

5. Since dictating the above, I have seen copies of telegrams Nos. 116 and 117 from General Foulkes indicating that he hopes to secure agreement to amend M.C.

48 (final) so as to make it more acceptable from our standpoint. However I feel a formula for Council procedure as suggested above might still be desirable. Ends.

FUTURE NATO DEFENCE PLANNING IN LIGHT OF THE EFFECT
OF NEW WEAPONS

Following is the text of C.R.O. telegram No. 1434, which has just been received from Earncliffe, containing the United Kingdom comments on the Minister's views as communicated to Earncliffe Monday: Begins:

Your telegram No. 954.

We agree that the Resolution proposed by Mr. Pearson would have the effect of discouraging debate at the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Council meeting, but unfortunately it does not seem to meet a very important point which has not been fully brought out in telegrams exchanged between the Foreign Office, Washington and United Kingdom Delegation to North Atlantic Council, Paris.

2. This point is that the system of alerts set out in paragraphs 10 and 11 (c) of NATO Paper SG 129/4 of May 5th, 1953, read in conjunction with paragraphs 37 and 40 (a) of the Military Committee's Paper (MC 48) makes it theoretically possible for NATO Commanders to begin a thermo-nuclear defensive war on their own authority. Unlikely as such action may be, we think that many NATO Ministers would find themselves in great political difficulty if they had to admit that circumstances existed under which atomic warfare could be launched without governmental sanction.

3. As far as we can see, the only way in which this situation can be avoided is by passing a Resolution which specifically reserves to governments the responsibility for the use of thermo-nuclear weapons except where NATO forces are attacked first with such weapons. Even so, some contradiction will remain between the alert system and the ultimate governmental authority. But the Military Committee have recommended that the alert system should be revised, and we hope that the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Council will resolve that a revision should be made to bring it into line with their conclusions at the forthcoming meeting. Ends. Message Ends.

4. If you have an opportunity before he leaves please draw the attention of Mr. Pearson to the above.

FUTURE PATTERN OF MILITARY STRENGTH

1. Mr. Campney, Mr. Wilgress, Mr. Rogers and I attended a meeting this afternoon with Sir Anthony Eden, Mr. Harold MacMillan, Mr. Dulles, Mr. Anderson and their advisers to discuss the handling of M.C.48, especially para. 37.

2. Mr. Dulles started off by saying that the report represented the opinion of the military authorities on the best way to defend Europe. In his opinion the Council should accept the advice of the Military Committee on this matter. He went on to say, however, that the question of how plans should be brought into operation was a separate problem and should be kept separate. In the United States the President would never delegate to the military the power to make war, and the same principle would be insisted on, he felt sure, in other NATO countries. This principle should be maintained. It would take time to find a solution to the problem of how a decision to employ special weapons in the event of war should be arrived at. Perhaps a perfect solution would never be found. It would obviously be impracticable to have to wait for the decisions of fourteen governments. (Later in the discussion Mr. Dulles said that perhaps the three or four governments who would carry the main load in war — he obviously intended to include Canada among these — might try to find a formula; and he hoped that discussions would be held outside the Council.)

3. Sir Anthony Eden said that he could not disagree with anything Mr. Dulles had said. Unfortunately, however, paras. 37 and 40(a) of M.C.48 together with the NATO Alerts system made it theoretically possible for NATO commanders to begin a thermo-nuclear defensive war on their own authority. Eden and his advisers had the wind taken out of their sails when it was pointed out to them that S.G.129/4 had not been formally approved.

4. I took the line that, even with the Alerts difficulty removed, there was still a political difficulty in giving approval to para. 37 of M.C.48. Certainly, the impression would be created that governments had handed over to the military the power to commit us to atomic war, and that no other kind of war was conceivable. Policy, I said, is likely to become the victim of military plans, if great care is not taken.

5. Sir Anthony then distributed a draft resolution, as follows:

"The North Atlantic Council accepts the conclusions of the Report as a basis for military planning, and agrees that the measures in the enclosure to the Report are necessary to adapt our military forces to meet a major act of aggression, but emphasises that, except in the event of a prior atomic or thermo-nuclear attack by an aggressor, it must remain the responsibility of member Governments to take final decisions, particularly in regard to the use of atomic or thermo-nuclear weapons."

6. Mr. Dulles thought that the resolution went "further and faster" than we should go tomorrow. It left many questions unanswered: for instance, would the fourteen member governments have to concur in the "final decisions"? This, he said, would be unworkable.

7. I said that I thought that M.C.48 made military sense but might give rise to political misinterpretation and popular misunderstanding. In the public mind, plans for the use of thermo-nuclear weapons meant not tactical weapons so much as H-bombs to be dropped on big centres of population. I suggested that the Council approve the report for planning purposes, but that we should make clear that the political factors involved would be referred to the permanent Council for consideration. It was important, I said, not to stop the military planning but also not to give the impression that we were politically divided on this issue.

8. Mr. Dulles said that he thought that the Council should approve the conclusions of the Report as a basis for military planning and preparations.

9. Mr. Anderson, U.S. Assistant Secretary of Defence, said that he thought we should be very careful not to say anything that might undermine the deterrent effect of NATO.

10. After further discussion, the first part of the U.K. draft resolution was accepted, and there was added to it a clause stating in effect that approval of M.C.48 did not involve the delegation of governmental responsibility for putting plans into operation. It was felt that this would make it possible to meet criticism suggesting that the political leaders had handed over the power to make vitally important decisions to the military, and that at the same time it would not reduce the deterrent effect of the belief that the NATO countries were quite prepared to use atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons in defence.

11. The text as agreed upon by the representatives of the three countries was as follows:

"The Council approves the report MC 48 as a basis for planning and preparations by the NATO Military Authorities, noting that this approval does not involve the delegation of responsibility of governments for putting the plans into action in the event of hostilities."

12. Messrs. Eden and Dulles agreed to seek the approval of M. Mendes-France at a meeting they were to have with him later in the afternoon. If they were successful, they would then canvass the other delegations. I undertook to speak to the Norwegian Foreign Minister, Mr. Lange — who later agreed with the proposed resolution.

13. At one stage it was suggested that the draft resolution should be put forward by Canada — but in the end it was decided that it would be more appropriate if it were to come from a Standing Group country, or even better, be submitted by the Chair as a secretariat draft prepared after consultation with certain delegations.

MEMORANDUM OF A CONVERSATION WITH SIR ANTHONY EDEN
PARIS, DECEMBER 19, 1954

Before I left for Canada this afternoon, Eden called on me to give an account of the talks he and Dulles had been having with Mendes-France on Indochina, and to discuss some other matters. Like Dulles, he was somewhat impatient with Mendes-France, not merely because of his alleged misrepresentation in the press of the Saturday Indochinese talks, but also because the French Prime Minister had been discussing with the Belgians and the Dutch and the Italians the possibility of having some informal talks on military matters through their respective Chiefs of Staff, to which the British would not be invited. Eden had apparently learned of this from the Dutch or the Belgians or both.

The main purpose of Eden's visit to me, however, was to express his anxiety over the steps which should now be taken to work out "alert" procedures by which action could be coordinated in an emergency, reserving all the rights of governments, but permitting the military to make quick decisions. Like Dulles, he was worried about the effects of any public discussion of this matter, but unlike Dulles, he thought that studies should begin at once to see if satisfactory arrangements could not be agreed on. For this reason, he was going to ask Norman Brook in London to apply his mind to a solution of this problem. They would then take the matter up with Washington and Ottawa in the hope that the three governments could agree on plans. Only then would they discuss it with the French, and later with the other NATO members.

He felt that the procedure we had adopted in regard to the formula for submission to the Council at this meeting, and which had solved the problem of reconciling the necessities of military atomic planning with the ultimate responsibilities of governments for decision, could usefully be applied to this other problem. He was emphatic, however, that the first examination of the problem should be by the three governments alone. He would be glad if Norman Robertson could keep in touch with Norman Brook in London regarding this matter. I told Eden that we had already worked out some technical arrangements with the United States in regard to "alerts" and emergency action in North America, and that this might be looked at in regard to a more general application. Eden said that they would be very grateful if our High Commissioner could tell them something about this in London.

PRELIMINARY ASSESSMENT OF NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING⁷²

The NATO Ministerial meeting of December, 1954, was in some ways disappointing. Perhaps this is not surprising, for underlying the meeting were two questions the answers to which would profoundly influence most of the subjects on the agenda but for which the answers could not be given at the time of the meeting. It is true the Council did settle the particular political problem, discussed below, of providing authority for the development of NATO forces in such a way as to permit them to be employed to best effect should a war break out in which new weapons were used, without at the same time formally committing NATO to a war of this type should war occur. But aside from this particular question there were in people's minds all the related problems — technical, administrative, and financial — of converting NATO forces from the conventional pattern to a pattern adapted to the possibility of such a war. While these problems will be on a scale to require many important ministerial decisions, particularly in connection with their financial implications, the data were not yet available on which such decisions would have to be based.

2. The second background question concerned the ratification of the Paris Agreements and the provision of a German defence contribution.⁷³ With the debate in the French Assembly to open the following week, there was little that could be said beyond the expression of universal hope for ratification. Yet almost all NATO planning, military and political, was dependent on Mendes-France's (and Adenauer's) success in this matter, and at the same time such success could be regarded only as a hypothesis.

3. Hence the basis of political planning at the time of the meeting was hypothetical, while military and financial planning could not be significantly advanced without a great deal of detailed information which was not yet available. In these circumstances it is perhaps not unnatural that the positive accomplishments of the meeting were few. Nevertheless it is our impression that the work of the ministers did bring out one important fact — the meeting of minds about what NATO's general line of policy should be was remarkable. Dulles spoke with every indication of sincerity of the need for patience, co-operation, unity and restraint, while the more timid and provincial countries bravely faced the prospect of a NATO which would be committed, if war came, to fight that war with all available means and with no thought of half-way measures.

4. Reverting to the particular political problem referred to in paragraph 1 above, it is interesting to note that the Council did not in fact discuss in detail the report of the Military Committee on the most effective pattern of NATO military strength over the next few years, but merely approved it as a basis for planning and preparations. The main issue raised by the report regarding the use of atomic weapons by NATO was settled before the Council meeting when the Big Three and ourselves agreed on the text of the resolution which was subsequently approved in Council.⁷⁴ The decision reached is contained in the press communiqué⁷⁵ and further working out of the "atomic formula" will take place in the Permanent Council through the usual consultation process.

5. The wording of the final communiqué perhaps retained the attention of the ministers to a greater extent than has been the case in the past. The French Prime Minister had given firm instructions to his representatives on the Working Group that there should be no precise reference in the communiqué to the Council's hope that the Paris Agreements would be ratified as soon as possible. The French were anxious that NATO's action in this respect should not emulate the pressure that the Soviet Government was exercising on France not to ratify the Agreements under the penalty of a denunciation of the Franco-Soviet Treaty. The communiqué therefore only refers to progress made towards the ratification of the Paris Agreements which the Council considers as an essential contribution to unification of Europe and the security of the free world.

6. Most members of the Alliance would have liked to make some reference in the communiqué to the fact that the west remained prepared to settle disputes through negotiations. In the Working Group the United States and the United Kingdom strongly opposed the inclusion of any such reference although France would have accepted a rather vague formula which would have mentioned not only negotiations on the settlement of pending disputes but would have singled out the question of limitation and control of armaments. In the Council, the Italian Foreign Minister argued strongly in favour of a paragraph on negotiations and control of armaments on the ground that it would facilitate the ratification of the Paris Agreements by the Italian Parliament. The French did not support him and both Mr. Dulles and Eden agreed that any reference to negotiations should be left out. Finally as a compromise Mr. Eden suggested that the communiqué mention the fact that the Council associate itself with the current disarmament proposals now under study in the United Nations.

7. As for the remainder of the agenda, the Secretary General's report and the military progress report gave rise to no significant new discussion. Statements on the Annual Review report fell into two categories, the first comprising pious generalities about the report as a whole or about the Annual Review process, and the second devoted to particular national comments on Country Chapters and to national planning for the future. No minister really tried, in a statement to the Council, to come to grips with the problem of the general trend towards a reduction of defence effort, a problem briefly but forcefully set out in the Secretary General's cover note.

8. In conclusion, the Council agreed that, in principle, its next ministerial session would take place in Athens next April. As this arrangement might, however, give rise to technical difficulties, confirmation and detailed planning would be left to the Permanent Council.

PRELIMINARY ASSESSMENT OF NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING

I think that we should place on file a comment regarding the last sentence of paragraph 4 of this telegram. There it is stated that the further working out of the atomic formula will take place in the Permanent Council through the usual consultation processes.

2. At the meeting which Mr. Pearson had with Messrs. Eden, Dulles, and others on December 16, Mr. Dulles expressed the view that it might be desirable for the countries principally concerned — he was obviously speaking of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Canada — to try to come to an understanding regarding the means whereby the military might be permitted to engage in hostilities, using atomic weapons. He said that in a period of crisis, it would obviously be impossible to await the decisions of fourteen or fifteen governments. I certainly got the impression that the United States might oppose any attempt in the Permanent Council to work out what the Delegation calls atomic formula.

London, August 13, 1953

ADMISSION TO THE COMMONWEALTH

The procedure for admission to the Commonwealth was reviewed in some detail two years ago during the preparation of the Departmental paper on "Canadian Policy with respect to the Commonwealth".† I do not propose to go over all that ground again, but perhaps you will find it useful to have some indication of how the United Kingdom authorities are approaching the problem. I should say at the outset that much of what follows will necessarily be speculative and unofficial, since United Kingdom policy on many of the matters discussed is still very much in the formative stage.

2. Perhaps the best point of departure for a survey of the United Kingdom Government's approach to this extremely complex problem is the formula stated by Mr. Gordon Walker in June 1951:

"We must make quite clear the distinction between the grant of responsible self-government¹ within the Commonwealth, which is a matter for the United Kingdom Government and the territory concerned, and for them alone, and the question of becoming a full member of the Commonwealth, which is of course a matter for all members of the Commonwealth . . . Were any question of admission to full and independent membership of the Commonwealth to arise, all existing members would, following past practice, be consulted".

There has never been any distinction between these; since the Commonwealth came into being, Commonwealth membership has been an immediate consequence of the attainment of full self-government.

This policy,² which has been explicitly endorsed by the present Government, has at least three advantages from the United Kingdom point of view:

(a) It underlines the contention that the United Kingdom, as an administering power, has the sole responsibility for determining the pace of political advancement of its dependent territories and for actually granting them self-governing status.

(b) It seeks to forestall any fears there might be among other Commonwealth Governments that they will not be afforded an equal say in approving additions to the present membership.

(c) In view of the expected South African opposition to the admission of African Negro states, it ensures that Colonial Governments and peoples should be aware that admission to the Commonwealth is not an automatic outcome³ of the attainment of full self-government or a prize which the United Kingdom Government alone is in a position to grant.

3. It is interesting to compare the United Kingdom position with the conclusion reached in paragraph 9 of Annex I of the Departmental policy paper enclosed with Circular Document A 61/51 of August 23, 1951. This conclusion reads: "The United Kingdom is best able to pronounce on whether or not any particular territory over which it exercises control is ready for full self-government. Commonwealth membership should not be automatic, but the general consent of existing members should be obtained prior to any United Kingdom commitment to grant full self-government to the dependency concerned".

4. As far as I know, we have never told the United Kingdom authorities of the conclusion quoted above, although it differs somewhat from the policy enunciated by Mr. Gordon Walker.⁴ Our conclusion seems to mean that the general consent of Commonwealth Governments should be a condition precedent to the granting of self-government to a territory under the control of the United Kingdom,⁵ whereas under the United Kingdom formula the granting of such status is a matter for the United Kingdom Government alone to decide, the other members being concerned only with the next phase — the transition from self-government to full membership.⁶ This distinction may not mean very much in practice; there will probably be some sort of informal consultation with other Commonwealth Governments before the grant of self-government takes place or the final question of admission to full membership arises. Nevertheless, I am inclined to think that the United Kingdom formula is more logical and that we should lose nothing by accepting it.⁷ To do so would not deprive us of the right to judge whether the degree of self-government granted amounted to the sovereign independence required for Commonwealth

³ It always has been in the past.

⁴ No — these policy papers are not for communication to other governments.

⁵ No — the detailed part of A61/51 makes this clear.

⁷ It involves a change in the accepted basis of Commonwealth membership.

membership, but would preserve what must surely be the right of the United Kingdom to grant full self-government to a territory under its control.⁸

5. If we recognize that the United Kingdom has the single right to determine the form and timing of self-government, it follows that our own formal responsibility in the matter of admission to the Commonwealth will not, strictly speaking, begin unless and until the territory in question expresses the wish to become a full member.⁹ At that time, the attitude we adopt will presumably depend on our answers to two broad questions: whether we consider that a full degree of self-government has in fact been granted and whether, on other than purely constitutional grounds, we are agreeable to the territory's admission. In other words, we will want to feel confident that the territory has attained real political independence and that it is willing and able to discharge the international obligations of a sovereign state, including membership of the United Nations. Among the factors which will be relevant are: the territory's size, in area and population; its strength in terms of economics and defence; and the quality of the civil rights enjoyed by its population.

6. In an ideal world, the principles sketched above would presumably be an adequate basis on which to judge the suitability of prospective members. There are, however, two additional factors which are likely to confuse the issue:

(a) South Africa may be expected to apply its own standard of judgment, a standard in which differences of race and colour and degrees of civilization are influential.

(b) Nationalist pressures in the dependent territories may be so urgent as to force existing members to agree to premature admissions or run the risks involved in rejecting an applicant.

7. These two factors are at the root of the problem confronting Commonwealth Governments. Their existence brings into relief the dilemma of how the multi-racial composition of the Commonwealth can be further extended without irreparable damage being done to the existing structure and fabric. In what we have been able to learn of their approach to this problem, the United Kingdom authorities appear to have definite misgivings about the wisdom of adding indiscriminately and hastily to the present nucleus of eight full members. Officials to whom we have talked, particularly in the C.R.O., are apprehensive lest the entry of new members should cause the withdrawal of an existing member¹⁰ or diminish the usefulness and feasibility of the present pattern of intra-Commonwealth consultation. On more than one occasion recently, C.R.O. officials have betrayed their concern that the expansion of the Commonwealth may go far to nullify the peculiar value of the periodic meetings of Prime Ministers.

8. In these circumstances, and because it is obviously out of the question to ignore the desires of advanced colonies to exercise their independence within the framework of the Commonwealth, officials here are wondering whether there is any practicable alternative to the traditional practice whereby territories attaining sovereign independence are almost automatically admitted to the status of full members. You may be interested to hear of one idea along these lines which was suggested to us informally last week by Pritchard, Assistant Under-Secretary in charge of the C.R.O. Foreign Affairs Division.

9. Pritchard's idea depends upon acceptance of the theory¹¹ that dependent territories of the United Kingdom can already be said to be "within the Commonwealth". On the assumption that their status can be so described, he goes on to say that it might therefore be possible for a territory such as the Gold Coast to pass from dependent to independent status within the Commonwealth without any question of "full membership" arising¹² and thus without the necessity for existing members to give their consent. In other words, Pritchard seems to be introducing the concept of a new category of Commonwealth countries which, while constitutionally independent and sovereign, would not enjoy to the full the privileges of full members, i.e. the right of being brought on a basis of full equality into the pattern of intra-Commonwealth Prime Ministers. (It is interesting to note, incidentally, that Pritchard's idea coincides with a prediction expressed in paragraph 19 of the Notes enclosed with your despatch No. K-3259 of September 28, 1951;† that the adoption of Mr. Gordon Walker's formula (paragraph 2 above) might lead to the creation of a new class of countries, just as independent as Canada, but precluded from enjoying the rights of full members). Pritchard does not rule out the possibility that in due course it might prove feasible, by general consent among existing full members, for countries enjoying "independence within the Commonwealth" to progress to the status of full members. This would, however, take time, he thinks, and would depend on the development of South African policy. For the moment, he considers it a matter of priority to improvise some procedure which will prevent the Gold Coast and similar territories from drifting out of the Commonwealth orbit, and at the same time to maintain the cohesion of the existing "full membership" structure.

10. There are obvious difficulties in this scheme, as Pritchard is the first to admit. The real nature of the Commonwealth is already difficult enough to explain without complicating it with yet another constitutional refinement. Another difficulty is that the dependent territories concerned might not be satisfied with anything less than full membership in the sense in which it is enjoyed by Canada or South Africa; in this they might well be supported by India. But I think you will agree that the idea is interesting and though it has no official standing at the moment, at least deserves consideration. Incidentally, it is noteworthy that among the proposals which Dr. Nkrumah's Government is considering (cf. C.R.O. telegram W. No. 58)† is a request that the United Kingdom Government should make a declaration of its readiness to grant the Gold Coast "independent status within the Commonwealth". This wording is interesting in the light of Pritchard's remarks to us, though whether it is intentional (and not merely another way of saying "self-governing status"), I am not yet in a position to say.

11. A quite different view on how the problem of admission to the Commonwealth might be tackled was put forward by Mr. Gordon Walker in a recent conversation with a member of this Office. Mr. Gordon Walker gave no indication that he was thinking in the terms suggested by Pritchard. His thoughts, however, were clearly directed at discovering some device which would serve to circumvent an early crisis brought about by South African intransigence on the membership question. In the first place, he did not appear to agree with the commonly held view that the Gold Coast would assert a claim to full membership within perhaps the next two years. He envisaged a waiting-period of some three to five years. However the time element worked out, he thought that perhaps the best way of avoiding the probable South African objections to the Gold Coast might be to offer the South Africans some acceptable quid pro quo. Rather than have the Gold Coast's application brought forward by itself, he wondered if it might be coupled in some way with consideration of the position of the Central African Federation. South Africa might give way on the Gold Coast in return for an assurance in principle that the Federation would in due course be admitted. India, which might be expected to have misgivings about the qualifications of the Federation, might, Mr. Gordon Walker thought, refrain from pressing them if the Gold Coast had first been admitted. In reply to a question, Mr. Gordon Walker agreed that an arrangement of this kind would not be practicable except on condition that the present protectorate status of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland were terminated and that the civil rights of the African population throughout the Federation were brought more closely into line with those in the Gold Coast. This, he admitted, would take several years, but nevertheless he thought that some idea along the lines of a "horse-trade" might be worth investigation.

12. After the Gold Coast, Nigeria and the Central African Federation are considered here to be the most likely potential candidates for admission to the Commonwealth. There is much talk in Nigeria of "self-government in 1956" and I suppose it is conceivable that this target date will be attained. In the opinion of Colonial Office officials, however, the facts of the political situation in Nigeria indicate that it can hardly be ready for full self-government in the accepted sense until at least five years from now. The main reason for this view is that the Northern Region, the largest of the three in Nigeria, does not share the enthusiasm of the majority parties in the Eastern and Western Regions for an early cutting of the existing constitutional link with London. A great deal will depend on the outcome of the constitutional conference now being held in London, since this will throw light on the prospects for future cooperation between the three Regions. Unless such cooperation is achieved, there can be no certainty that a united Nigeria in its present form will continue to exist. For the moment, therefore, speculation on Nigeria as a possible full member of the Commonwealth is unprofitable.

13. It is difficult to know what to say of the Central African Federation. Mr. Gordon Walker's remarks suggest the possibility of its becoming an eventual bargaining counter as against the Gold Coast. On the other hand, Colonial Office officials do not expect that the Federation will warrant consideration as a full member before, at the earliest, 1960. They point out that the Federal Scheme provides for a constitutional review in between 7 and 9 years' time. Despite the words of the Preamble to the Scheme, that "when the inhabitants of the territories so desire", the Federation should be enabled "to go forward with confidence to the attainment of full membership of the Commonwealth", it is not believed here that there is any likelihood of this objective being attained until after the constitutional review has taken place. It is, however, recognized that because of the history of the Southern Rhodesian connection with the Commonwealth, some consequential problems will arise when the Federation comes into being. It is felt that Sir Godfrey Huggins has, over the last twenty years, established a special place for himself in Commonwealth affairs and that, as the Prime Minister of the Central African Federation, he will naturally expect to be accorded the same personal status in future as he has had as Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia. The United Kingdom will certainly wish to invite Sir Godfrey to attend future Prime Ministers' meetings in the same capacity¹³ in which he has attended all Prime Ministers' meetings since the War,¹⁴ but they do not appear disposed to allow his personal position to provide the Federation with a shortcut to self-government or Commonwealth membership.

14. The above is no more than a preliminary survey of some of the questions which may demand our attention as new territories attain self-governing status. No attempt has been made to examine the qualifications of particular candidates, since the evidence available is too scanty and problematical to warrant detailed consideration at this stage. Perhaps the lesson to be drawn from the foregoing paragraphs is that as the probable date of self-government approaches in particular dependent territories, the degree of intra-Commonwealth consultation must inevitably increase. Such questions as the Gold Coast's desire to have its affairs conducted through the C.R.O. rather than through the Colonial Office¹⁵ and its expected request that the United Kingdom should make a declaration expressing readiness to grant it "independent status within the Commonwealth", are matters of direct interest to all Commonwealth Governments, even though strictly speaking decisions on them may fall within the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom Government. It is interesting to learn, therefore, from Mr. J.J.S. Garner, Deputy Permanent Under-Secretary at the C.R.O., that talks have begun between the United Kingdom Ministries concerned, with a view to supplying a greater flow of information on these questions to Commonwealth Governments. C.R.O. Savingsgram W. No. 58 of June 19† on the Gold Coast is an example of the kind of information which we are likely to be receiving with greater frequency in the future. Although, like other C.R.O. messages, it is sent primarily for the information of Commonwealth Governments, the United Kingdom authorities would, I know, particularly welcome Canadian comments on it and similar messages. On several occasions recently, officials of the Colonial Office and the C.R.O. have emphasized the value they attach to Canadian views on problems of colonial policy, both in the United Nations context and outside it. We have the opportunity, therefore, if we are disposed to use it, to exert influence on the thinking of the United Kingdom authorities with regard to the future structure and composition of the Commonwealth.

¹⁵ I suppose it has about as much right to that privilege as Southern Rhodesia.

15. One further point which may be worthy of consideration in any studies you are undertaking concerns the relationship between our policy on admission to the Commonwealth and the attitude we adopt in the General Assembly towards the political advancement of dependent territories. In the past, this relationship has seemed distant and academic. But as the Fourth Committee interests itself increasingly in the political affairs of non-self-governing territories, its recommendations, even though vague (and as the administering powers believe, illegal), may have the effect of accelerating the pace of particular territories towards fully self-governing status. This process is of direct concern to Commonwealth countries in so far as the Assembly's resolutions may apply to non-self-governing territories (e.g. the Gold Coast) under United Kingdom administration. The faster these territories advance towards self-government, the sooner they will aspire to Commonwealth membership. It seems to me important, therefore, that in deciding our attitude towards resolutions dealing with non-self-governing territories, we should guard against any statement or action which might be inconsistent with or prejudicial to our policy on the composition of the Commonwealth.¹⁶

ADMISSION TO COMMONWEALTH MEMBERSHIP

As you have pointed out, this problem seems likely to come to a head within the next three or four years at most. I agree that it would be useful to keep closely in touch with the United Kingdom authorities who are trying to devise solutions.

2. I would hesitate, however, to agree that we should commit ourselves to the Gordon Walker formula, at least at this stage. I say this not so much because we would question the principle set forth in the formula, but rather because we are doubtful about its implications. The formula draws a distinction between the grant of full self-government within the Commonwealth, which it declares to be a matter solely for the United Kingdom government and the territory concerned, and the acceptance of a country as a member of the Commonwealth, which it declares to be a matter on which all members of the Commonwealth would be consulted. There can be no doubt that such a distinction, between the responsibility of the United Kingdom on the one hand and the interests of all Commonwealth members on the other, should be drawn. But the weakness of the formula is that it ignores the way in which self-government and Commonwealth membership have been correlated.

3. Since the Commonwealth arose, there has never yet been a self-governing country within it which was not regarded as a member of the Commonwealth from the moment when it became self-governing. (See Appendix I.)† Hitherto, therefore, the Commonwealth has contained only two classes of political unit: independent states (that is members of the Commonwealth) and dependencies of one or another of the members. There is a weight of precedent here which places formidable difficulties in the way of any plan to create a third category into which dependencies might fit on attaining full self-government if it were not immediately apparent that all existing members would welcome them as new members.

4. It is, I think, clear that the Gordon Walker formula would imply the possibility of creating such a third category — a class of independent states within the Commonwealth which would not be members of the Commonwealth and which would therefore be deprived of the privileges of consultation and of representation on a basis of equality at Prime Minister's meetings and other major conferences (I notice that Mr. Pritchard, without specifically referring to the Gordon Walker formula, has outlined an idea of this kind). Such states would be in a sort of limbo, quarantine, or cold storage. It seems hardly conceivable that an arrangement of this kind would meet the views of territories like the Gold Coast which are now aspiring to independence within the Commonwealth. As it would work out in practice, it would seem like an attempt to introduce a colour bar into Commonwealth relations, and would I should think, offend some of the present members as much as it would offend the possible candidates for membership. While we would not wish to exclude the possibility of such an arrangement, I cannot think it probable that it would be generally accepted.

5. The subject of your despatch under reference was "Admission to the Commonwealth". I suppose that you had in mind the acceptance of an additional country as a co-equal partner in the Commonwealth along with the eight countries which now comprise its membership. It might, therefore, be preferable if we were to speak of admission to Commonwealth membership rather than of admission to the Commonwealth. It is true that there is some basis in usage for employment of the term "the Commonwealth" (or "the Commonwealth of Nations" or "the British Commonwealth of Nations") as simply describing the association of the eight independent, self-governing members. Some Commonwealth spokesmen, notably Sir Winston Churchill, even speak of "the British Commonwealth and Empire" when they wish to make it clear that they are talking about Commonwealth countries and their dependencies taken together. In our view, there is no justification for the latter terminology, and we are hardly more fond of the use of the term "the Commonwealth" (or its equivalents) to mean only the eight independent self-governing members.

6. There appear to be certain valid reasons for asserting that the Commonwealth in fact embraces not only the self-governing members but also the territories over which these self-governing countries exercise control. At least in some contexts we certainly mean to include, when we speak of the Commonwealth, not only the freely associated self-governing members but also the whole geographical extent of the territories under the control of Commonwealth Governments.

7. There are certain practical considerations in such fields as trade which seem to require a comprehensive concept of the Commonwealth. So far as Canada is concerned, it is worth recalling that some years ago we advised the law officers of the Province of Manitoba, in response to an enquiry, to substitute "The British Commonwealth of Nations" or "The Commonwealth of Nations" for "the British Empire" in certain legislation.

8. While this is a somewhat obscure and complex field, I think that what you have described as the "theory that dependent territories of the United Kingdom can already be said to be within the Commonwealth", is something more than a theory. There appears to be every reason for regarding them as already within the Commonwealth, although not fully self-governing members of it. In fact, I see that a recent Commonwealth Relations Office List in an article on the Commonwealth provisionally adopts this view. In this connection I would like to refer to Appendix II.† It contains, in addition to the C.R.O. article, quotations tending to support a comprehensive concept of the Commonwealth. It is by no means exhaustive and does not include contrary views, but it is of interest as demonstrating a consistent trend in a series of relatively authoritative pronouncements. At the same time the difficulties of reaching a satisfactory conclusion on this terminological question are such that we have thought it also worthwhile to include Appendix III,† which contains interesting obiter dicta by L.C. Christie. The position has become clearer since 1936, but Mr. Christie's memorandum still has historical and humorous interest.

9. You referred in Paragraphs 3 and 4 of your despatch to a statement (in the Appendix to departmental policy paper on Commonwealth relations prepared in 1951)† which seemed to mean that the general consent of Commonwealth Governments should be a condition precedent to the granting of full self-government to dependencies. The statement, taken in isolation, was certainly ambiguous, though when read as part of the whole section on admission to Commonwealth membership its intention becomes clear. The thought behind it (made explicit in the second last sentence of paragraph 4 of the Appendix) was that there should be general consent among existing members to the acceptance of a formerly dependent territory as a member of the Commonwealth.

10. It was implicit in our thinking at that time that in practice the granting of full self-government would almost certainly lead immediately to full membership unless the territory in question were to leave the Commonwealth altogether (unless some new arrangement, such as that envisaged under the Gordon Walker formula, were worked out, this would still be the case.) It was therefore thought desirable that there should be the fullest possible consultation well in advance in order that the views of existing members on the qualifications of the territory for Commonwealth membership should be clearly understood by the member administering the territory before it made a commitment to grant self-government. This is still our view.

11. You will recall that in 1947 we developed a somewhat more positive and clearcut principle as a possible basis for determining Commonwealth membership. At that time, when we were considering the impending grant of Dominion status to India, it was recommended to the Cabinet that, in replying to a communication from Mr. Attlee on this subject, the Canadian Government should express views not only on the question of India's relations with the Commonwealth but also on the general question of increasing the number of members of the Commonwealth. (See Appendix IV).† It was suggested that we might assert that no state which is not in fact and in law self-governing is eligible for admission to the Commonwealth, and that no members could properly be admitted to it except by the general consent (formal or informal, tacit or express) of the existing members. Although we still see much merit in these views, and the requirement of self-government has always prevailed in practice, the Canadian Government did not in fact at that time endorse them or approve of their expression to the United Kingdom Government; and we should, I think, refrain for the present from putting them forward.

12. We do feel, however, that there is room, and need, for consultation between us and the United Kingdom in the period immediately ahead. At least for the time being, any such consultation should perhaps be informal and bilateral and should, in effect, be an exchange of views. It could be related to the general problem of procedure with respect to new membership (the main point discussed in this despatch), to the question of qualifications for membership, and to such proposals as those relating to the Gold Coast mentioned in paragraph 14 of your despatch under reference.

13. We very much appreciate the information which the United Kingdom authorities give us from time to time on developments in their dependent territories and on proposals with respect to these territories which they have under consideration. We welcome the fullest possible flow of such information. In relation to the subject of this despatch, we are especially interested in information about developments in, or proposals relating to the Gold Coast, Nigeria, and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. We do not feel, however, that we are closely enough in touch with conditions in dependencies of the United Kingdom to offer views on particular proposals such as those contained in C.R.O. Savingsgram W. No. 58 of June 19, 1953;‡ nor is there that specialization in our service which would afford the continuity of approach and the expert knowledge which would be necessary if we were to embark on studies of this kind. Perhaps the time has come when we should endeavour to find means of informing ourselves more fully and continuously of developments in colonial territories, more especially those which are relatively close to self-government. We have given some thought to this question but have not yet devised proposals.

14. In any case, the expression of views to the United Kingdom Government by the Canadian Government on particular proposals with respect to United Kingdom territories would be a new departure which we would not like to undertake without a good deal of thought. We realize that at least one other Commonwealth Government, the Indian Government, has already done this; presumably this was an initiative taken by the Indian Government for reasons of its own. We are inclined to be more reticent. Doubtless neither the United Kingdom Government nor the Indian Government considers that an expression of views by the latter means that it has been consulted. If, however, the practice became more general, a situation could develop in which the United Kingdom Government would, in effect, be consulting with other Commonwealth Governments with regard to steps to be taken in territories under its control. This might imply the assumption of a responsibility outside our proper field. Perhaps you could explain a little more fully the basis on which you feel the United Kingdom authorities would welcome Canadian comments on messages such as C.R.O. Savingsgram. No. 58. We certainly do not wish to be "more Catholic than the Pope", and we may have missed the point of your suggestion.

15. It may seem anomalous that any country which feels disposed to give the United Kingdom very pointed advice in the Fourth Committee or in the Trusteeship Council, should feel perfectly free to do so, while we refrain from rendering advice within the privacy of Commonwealth channels of consultation. The basis for United Nations activity in this field is clearly established, however, whereas there has never been a comparable Commonwealth approach to the problems of colonial development. As a matter of fact, our own interventions in the Fourth Committee have been more general than particular.

16. This is not to say that we do not attach value to the sort of consultation which has developed among Commonwealth Countries on colonial issues in the United Nations context — for example, exchanges of telegrams before Assembly sessions, and the meetings which have been held in London between United Kingdom officials and our own and those of some other Commonwealth countries, to discuss items coming up on the agenda of the Fourth Committee. The only point about which we should exercise care is that we should not create an impression among the newer members of the Commonwealth that the older members are "clubbing together" on colonial issues. One of the real dangers threatening the Commonwealth as a bridge between Asia and the West is the possibility of a split along lines of colour. Meetings such as those mentioned above should therefore be distinctly informal and ad hoc, especially since (unlike, say Commonwealth meetings on defence) they are not meetings of which the new Commonwealth members are made aware even though they might not wish to attend. As a general principle, consultation among a restricted number of Commonwealth countries should be held to a minimum and should never be on a formalized basis. As you know, we have also welcomed the opportunities we have had here in Ottawa to listen to the views on colonial questions about to be discussed in the Assembly of such United Kingdom authorities as Sir John Martin and Sir Gladwyn Jebb.

17. We realize, as you pointed out in your despatch, that it is important that our approach to colonial questions in the United Nations should be consistent with our general attitude on the question of the composition of the Commonwealth. I think the approach we have adopted in the Fourth Committee has not been inconsistent with or prejudicial to our policies on the composition of the Commonwealth. It is true that the attention focussed on non-self-governing territories and trust territories in the Fourth Committee and the impatient tone of many of the resolutions adopted there are undoubtedly heightening the desire of dependent peoples for full self-government and hastening the day when it will be granted. Canada's voice, however, has been one of moderation. We have played an extremely limited role in Fourth Committee debates and in the few speeches made, we have emphasized two points: (a) that the administering power, in the case of non-self-governing territories, is best qualified to say when a non-self-governing territory has reached the stage when information under Article 73 (e) of the Charter need no longer be transmitted. Dispute on this point has been particularly heated in debate over the list of factors which should be taken into account in determining whether a territory has achieved a full measure of self-government. Canada has recognized that a reasonable list of factors, couched in moderate terms, might be of some assistance as a guide to the administering states. However, at recent sessions of the Assembly, we have voted against various resolutions on this issue which called for establishment of a rigid list of factors and for acceptance of the contention that the Assembly, instead of the administering powers, has the right to determine when a territory has achieved self-government; and (b) that the United Nations must endeavour to balance the legitimate hopes and interests of dependent peoples against both the necessity of recognizing the rights of the administering states and of fostering the orderly and gradual processes of evolution.

18. We have been consistently opposed to efforts to establish target dates or time-tables for the achievement of self-government. In our minds, of course, has been the conviction that only dislocation and disaster can come to dependent territories if they and their friends insist upon accelerating progress towards self-government to a degree which would give them full charge of their own affairs when they have neither the administrative organization nor the experience to handle the complex problems with which they would be faced. At the same time, we recognize that the United Nations has a duty to interest itself in the progressive development of self-government, and we believe that all administering powers should address themselves conscientiously to the task of advancing dependent peoples toward a condition in which self-government will be increasingly possible. We have always regarded the United Kingdom as more conscientious and progressive in this respect than some other administering powers.

19. We consider that these views are in harmony with the best interest of Commonwealth development even though we may not hold exactly the same view as the United Kingdom regarding the usefulness of United Nations discussion of colonial issues. One way of ensuring that there is consistency between our views on such questions as Commonwealth membership and the composition of the Commonwealth and views expressed by Canadian delegations in the Fourth Committee would be by providing for the fullest possible exchange, in the United Nations context, of information and views on developing conditions in non-self-governing territories and on the respective lines to be taken by Commonwealth Delegations on these subjects in the wider United Nations forum. We therefore feel that the exchanges of views of this kind which have been held in the past should continue in future. We will also endeavour to make sure that views we express in such discussions, or in the Fourth Committee, move in step with Canadian views expressed to the United Kingdom authorities on the question of Commonwealth membership.

20. The views of the Colonial Office on the status of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, reported in your paragraph 13, appear to indicate that it is believed that Sir Godfrey Huggins' presence at Prime Ministers' meetings has been on a personal rather than a representative basis. I think that he must, on the contrary, be considered to have been the representative of Southern Rhodesia. Attached is a memorandum on representation of Southern Rhodesia at Prime Ministers' conferences since 1932 (Appendix IV).[†] It will be noted that Sir Godfrey Huggins was not in fact present at all Prime Ministers' meetings since the war. I feel that the representation of Southern Rhodesia at such conferences should be considered to have been on the same basis as the representation of India before it attained self-government in 1947. Attendance at a Prime Ministers' meeting on this basis does not, of course, imply either self-government or Commonwealth membership.

21. Further memoranda are attached, giving in some detail a summary of the steps taken before admission to Commonwealth membership of (a) the Irish Free State (Appendix V);[†] (b) India and Pakistan (Appendix VI);[†] (c) Ceylon (Appendix VII).[†] I am sending you under separate cover, a memorandum, which I think you said you would like to have, about the stand taken by Canada in 1944 on the question of "expulsion from the Commonwealth".

22. I should now like to revert to the more general problem of procedure for dealing with new members.

23. At the moment I have no very firm views on the interesting suggestion of a "horse-trade" between South Africa and India over the Gold Coast and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. If it would work, it might be a useful expedient; but it would perhaps provide only a temporary breathing-spell, and we are inclined to think that the interested countries would inevitably judge each of the two cases on its merits.

24. There is one general point with respect to timing which may be worth raising. Under the Gordon Walker formula, when would the consultation it envisages take place? In the past, owing to pressure of events, the interval between consultation and some sort of commitment has been so short as to make consultation almost a pure formality. A somewhat longer interval would appear preferable. I assume, incidentally, that the Commonwealth Relations Office are not thinking of consultation after self-government has been granted; this would, of course, at once introduce the transitional period between self-government and Commonwealth membership, of which no case has yet occurred.

25. I fully realize that, with a number of potential new members appearing on the Commonwealth horizon, the old approach may present formidable difficulties in securing general acceptance of a new member. I also appreciate and, indeed, share United Kingdom misgivings over such problems as the attitude of South Africa and the danger of diminishing the value of Commonwealth meetings and other forms of consultation. While there would also be formidable difficulties in the way of the Gordon Walker formula, the difficulty of establishing any other sort of formula is only too evident. In these circumstances, there may be much to be said for avoiding the adoption of a fixed position before a specific case is looming up for actual consideration. We might then hope to find some ad hoc compromise which would give less offence than any defined attitude, based on general principles, which might be adopted now. Even if we could do no better than maintain the status quo for only a few years, until the Gold Coast is ripe for independence, this might be very much worthwhile if it would ensure that the Commonwealth is held firmly together during a period when its role as a bridge between Asia and the West is of great importance and, at the same time, somewhat precarious. We cannot tell what changes may come about in the meantime in South Africa or in Pakistan or even in India. When the time for a decision on the Gold Coast, or on some other candidate for membership is approaching, the United Kingdom could consult the other members confidentially — perhaps individually rather than collectively if that seems expedient — and, in the light of the circumstances then existing, we might decide what is feasible.

26. In conclusion I should like to repeat that we do not rule out the adoption of the Gordon Walker formula or some other appropriate principle, at a suitable time. I do feel, however, that it would be best to move cautiously in this respect, in the meantime using every opportunity for the fullest possible exchange of views. We certainly want to do everything we possibly can, now and in the period ahead, to assist the United Kingdom authorities to devise a solution which will find general acceptance in the Commonwealth.¹⁷ This despatch, in itself, is simply intended to serve as a basis for the fuller discussion which, I understand, you plan to have with the United Kingdom authorities. We are putting forward no fixed or dogmatic views on the best method of approaching this complex problem. I would be grateful if you would discuss the matter again with the United Kingdom authorities at your convenience and let me have your further views in due course.

IV. COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETING¹⁸

25. The Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance said that before the conference began the British had taken stock of their position and that of the sterling area and arrived at the conclusion that no further major step in the area of convertibility could be taken in the immediate future. This had a limiting effect on the discussions at the conference. The agenda for the meetings was routine in nature and covered the usual subjects.

The first item discussed was the position of the sterling area and the outlook for the immediate future. The sterling area in the last eighteen months had been in overall surplus and for the next six months expected to continue in overall surplus — but at a somewhat lower rate and with smaller additions to the reserve.

As in previous meetings, following the forecast for the next six months, there had been a discussion of import policies in the light of the forecast. No changes in policy had been called for. The United Kingdom would continue the trend toward the freeing of trade in raw materials and foodstuffs. Other Commonwealth countries had not indicated any new developments with the exception of the South African non-discriminatory policy on certain imports from the first of the year.

The conference next reviewed the decisions of previous conferences and last year's Prime Ministers' conference on the collective approach as the policy of the sterling area.¹⁹ At this time, two major points came up for discussion — the possible impact of a U.S. recession on the collective approach and, in the light of practices in 1953, the question of whether it was still realistic to expect the United States to adopt good-creditor policies.

On the question of a recession there had at the beginning been a good deal of uncertainty and some apprehension. The discussion had probably reduced, to a certain extent, the fear of a serious or prolonged recession. We had said we anticipated the possibility of a shallow and relatively short recession and it had been concluded that prospects were not such as to justify any change in the course of present policies. The British — although somewhat more pessimistic — were in general agreement that no change in course was necessary at present, but wished to keep in close consultation with Commonwealth countries in case of a downturn. They had, indeed, indicated that they might consider the use of some of their reserves to ride out a short-lived recession rather than resorting to restriction of imports.

On the subject of U.S. good-creditor policies the Canadian delegation had been gratified at the realistic approach displayed by Commonwealth countries toward the situation in the United States. There was a realization that the expectations of last March were too optimistic and that it was unlikely that any dramatic changes would take place in U.S. policies. At the time of the meeting, the Randall Commission had not, of course, reported and there was hope that positive progressive steps might be taken, albeit slowly.

From the discussions, the position of Western Europe with respect to the collective approach seemed disappointing. Little progress had been made in plans for adapting the European Payments Union to convertibility, and little initiative in this direction was being shown. It appeared that West Germany was most interested in convertibility, followed fairly closely by Belgium and the Netherlands. There seemed little interest in other countries, possibly because they found the present system too comfortable. The United Kingdom had indicated that a new effort would be made this year to encourage some enthusiasm toward convertibility in EPU countries.

As far as the attitude of individual Commonwealth countries toward convertibility could be assessed, there appeared to be no attempt to quarrel with, or hold out reservations against, the collective approach as the common programme of the sterling areas, although no mention had been made of timing. The Asiatic Commonwealth countries appeared, in this respect, to have swung into line in the realization that sterling must be re-established in the interests of all as a respectable currency.

It had been noticeable that protectionism was rampant in some countries. It appeared that the views of some groups in certain countries would be difficult to change and therefore, in practice, it would be difficult to move toward the liberalization of trade.

As a final comment, there was some evidence that the monetary and fiscal situation in some countries was somewhat strained. Australia appeared close to inflation and there was some possibility of a similar situation developing in the United Kingdom.

In summary, it was encouraging that, in the formal sense, the immediate future of the sterling area appeared satisfactory and that there was a better understanding, on the part of Commonwealth countries, of the United States position.

26. Mr. Rasminsky agreed generally with Mr. Deutsch's excellent summary. He did feel, however, that although the record appeared good there seemed to be an impression that for domestic political reasons the U.K. Chancellor of the Exchequer would have an increasingly difficult task in moving toward convertibility, especially because of the lack of U.S. good-creditor policies and the possibility of a recession. This would indicate that, although the objective was not being abandoned, there would be very careful thought given to the timing of any moves.

Other sterling area countries, while, in general, agreeing with the collective approach, appeared somewhat less enthusiastic than a year ago. Most countries had eased up on their deflationary policies. Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and Ceylon appeared to be in an inflationary stage and it did not seem likely therefore that there would be much pressure on the United Kingdom from other sterling area countries, except possibly India, for moving toward convertibility.

27. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce reviewed developments in the trade field. In the beginning he had been depressed about the attitudes revealed at the conference but, in private conversations, he had received a degree of encouragement.

In discussions in Canberra, officials had offered to recommend relaxation in certain import controls — notably salmon (up to $500,000); newsprint (up to 45,000 tons) and increased quotas of pulp, soft-wood lumber, agricultural machinery and typewriters. In the broader field, officials said specific proposals, in cases where Canadian goods would undersell U.K. goods, would be considered.

In New Zealand, officials had agreed to prepare a list of items on which concessions might be made. As in Australia, there were certain political difficulties in the way of any measure to free trade, but it seemed that they would be particularly receptive in cases where it could be shown that Canadian items would be cheaper than other imports. New Zealand had asked us to consider buying some butter and cheese from them.

The timing of the talks with Australia and New Zealand appeared good, and some encouragement might be taken from their outcome.

28. The Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs asked when, barring unexpected developments, Finance Ministers might be expected to meet again.

29. Mr. Deutsch said the assumption was that the meetings would be held annually.

30. The Deputy Minister of Finance said that the collective approach would likely be raised at the joint United States - Canadian Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs meeting.²⁰ The United States obviously would be unwilling again to be placed in a position where they appeared to be pushing the collective approach. Presumably, we also should not appear to be in this position. The decision on timing was not for us to make.

31. Mr. Parkinson suggested that, with respect to the collective approach, it might be recommended to Ministers that, while the question of timing was not one for Canada to decide, we might assist in the achieving of the objective as much as possible; for example, in supporting a scheme of assistance by the International Monetary Fund. It might also be suggested to the United States that convertibility and the removal of trade restrictions would be advantageous both to them and to us.

32. The Committee, after some further discussion:

(a) noted the reports by Messrs. Deutsch, Rasminsky and Bull on the Commonwealth Finance Ministers' Conference; and be held here on the 30th of September and the 1st of October, we thought you might like to receive any information that has reached us, scanty though it is. We gather from the British Embassy that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has suggested in a telegram to the Minister of Finance that there should be no agenda for the meetings and that they should be quite informal. However, Rickett has gone over for us the subjects that he would expect to be dealt with; and from his rather routine summary you may be able to glean perhaps a little about the Chancellor's intentions.

(b) agreed that on the question of the collective approach it should be recommended to Ministers that the Canadian position should be one of neither encouragement nor discouragement but that we should be prepared to assist the achievement of the objective in any reasonable way possible.

2. Rickett forecast that, as has now become usual, there would be some examination of the sterling area's short-term balance of payments prospects and that each of the sterling area countries would also be asked to report on internal economic conditions. The Chancellor, he felt sure, would want to initiate a discussion on the present status of the collective approach to freer trade and payments. His opening statement, Rickett thought, would indicate what was not likely to happen rather than suggest a tentative timetable for action in the near future, since it now seemed highly unlikely that current non-resident sterling would be made convertible even next spring. Business conditions in the United States would almost certainly come up for at least brief consideration; and Rickett thought that there would be more extended discussion of United States commercial policy and of the possibility of some liberal steps being taken by Congress at its next session. We will be sending you early next week a summary of our own views on this question.

3. The Chancellor would also be reporting to his Commonwealth colleagues, Rickett said, on his discussions in Washington, as well as in OEEC and in a number of European capitals. As you may be aware, it has been suggested by the United States representatives in the talks that have taken place here at the official level on the problems involved in making sterling convertible, that if the United Kingdom were to be granted a large standby credit by the fund, other sterling area countries should surrender their expectations of any accommodation from the fund. The United Kingdom authorities have made it clear that they could not support any formal move to deny other sterling area countries their rights as members of the fund, although they recognize that the standby proposed for the United Kingdom is to be regarded as support for sterling as an international currency. If the Secretary of the Treasury returns to this question during the bilateral meetings that are to be held with the British next week, the Chancellor will want to discuss this issue at the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers, Rickett indicated.

4. For the bilateral discussions next week the United States Treasury have prepared a draft agenda. The draft sent to the Chancellor for his comments does not differ significantly from the list of topics mentioned by Southard to the Financial Attaché, as reported to Rasminsky in a letter dated the 17 of August.† That list, you may remember, ran as follows:

- (a) The position and prospects of the United States economy;
- (b) Developments in United States foreign economic policy;
- (c) The economic position and outlook for the sterling area;
- (d) The definition of "convertibility" for non-resident sterling;
- (e) Trade discrimination in the post-convertibility period;

(f) The standby.

The main comment that the Chancellor has made on this draft is that, "it seems to be too much directed towards convertibility". There could hardly be a clearer indication of how languidly the brave banners of convertibility are hanging in Whitehall.

PERSONAL AND STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, October 2, 1954

Dear Norman [Robertson]:²²

I think you ought to know privately that the first encounter of our new Minister of Finance with the Chancellor of the Exchequer was hardly a case of love at first sight. Wynne [Plumptre] and Lou Couillard will be in London very soon and I have asked them to have some private word with you to amplify what I can say in a letter. Both of them were in close touch with the Canadian Delegation to the Bank and Fund and Commonwealth meetings, and in a private round-up we had yesterday afternoon before Wynne left for Ottawa I found that Wynne's impressions were the same as my own.

Because Walter Harris was entirely new to these affairs, I had arranged to have a dinner for him the first evening of the Bank and Fund meetings a week ago. In fact, I was quite proud of myself in having landed both the Secretary and the Chancellor as well as other top U.K. and U.S. brass for the occasion. Harris himself was not too enthusiastic about my doing this, but consented on my urging that it would be important that he should establish friendly personal relations chiefly with Butler and Humphrey just as soon as possible.

Well, the dinner went off all right I think, and I managed to get Harris and Butler closeted alone for some little time and subsequently in a small relaxed group. Harris seemed quite happy at the end of the evening, although, as you know, he does not like these affairs much and denies himself severely elements which make them pleasant, or at least passable, for most of us.

The Bank and Fund meetings were, I gather, pretty dull and routine, and I am in no doubt that the Minister found them boring. But probably the continuous social activity, which is apparently inseparable from these meetings, bored him even more. During the five or six days which preceded the actual Commonwealth meetings he saw Butler on several occasions, and there is no doubt that the manner in which the Chancellor chose to express the U.K. attitude on the subject of main concern to Canada (the "collective approach") did nothing to counteract the impressions which the Minister was already acquiring of the whole week's exercises.

The first Commonwealth sessions were held on Thursday. The final one was fixed for Friday morning. Thursday evening when Harris, Towers and I and the other Commonwealth Ministers et al. were to dine with Roger Makins, I heard that the Minister had decided to leave for Ottawa first thing Friday morning (with the whole Ottawa delegation), although, as I knew, he had previously planned to remain until Friday evening. In fact this decision was carried out, although Wynne remained over and with Doug LePan represented Canada at yesterday's meeting.

At Roger's dinner, the Chancellor made a point of collecting me afterwards presumably to explain the position which he and the U.K. Delegation had taken. He said that he realized that our people were pretty unhappy about it, but almost pooh-poohed their disappointment. Although he was pleasant enough and spoke nicely about Harris, he was quite obviously somewhat irritated by the suggestion that anyone else should presume to tell him how to protect sterling. He said that he knew the Commonwealth well, had spent much of his life in many parts of it, and that others simply did not know or appreciate all of the factors involved. His references were not to Harris, but to Canadian officials. He referred to himself as "an artist" in these matters and inferred pretty obviously that he could and would brook no interference.

I do not want to give the impression that the conversation was unpleasant or that Butler was being in any sense rude or impolite.

But he was distinctly patronizing and it was quite evident that his idea of a Commonwealth "family party" was based on the leave-it-to-father principle. I thought perhaps he had been irritated by Harris's decision to leave early, but he assured me that he was not.

At my suggestion, after our own talk, Harris came over and conversed alone with Butler for fifteen or twenty minutes before we left. I gather that he repeated to the Minister much of what he had said to me.

Harris and Towers came down to the Embassy after we had taken our leave and we spent an hour going over the events and impressions of the week. Apart from the business end of the meetings and private conversations (concerning which Plumptre will be able to inform you fully) it was quite evident that, although prepared to make every allowance for Butler on personal and official grounds, Harris had found the Chancellor's attitude and demeanour totally unsympathetic. And certainly he was confirmed in his first suspicion that his coming to Washington for a week when he had so many other preoccupations at home had been a complete and distasteful waste of time.

I hope I have not exaggerated the situation. Perhaps I have. But it is certainly true that this first contact has not left on our man an agreeable impression of one with whom he will have so much to do in affairs which concern both our countries so deeply. I do not suppose that there is very much you can do about this, but because you know Whitehall — and I presume Butler himself — so well I thought I should tell you frankly what has transpired. Mind you, there is no break of any kind or breach in personal, and, of course, not in official, relations. Nevertheless, what I had hoped would be the occasion for the beginning of friendly personal relations has, I fear, turned out badly. Obviously, you cannot breathe a word of this in London, but I thought that in anticipation of future meetings of the two men (who are, of course, so fundamentally different in every way), it might be well for you to have in mind the atmosphere of their first encounter.

I would be glad if you would destroy this letter.

Our love to Yettie [Robertson].

Yours ever,

[A.D.P. HEENEY]

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS, WASHINGTON 1954

Of all the meetings of the Commonwealth Finance Ministers, none can have been less purposeful than the meeting held last week in Washington. Initially arranged as a completely informal meeting, it was altered at the last moment by the circulation of an agenda paper by the United Kingdom authorities. The agenda was difficult because it covered both very broad issues and very technical subjects which might better have been left to officials to handle. It was moreover not carefully adhered to. To add to the confusion and discomfort the proceedings were conducted in a wooden sweatbox, annexed to the United Kingdom Embassy, in which the fans were powerless against the heat but quite powerful enough to muffle discussion so that much of what was said was inaudible.

2. Presumably the United Kingdom's objectives in convening the meeting were

(a) To explain to Commonwealth Finance Ministers why it had been decided to postpone making current non-resident sterling convertible, while at the same time retaining their full support for the initiative; and

(b) To persuade them to agree to the comparatively minor amendments in the United Kingdom proposals that had been introduced primarily in an attempt to meet United States views.

These objectives would not in any case have been easy to accomplish, especially at a time when United States commercial policy provided such little grounds for encouragement. They were made more difficult by the unnecessarily confused course of the discussion and by the poor physical arrangements for the meeting.

3. The high point of the meeting was clearly intended to be the statement by Mr. Butler of why in his opinion the time had come to pause. These remarks can hardly have convinced many in the Chancellor's audience that they had been permitted to glimpse the inwardness of the United Kingdom's decision. The first reason the Chancellor gave for delay was that although he believed the long-term trend of United States trade policy to be in the right direction, it had become clear that the United States was not yet in a position to implement any of the good creditor policies that had been suggested as appropriate in the collective approach. What was still lacking was a permanent method of bridging the dollar gap. There was also the difficulty, the Chancellor went on, that appropriate arrangements had still to be made on the continent of Europe so that there could be an orderly advance on a broad front. The establishment of a European fund seemed a promising way of solving the problems of the continental countries who were not yet ready to go forward. But this would require a good deal more study. As for the sterling area itself, it had surmounted successfully the difficulties created by the United States recession. But its prospective export earnings gave no grounds for complacency; and it was unlikely that the reserves would continue to increase over the next twelve months. Further time was required for sterling area countries to fortify themselves for convertibility and in particular to take steps to increase their exports. The situation within the sterling area by itself was certainly not bad enough to retard a forward movement, but neither by itself was it good enough to warrant a decision to make current non-resident sterling convertible.

4. It had been rumoured that the United Kingdom decision had been taken on purely political grounds. Repudiating that suggestion, the Chancellor claimed that there was apprehension among all parties in the United Kingdom over convertibility. In particular, there was worry about a floating rate. Fear was abroad that this might be used to depress standards of living. It was, therefore, all-important that the move toward convertibility, when it came, should be taken in an atmosphere of stability that would suggest that any fluctuations of the pound could be held within modest limits. There was also anxiety in the United Kingdom about linking its economy too closely with that of the United States. It was for this reason that the Chancellor would prefer to rely on financial support from the International Monetary Fund and forego assistance from the federal reserve system. It had been argued that, unless sterling had the protection that would be afforded by a floating rate, it might be very vulnerable to changes in the world economic climate. The Chancellor said in rebuttal merely, "how much more vulnerable I would be if I took the plunge before I was ready!" Nevertheless, the general lines of progress mapped out by the collective approach were still sound, he insisted. Above all, this was a policy that could bind together in common agreement the United Kingdom, the sterling area, the continent of Europe, Canada and the United States.

5. Representatives of the other Commonwealth countries were then polled for their reactions to the United Kingdom's decision. Their sighs of relief were like steam escaping from a boiler. Sir Arthur Fadden said for Australia that in all the circumstances there was no alternative but to mark time. The Ceylonese Minister of Finance agreed that the goal of convertibility should be approached cautiously. Mr. MacIntyre, the Rhodesian Minister of Finance, thought that the sterling area had done well to pause, Sir Chintaman Deshmukh said for India that in deciding whether or not to cross the Rubicon, it would be well to bear in mind fluctuations on the Potomac. The New Zealand Secretary of Finance felt that the conditions precedent for a move towards convertibility had not yet been met. Mr. Mohammad Ali seemed to sunk in rumination over Pakistan's urgent financial problems that he could do little more than agree wanly with the Chancellor. Dr. Holloway, the new South African Ambassador here, like some midas choked with gold, explained hoarsely that in the long run it would be impossible to support the strain of convertibility unless the price of gold were brought into line with the depreciated value of the United States dollar.

6. It has often been contended by Canadian representatives that in an initiative of this kind there is no standing still. If there is not some forward movement, however slight, there will be retrogression. That view seemed to be amply substantiated at the meeting last week. Mr. Harris touched on the danger of delay in his principal statement. Taking up the Chancellor's comments on the possible vulnerability of sterling, he explained that the Canadian view was not so much that sterling was now vulnerable as that it would be less vulnerable to changed conditions if it were protected by a floating rate. The course of business activities in the United States and of United States commercial policy were uncertain. By January of next year the prospects should be clearer; and all the contingencies that might emerge at that time should be kept in mind. Then he went on to say that all human experience suggested there were risks in long engagements. There might also be risks in a long postponement of the contemplated marriage between the pound and the dollar.

7. If he had not been so polite, Mr. Harris might have added that a long engagement gives a chance for unregenerate habits to reassert themselves. Certainly they were reasserting themselves with a vengeance at last week's meeting. With all the cheerful gruffness of an old lag, Sir Arthur Fadden spoke of the importance of encouraging dollar-saving investment in the sterling area as though no one had ever mentioned to him the advantages of an international division of labour. The Rhodesian Minister of Finance pleaded the cause of imperial preference with complete unconcern over the role that the United States must play in the collective approach if it is to be successful and over the well-known United States views on preferences. As though oblivious of the discussions that had taken place in London two years ago, the New Zealand representative expressed the view that the transitional period should be as long as possible so that the shock to the New Zealand economy that would be caused by eliminating discrimination might be cushioned. Australia, Sir Arthur Fadden declared, must reserve the right to impose import restrictions and was not prepared to agree to any rigid timetable or formula for the dismantling of restrictions or for removing discrimination. To complete the tale of truancy, Sir Chintaman Deshmukh entered a general reservation of the right of under-developed countries to maintain quantitative restrictions over a long period in order to protect their infant industries and to conserve their exchange resources for economic development. This reservation, it must be admitted, had been made and in large measure accepted at the Commonwealth economic conference in 1952. But many of the other objections and reservations that have been listed above marked a considerable retreat from the level of agreement that had been reached in London two years ago.

8. A few efforts, were made by the Chancellor, assisted by Sir Frank Lee, to put down grumbling among the other merchant adventurers and to keep the vessel on its course. Mr. Butler mentioned the necessity of maintaining momentum and said that he hoped to be able fairly shortly to announce some relaxations in the United Kingdom's exchange regulations that should inspire confidence that the United Kingdom was still determined to move towards convertibility. The United States treasury had for some time been urging that legacies should be more freely transferable to the dollar area; he hoped to be able to go some distance towards satisfying that request. He also intended, if possible, to relax the restrictions on travel allowances. None of the moves he had in mind, however, could be characterized as being of major importance, he admitted. When Plumptre expressed the hope that there might be some relaxation of trade restrictions as well, the Chancellor replied that he would endeavour to increase the degree of trade liberalization with OEEC countries. Goods from other parts of the sterling area would also continue to be admitted freely to the United Kingdom in spite of the restrictions against United Kingdom goods that existed in some sterling quarters. However, he could not hold out any hope of a further reduction in discrimination against dollar imports in the near future.

9. The Chancellor also underlined the advantage there would be in a stricter code of trade rules and warned that there would have to be some give and take in the process of working them out. Sterling area countries, Sir Frank Lee stressed, would not be able to write their own ticket and must be prepared to run some risks themselves in return for the commitments they would be seeking from other countries. Although the other representatives at the meeting were willing to concede these points in theory, they seemed to be little impressed by them. Nor did the Chancellor appear to have much more success in defending the International Monetary Fund against the criticism that was levelled at it, particularly by Sir Arthur Fadden. Fresh from his first visit to the fund in three years and from his very considerable oratorical triumphs there, the Chancellor offered the opinion that the fund "is growing up". At this latest conference it had been brought much more into the stream of ordinary life, he thought. Once again, Sir Arthur Fadden seemed unimpressed.

10. One clue to the Chancellor's own preoccupations seemed to emerge at the final meeting of Friday morning, when he returned to the question of a floating rate and stressed again the need for maintaining stability. It will be recalled that, at the Commonwealth economic conference, both India and Pakistan showed great reluctance to link their rupees to the pound unless fluctuations could be held within narrow limits. It was clear that the Chancellor's remarks were directed, in large measure, to Sir Chintanman Deshmukh and Mr. Mohammad Ali to see how far he could trust them to convince their government that the link with sterling should be maintained. Although neither gave any commitments, their worries on this score seemed to have dwindled a good deal. But it also seemed clear that the Chancellor, at this one point at least, was expressing his own worries and was seeking help. The United Kingdom, he said, was basing its financial policies on classical principles and was still convinced of the advantages of a floating rate. Nevertheless, it was becoming clearer and clearer that public opinion in the United Kingdom was apprehensive about it; and the Managing Director of the fund had also spoken to him privately of the need to maintain stability. The problem was how to convince public opinion that stability would be maintained without committing himself to public statements about the limits within which the pound would be allowed to fluctuate. A floating rate would certainly give additional security. Under present circumstances the pound could be defended merely by using the reserves; and it would be a great advantage to have a double protection. But how could the public be convinced that this banker's weapon would not be turned against them? Plumpre remarked that the Canadian authorities were not so worried as the Chancellor seemed to be about this problem. If there were dangers in a flexible rate, there were also dangers in a fixed rate. The Chancellor accepted those remarks agreeably enough but still seemed to be lost in perplexity. Inconclusive as this discussion was, it seemed to suggest that, in the Chancellor's mind at least, the aspect of the collective approach that is most politically sensitive in the United Kingdom is the floating rate.

11. Taking it all in all it is hard to resist the conclusion that the collective approach would be in a better position today if last week's meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers had never been held.

12. In following messages we are reporting on various aspects of the meeting that are of more technical interest.

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS, WASHINGTON, 1954

In our message under reference, we tried to give a general synopsis of the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers. In this telegram we should like to summarize more particularly the results of Mr. Butler's efforts to persuade Commonwealth representatives to agree to the modifications of the original United Kingdom proposals that were outlined in the four papers circulated before the meeting. Insofar as the modifications tended in the direction of a stricter code of commercial conduct, they proved almost completely unacceptable to other sterling area countries.

New Balance of Payments Escape Clause in GATT

2. Except from Canada, there was no support for the United Kingdom proposal that the balance of payments escape clause in GATT should be tightened. Both the Australian and New Zealand representatives opposed the proposal that there should be time limits after which quantitative restrictions must be removed. Sir Arthur Fadden thought that the main objective of preventing other countries from taking unfair advantage of the convertibility of current non-resident sterling could be achieved within the existing GATT articles if consultations among the contracting parties were used to bring pressure to bear on countries discriminating unjustifiably against sterling goods. The Indian and Pakistani representatives were also apprehensive about the proposal for a tighter escape clause in spite of the wide latitude that is contemplated for under-developed countries. Sir Chintaman Deshmukh and Mr. Mohammad Ali argued that under-developed countries in the process of development are likely to be in constant balance of payments difficulties; and they were obviously worried that a stricter provision to regulate quantitative restrictions imposed on balance of payments grounds might be used to limit the right of under-developed countries to impose restrictions in furtherance of their development programmes.

3. After the Indian Minister of Finance had explained in his mild and persuasive way why underdeveloped countries needed virtually unlimited freedom to impose quantitative restrictions, Plumptre said that the Canadian Government had considerable sympathy with the case that had just been put forward. It would, however, be a difficult position to maintain if underdeveloped countries were to claim all the advantages of the trade rules without assuming any of the obligations. To this Sir Chintaman Deshmukh replied that India was prepared to make some sacrifice in order to assist in the development of a common code of commercial conduct.

4. At an earlier stage Plumptre had also expressed Canada's concern that the transitional period should be kept as short as possible. The more dismantling there could be of import restrictions and discrimination in the period before convertibility, the shorter the transitional period could safely be, he suggested. Ashwin of New Zealand, on the other hand, argued that the transitional period would probably have to be protracted and all the other sterling area countries, except the United Kingdom, seemed to agree with this view.

5. The United Kingdom thesis that prior approval should not be required before import restrictions were imposed in an emergency was gleefully lapped up by sterling area representatives, as might have been expected. The Canadian representative said that he had some sympathy with the views which had been advanced by the United Kingdom on this issue but he could also see the force in the United States desire that some form of prior approval should be required. The Canadian authorities still had an open mind on this point, he stated. There was nothing equivocal, on the other hand, about the views of sterling area countries. Without exception they thought that any requirement for prior approval would be unworkable and undesirable.

Respective Roles of the Fund and GATT

6. The United Kingdom's proposal that the fund should be given wider authority to supervise trade restrictions ran into as heavy weather as the proposal for tightening the balance of payments escape clause. Sir Arthur Fadden said that Australia was opposed to extending the influence of the fund over trade matters. One reason for their opposition was that Australia had been given to understand at the time the fund articles of agreement were negotiated that the operations of the fund would be restricted to exchange questions. Secondly, the fund was objectionable from Australia's point of view because it was too much under United States control. The system of weighted voting, United States influence over Latin American countries, and United States preponderance within the international staff, when added together meant that the United States could dominate decisions by the fund. The United Kingdom proposal was therefore unacceptable to Australia. The New Zealand representative suggested that the fund might be authorized to make a determination of whether or not the totality of the restrictions imposed by a country in balance of payments difficulties was justified; but this determination should not be binding on the contracting parties to GATT.

International Organizations

7. The suggestion that a Council of Governors of the fund should be established had a slightly more favourable reception. Plumptre reported that, although the Canadian authorities had not yet reached a firm position on this question, they were disposed to find merit in what the United Kingdom had proposed. Sir Chintaman Deshmukh also expressed some support for the new idea. He thought, however, that the new Council of Governors of the fund should be paralleled by a similar informal GATT body. The two groups could then on occasion meet together if circumstances seemed to make such collaboration desirable. This additional suggestion won considerable support, with Pakistan, Australia and Ceylon rallying behind it; and Mr. Butler promised to give it further consideration and have it discussed with the United States authorities. He warned, however, that one of the principal United States objections to the earlier proposal for a joint GATT-fund committee had been that this would involve creating a new international body, which would require congressional sanction. It was possible that, in the United States view, the establishment of informal committees both of the fund and of the GATT, which could on occasion meet together, might be open to the same objection. Sir Arthur Fadden, who had opposed the United Kingdom proposal from the outset on the grounds that it would strengthen the authority of the fund in trade matters, was only just prepared to swallow the dose when sweetened in the way suggested by the Indian Minister of Finance. Existing arrangements for co-ordination between the work of the fund and of GATT would be satisfactory if they were used more fully, he thought. Throughout this discussion it was very noticeable that the under-developed countries all believed that their problems would be much more sympathetically considered by the contracting parties to GATT than by the fund.

Article XIV and Article VIII of the Fund Articles of Agreement

8. The Chancellor did not invite extended discussion of this issue. But both the Indian and Pakistani representatives said that they would feel safer if their countries remained in the safe anchorage provided by Article XIV and did not run the risks that might lie in moving out into the open water of Article VIII.

9. The preceding message is to be regarded as a draft until it has been cleared with other members of the Canadian delegation at the meeting.

FUTURE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE COLOMBO PLAN

The attached memorandum has been prepared in this Division and approved by Commonwealth, Far Eastern, Defence Liaison (1) and Information Divisions. I regret that it has not been possible to state the case at less length. In view of the fact that Mr. Harris does not have much familiarity with the subject (although officials in Finance are briefing him now), it seemed desirable that Mr. Pearson should be supplied with a fairly full memorandum for the purpose of his consultations with the Minister of Finance and others. I think you will agree that it will be desirable for the Minister to have a memorandum on this subject as soon as possible in view of the imminence of the Colombo Plan meeting and of the need for guidance in connection with our programming of aid for next year.²³

FUTURE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE COLOMBO PLAN

It would seem desirable to have some early decisions, at least in principle, concerning the future of our Colombo Plan activities, especially as the meeting of the Consultative Committee is to open in Ottawa some five weeks from now. Ministerial guidance at this stage would be helpful to the officials concerned both in enabling them to prepare the briefs for our delegation and in providing them with some assumptions on which to base the planning for next year's programme of assistance. You might, therefore, wish to discuss these matters with the Prime Minister and Mr. Sinclair, particularly in view of their recent visits to Asia, as well as with Mr. Harris and Mr. Howe at an early date in order to ascertain their views. We might then prepare a memorandum for consideration by Cabinet.²⁴

2. Ideally, it might be hoped that Ministers would be willing to express views not only regarding the size of next year's contribution but also regarding the length of the future period during which Canada might be prepared to contribute. As you know, there has in the past been general agreement among the governments participating in the Plan that programmes would be considered which would involve the allocations of funds extending over a six-year period ending about June 30, 1957. Although this has been publicly described as the period of the Colombo Plan — and although some results will be expected during that period — we doubt that anyone has regarded this as more than a timetable for planning purposes. It can scarcely have been imagined that the serious problems which originally gave rise to the Plan would all have been resolved within that time and that private investment would be flowing in such volume that special aid from outside would no longer be necessary. Undoubtedly, it has been realised that it would be politically unsound, if not disastrous, to envisage the cutting off of Colombo Plan aid in 1957 with all the implications which that would have for future relations between Asia and the West at a time when those relations are likely to be in a fairly delicate state. While it might be desirable to remove the uncertainty concerning the duration of the Plan, it would appear impracticable to determine now for just how much longer the Plan should continue. For the present, it might be sufficient for Canadian Ministers to arrive at an understanding that June 30, 1957 is not to be regarded as a firm terminal date and that they would be willing to examine at an appropriate stage with other members of the Consultative Committee (but not at the Ottawa meeting) the *length of time for which the Colombo Plan — or its next phase — should run.*²⁵ If the question of extending the period of the Colombo Plan arises at the forthcoming meeting, the Canadian delegation might then take the position that next year would be a better time to make a formal decision since by that time more will be known about the position which is likely to be reached at the end of the present life of the plan.

3. On the immediate question of the proper size of our contribution for 1955-56, a more precise decision would appear to be desirable both for the purpose of enabling planning on our aid programme to go forward and for the guidance of the delegation to the forthcoming meetings. Even if it were to be considered inadvisable to make a specific announcement in the course of the September/October meetings, it would be useful for the delegation to be able to say something on the subject and for the members of the delegation to be aware of what the Government would be prepared to do in order that they might know what attitude to adopt towards the numerous requests which will doubtless be made of them by the various visiting delegations. The question of whether or not it would be advisable at this stage to seek such a decision from Cabinet could perhaps be decided after you have consulted the other Ministers most directly interested.²⁶

4. In discussing this question with your Ministerial colleagues, you may wish to review certain aspects of the Plan with which some of them may not be too familiar.

5. You might consider it particularly desirable to counter any impression that our Colombo Plan activities represent little more than a superficial and futile relief operation which will be submerged by the inexorable growth of population. The following paragraphs bear on this point.

6. To the extent that we have provided wheat and other commodities, our object has been not so much the meeting of the pressing needs of consumers as the creation of local capital ("counterpart funds") to assist the national Governments in financing productive development projects. While a good deal of emphasis has naturally been given to increasing the production of food, it has been appreciated that if real and lasting progress is to be made other parts of the economy must be developed simultaneously. We have tried to ensure that our aid (whether in the form of equipment, or commodities, or technical advice) will foster economic development on as broad a basis as possible. We feel that we have been reasonably successful and that the projects we are supporting under the Colombo Plan will yield widespread and durable benefits. Improvements which we are helping to bring about in the transport and power systems of the countries which we are assisting will have pervasive effects in those parts of the countries where they are located. So too, will the irrigation works which we are aiding. The survey which we are conducting of natural resources can be expected to influence the future development of a whole economy. The cement plant which we are building and the experimental fisheries

²⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

²⁶ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Do not put any figures in the memo at this stage. [L.B. Pearson] work which we are doing will also have lasting effects. The technical training which we are providing should bring about some increase in agricultural and industrial efficiency and productivity.

7. An example of the kind of return which carefully selected projects can yield is provided by the Mayurakshi irrigation and power development in India, which we are helping substantially with equipment, counterpart funds and engineering advice. The increased food production resulting from this project every two years after its completion is expected to be equivalent to its total cost. In addition to the effect which it will have on the size and dependability of food supplies in this area which has so often been afflicted by famine, this project will help to bring about an increase in employment and income (not only on the part of labourers involved in the initial construction work but also of the food producers who will be able to take advantage of the permanently increased productive capacity of the land.) It will, thus, have a stimulating effect on the rest of the economy of that part of India and will provide an incentive for the development of secondary industries to satisfy the new demands.

8. While our Colombo Plan contribution is not in the nature of a temporary relief operation, it is also not intended to be a substitute for — or a competitor with — private investment. Generally it would be accurate to say that we conscientiously try to avoid projects which, on the one hand, appear shaky and unsound or which, on the other, seem to be within the capabilities of the receiving countries themselves or which might be taken on by foreign investors. We concentrate on the “in-between” projects and, within the priorities set by the Asian Government itself, try to select those which will contribute most effectively to the general strengthening of the economy.

9. Although one would not wish to exaggerate how much difference our contribution will make to the improvement of economic conditions in Asia, it seems evident that Canadian aid, reasonably well managed, can have beneficial effects over the years out of proportion to the amount of money involved. In relation to the massive problems of the Asian countries, anything that we might do must almost inevitably appear small. This does not mean, however, that our effort — or an increase in that effort — is not worthwhile. This is particularly true in relation to political stability. The cumulative effect of the programmes which we are able to assist may contribute substantially to the countering of unrest in the Asian countries. Moreover, the spending of our money in aid of these countries in a spirit of cooperative partnership does a great deal to strengthen goodwill toward Canada.

10. In the present situation, and on the basis of our experience of the past three or four years, it would seem reasonable to suggest that it would be in Canada's interest to envisage a significant increase in our Colombo Plan contribution for the coming year. Even if our present standards are rigorously held to (e.g. insistence on sound projects, requirement that the bulk of the goods be of Canadian origin, etc.), and if there is no thought of attempting to dispose of “surpluses” in this area as the U.S. is now doing, there would appear to be a very strong case for a larger contribution. Briefly, the following would seem to be among the considerations which might appropriately be put forward by this Department in support of an increase:²⁷

(a) The Asian countries themselves will have to spend more on development in the coming year if progress is not to be retarded. Apart from any increases in costs, and aside from any new projects which it may be essential to undertake, many projects already under way will have advanced to the stage at which heavy outlays will be required. These heavier expenditures will have to be made without any significant increase in their own local resources, since few of the development projects so far undertaken will have reached the point at which substantial returns will have started to come in. There are economic and political limitations to what these countries can do for themselves in this situation. There are both economic and political risks — for us as well as for them — if their development programmes fail to move forward rapidly enough;

(b) On the basis of proposals already made to us, it would seem clear that, with only the same amount of money as last year, we would have to turn down many projects capable of contributing effectively to the improvement of the longer-term prospects for the economies of India, Pakistan and Ceylon, even though those projects are of a kind which could efficiently absorb the kinds of aid available from Canada. In fact, in the case of Pakistan, we would be unable to take on virtually any new project;

(c) Present indications are that, apart from Canadian equipment (which could readily absorb the whole of an appropriation on the present scale), it will be found desirable to provide some suitable commodity aid (e.g. aluminum and copper) to these three countries (and particularly to Pakistan), in order to ensure that enough local funds will be available to carry on sound projects in which we are directly involved;

(d) In the light of recent reports, it would appear that it may well be possible within the next year for Canada, by a judicious application of aid to specific projects, to make an effective contribution to a solution of the canal waters dispute between India and Pakistan which has been embittering political relations between the two countries, has been aggravating the difficulties over Kashmir, has been raising questions in Pakistan concerning the Commonwealth connection, and has been interfering with the economic development of both countries;

(e) In view of the fact that the inclusion of non-Commonwealth countries in the Colombo Plan accounts in part for its significance as a factor in the Asian situation, it might be advisable for Canada to provide a limited amount of capital assistance to some of these countries (as Australia and New Zealand, as well as the U.S., are now doing). Indonesia, Burma and Nepal have very substantial needs and would seem likely to be able to use any aid from us to good effect;

Do not put this in the memo. I can use it orally at the proper time. L.B. P[earson]

(f) Since a South East Asian Defence Organization is being created in which we may not wish to take part, that might make it all the more important for us to increase in other ways our contribution to the stability of South and Southeast Asia;

(g) In the particular case of the Associated States of Indo-China, we might wish (especially in the light of our participation in the Supervisory Commissions) to do something to help in improving conditions in the remnant of Vietnam, and also in Laos and Cambodia; all of which have been members of the Colombo Plan for some years but have received no capital aid from Canada;²⁸

(h) It would seem clear that, especially in view of the commitments to be carried forward from the current year, more money will be necessary for the technical assistance part of our Colombo Plan operation if even the present scale of those activities is not to be curtailed next year;

(i) A larger Colombo Plan contribution, with whatever tax consequences that might imply, would seem to be in keeping with the increasingly active support which the Canadian public is showing for the Colombo Plan. (If the proposal which has been made for general cultural and educational exchanges with the Asian countries were to be brought within the Colombo Plan, that would be an additional reason for increasing the vote. The question of whether any such exchanges should be handled in this manner or should be dealt with separately from the Colombo Plan is one which may require further consideration.)

11. Some of these considerations are discussed in rather greater detail in an annex† to this memorandum.

12. In the light of these factors, you might wish to suggest that the Canadian contribution for next year should be increased by $10 million, or preferably $15 million. If it is argued that the budgetary position is likely to be extremely tight in the next fiscal year, you might wish to consider whether you would be prepared to acquiesce in a corresponding, or even slightly more than corresponding, reduction in the Mutual Aid programme (which is, of course, covered by a Department of National Defence vote, but which has been championed mainly by this Department in the past).²⁹ It would seem that, even with such a reduction, we would be left with a Mutual Aid programme which would be of a respectable size in comparison with that of other countries and one which would be tolerable from the point of view of this Department. While no doubt you would not wish to advocate such a curtailment of our Mutual Aid (and while some other Departments may now be at the point where they would wish to maintain the size of that programme), you may feel that a reduction would be warranted if it was necessary in order to enable Canada to provide aid to South and Southeast Asia on an adequate scale.

13. Even an increase of the order suggested above would not permit of much assistance to Indo-China if other high priority claims are to be met. If it were to be decided that very substantial aid should be given to the Associated States, it would be necessary to increase our Colombo Plan contribution still further or to seek a special vote. You may wish to make it clear that the suggestion of an increase of $10 or $15 million is based on the assumption of only fairly modest aid for Indo-China (say $1 or $2 million). This assumption — which is the best that can be made now — might have to be reviewed later when the situation is clearer.

Dear Mr. Ritchie:

RE COLOMBO PLAN — EXTENSION OF CAPITAL ASSISTANCE TO NON-COMMONWEALTH COUNTRIES

At recent meetings of the Colombo group there has been some discussion of the possibility that Canadian capital assistance under the Plan might be provided not only to the three Commonwealth countries in the area, India, Pakistan and Ceylon, but also to non-Commonwealth countries. Amongst the non-Commonwealth countries that have been mentioned are Nepal, Burma, Thailand, Indonesia, and the Associated States of Laos, Cambodia and Vietnam (Indo-China).

I understand that Mr. Pearson may in the near future raise with Mr. Harris the question whether next year's Vote for the Colombo Plan should be enlarged to allow for the inclusion of non-Commonwealth countries. This letter is not concerned with that issue. However, since the time left before the meeting of the Consultative Committee in Ottawa is now very short, it seems desirable to go as far as possible towards getting interdepartmental agreement on the following question: if Ministers did decide that non-Commonwealth countries should obtain capital assistance, which countries should be chosen for such assistance?

I believe that there are a number of principles that should be kept in mind in making this choice:

(a) The countries should be so chosen as to maintain, and, if possible, increase the public support for the Colombo Plan which is already so widespread in Canada. India, Pakistan and Ceylon are familiar to many Canadians, both because of their relationship to the Commonwealth and previously to the Empire, and also because of commercial ties, missionary ties, etc., etc. I believe that much of the public support for the Colombo Plan stems from the fact that many Canadians feel that they have some sort of connection with the recipient countries. If we are going to add new countries, and at the same time maintain the popularity of the Plan, these considerations will have to be kept in mind. They are considerations that probably militate against such areas as Nepal and the Indo-Chinese States and Thailand, and argue in favour of Burma and Indonesia.

(b) We would want to be assured that we had the necessary experience and contacts in the country to ensure, as far as possible, that investment of substantial sums of money would not be wasted or frittered away, and that the investment subsequently would be reasonably well looked after. This is a tall order, but I do not see how we can avoid the responsibility. As you know, I have always felt that it would be a precarious operation to establish a capital assistance programme in a country with which we had not got fully developed political and economic connections — in short, in a country where we did not have representation, both by External Affairs and Trade and Commerce. We have enough difficulty keeping track of our affairs in India, Pakistan and Ceylon as it is, and we rely heavily on permanent Canadian representation in those countries and, to a lesser extent, on the representatives of India and Pakistan in Ottawa. This criterion or principle leads towards the conclusion that the first non-Commonwealth recipient of Canadian capital assistance in the Colombo Plan area should be Indonesia.

(c) The existence of fully developed Canadian representation in a recipient country provides not only for some effective form of economic and commercial guidance relating to our projects, but also provides a means of ensuring that the fundamental political purposes of the Colombo Plan can be pursued. Our Missions in the countries concerned can help us in avoiding political pitfalls, and can also help us to get political capital in the form of official and public recognition of Canadian aid. This argument also points towards Indonesia.

(d) Finally, if we are to go beyond the three Commonwealth countries, I feel that we should move slowly and carefully, and in particular we should not take on more than one additional country at a time. It is no criticism of our administrative machinery to say that we must not add heavy burdens quickly and indiscriminately. There is a limit to what Mr. Cavell and his associates should be expected to do. If we are going to extend aid to an additional country, it should be a matter that is undertaken very seriously and without haste. Our objective should be to avoid waste of any sort, and this will be more difficult outside the Commonwealth than in it, because of the less stable governments and because of the absence of traditions of administration somewhat similar to our own.

(e) It goes without saying that wherever Canadian capital assistance is applied we should try to maintain, and if possible improve upon, the general criteria of economic soundness and social betterment which we have always applied to our capital assistance projects.

I am not really arguing positively the case for aid to Indonesia; it is only that Indonesia seems to "win" as a result of elimination of others. Further, there is difficulty in choosing one non-Commonwealth country and rejecting all others — not only others in Southeast Asia, but others in different quarters of the world. It is relatively easy to defend our present position: aid to Commonwealth countries only under the Colombo Plan, and aid to other under-developed countries through the International Bank and United Nations programmes such as technical assistance. We might, of course, do something for Burma, as an ex-Commonwealth country, without seeming to make invidious comparisons; as to the constitutional status of Nepal, I find myself hazy!

If, despite the difficulties, it was decided that one additional country should be eligible for assistance out of the Colombo Plan Vote, then I think we should make a very careful investigation of the situation in that country to decide what form our assistance ought to take. I would assume that Mr. Cavell on his next trip to the East would spend some time there, and he would probably wish to be accompanied by officials of one or two of the other Departments concerned. As he himself has emphasized, the fact that backward countries may not have come up with very attractive proposals in the past may well reflect administrative incapacity there, rather than absence of need; and it may well be that a Canadian group going there could find a very appropriate form for Canadian assistance.

Meanwhile, at the coming meeting of the Consultative Committee in Ottawa, Canadian Ministers might, if they had already decided to extend the coverage of our capital assistance, indicate on the one hand that Canada was for the first time going to go outside the Commonwealth in supplying aid, but at the same time we were anxious to move slowly and carefully in order to make our aid effective; it would be unreasonable, either now or in the future, to expect Canada to diffuse its assistance amongst all the possible applicants.

As you will see from the above, I do feel that in extending our capital assistance to non-Commonwealth countries, we should not allow all the initiative to lie in the hands of the would-be recipients. I do not think that we should sit back and wait for applicants, and then pick up the first requests that happen to meet our criteria of economic soundness and social betterment. I believe that this policy, or lack of it, might lead us into some very queer situations indeed — situations which would be likely to undermine support for the Colombo Plan in this country. Further, I believe that we shall get into an invidious situation between would-be applicants if we do not take a positive line in explaining why we are giving to some non-Commonwealth countries and not to others.

I would be interested in knowing whether you and my colleagues in our Colombo Plan group agree with what I have said above. I am sending copies of this letter to Messrs. Cavell, Finlay Sim, and Rasminsky.

Yours very truly,

A.F.W. PLUMPTRE

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE COLOMBO PLAN AND TO THE UNITED NATIONS
EXPANDED PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

You will recall that I mentioned to you the other day in our conversation, the possibility of using some of the appropriations which I hope we will be able to save in the forthcoming year through a reduction of NATO military Mutual Aid, to an increase in our contributions to the above programmes which are also, and in a real sense, Mutual Aid of a very important kind.

So far as the Colombo Plan is concerned, we have been subscribing $25 million a year. I would hope that we could add, say, $10 million to this amount next year from Mutual Aid reductions. This plan has been a most successful venture, and has already paid important dividends, not only in terms of actual assistance to the Asian countries, but in strengthening the friendly relations between Canada — and other countries — and this very important part of the world: as such, it is strengthening peace. The Indian, Pakistani and other governments are continually referring to the Colombo Plan as a strong bond of friendship between their countries and ours. It is an example of Eastern-Western co-operation which rouses no suspicions and is accepted as having no ulterior motives.

On the economic side, the Mayurakshi irrigation and power development project in India, for instance, is expected to pay for itself out of resulting increased food production every two years.

In so far as the U.N. programme is concerned, we contributed last year $1 1/2 million to it, which was an increase of $500,000 over the year before. I would hope that we could add $1 million of Mutual Aid savings to this contribution. The U.N. programme is becoming increasingly effective, but is operating on a very low budget indeed, in view of the work to be done; something around $25 million, I believe. Having in mind the wide public support which the programme enjoys in Canada, and the continuing need, I would hope that the above increase would be acceptable.³⁰

I am sure that you will agree with me that nothing is much more important in the fight against Communist penetration of Asia than assistance of the kind we have been giving under the Colombo Plan and the United Nations scheme. I think that Canada can play a more important part in the fight against Asian Communism by assistance of this kind than by joining organizations such as SEATO. Also, increased assistance in this field would be a convincing answer to those in Canada who argue that we are not interested in Pacific and Asian affairs because of our reluctance to become associated with regional defence associations in that area.

Something really big and imaginative has to be done in Asia in the social, economic and technical assistance fields if the ground that is being lost because the Communists have been able to identify themselves with nationalism and change, is to be regained.

For the above reasons, I would be glad to take up both the above proposals with the Minister of Finance, and then in Cabinet, but I would like before doing so to have your confirmation of the general approval you gave to the idea the other day.³¹

NEXT YEAR'S CANADIAN COLOMBO PLAN CONTRIBUTION

You are doubtless considering whether the question of an increase in the Colombo Plan contribution, on which you have consulted the Prime Minister, should be discussed with Mr. Harris before or after he leaves for Washington on September 23 for the Bank and Fund meetings. You are no doubt also considering whether a definite decision by Cabinet should be sought before the end of the Colombo Plan ministerial meetings. There would seem to me to be arguments both for and against an early settlement of this question.

It might well be considered desirable to defer carrying this matter further until after the Colombo Plan meeting when more may be known of the needs of the Asian countries and the Canadian Ministers involved in the meetings might be expected to have a somewhat more sympathetic attitude.

On the other hand, there is a good deal to be said in favour of an early decision. For the purpose of the numerous discussions which Canadian Ministers and officials will inevitably have with visiting representatives during the forthcoming meetings, it would be helpful to know what is in prospect even though we may not intend to give definite commitments at that stage to particular Asian countries which may approach us. Those of your colleagues who will be meeting the visiting Ministers may see some advantage in having an understanding in advance which would permit them to determine how warmly or coolly to receive such requests as may be put to them.

³¹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Yes L. St.L[aurant]

You may also think it desirable to have an early decision if you feel that the other delegations and the Canadian public would expect some announcement concerning Canada's intentions to be made during (but possibly towards the end of) the ministerial meeting. In this connection it would seem likely that Australia will be announcing an increased contribution in the course of the meeting. New Zealand has already indicated that, although it had found it necessary to limit its original contribution to three years, it is now making provision for a new contribution for the fourth year. It is not known whether other countries will have something to say about their plans for the future.

In view of the fact that this Friday would appear to be about the only day on which you and Mr. Harris might have an opportunity to discuss this subject before the meetings begin, I thought it desirable to remind you of these considerations. On balance I am inclined to think that it would be desirable to have a talk with Mr. Harris at this stage and to secure a decision from Cabinet before the Colombo Plan meetings end. If, of course, you were to find Mr. Harris rather unreceptive at this particular time, you might then consider it undesirable to force the issue and might conclude that further discussion and the final decision by Cabinet might best be deferred.³²

COMMENTS CONCERNING THE SELECTION OF COUNTRIES TO BE ASSISTED BY CANADA IN THE FUTURE UNDER THE COLOMBO PLAN

The participation of non-Commonwealth countries is clearly a wholesome feature of the Colombo Plan. A plan which consisted only of Commonwealth countries (and territories) would not have the same significance as a factor in the Asian situation.

2. In recognition of the importance of securing the cooperation of all the countries in South and South-East Asia, not only the U.S. but also several of the Commonwealth countries (i.e. Australia and New Zealand, and, in a sense, the U.K.) have been providing capital aid to non-Commonwealth participants. If Canada continues to confine its aid to Commonwealth countries, we may well appear more royalist than the king (or queen), and we may encourage misunderstandings concerning our motives and concerning the nature of the Plan both in the other Asian countries and in the United States.

³² Note marginale :/Marginal note:

I will try to see Mr. Harris tomorrow and then decide on the best time to bring this matter up in Cabinet. L.B. P[earson]

3. It may not be possible to determine now in what proportions any increase in Canadian aid should be divided between the old recipients and the newcomers. That determination would doubtless be affected by the relative quality and urgency of the projects which are put forward (e.g. those relating to the Canal Waters dispute in India and Pakistan). It would seem desirable, however, to decide at this stage that in principle the Canadian Government is prepared to contemplate some capital aid to non-Commonwealth countries under the Colombo Plan in the coming year, especially if it proves possible to increase our total contribution significantly.

4. Given the fact that substantial requirements exist in all of the Colombo Plan countries in the Area, the main consideration in selecting, or in determining the order of precedence of, the non-Commonwealth countries to be assisted would seem to be a combination of:

(a) the relative importance of the various countries in maintaining the political stability of the Area; and

(b) the extent to which assistance to particular countries would be likely to maintain and, if possible, increase the public support for the Colombo Plan which is already so widespread in Canada.

5. These criteria may not point directly to — or automatically rule out — any single country. It is clear that Indonesia is an important factor in the political situation in the Area and the interest of the Canadian public in the welfare of the Indonesians is presumably implied in the existence of our diplomatic mission there. At the same time, Burma also has an important political position in South Asia and would seem to be well regarded by sections of the Canadian public. (Not only was she once a member of the Commonwealth, but Canadians have recently served there in positions of prominence under the U.N., and its needs received a considerable amount of attention from members of the Conservative and CCF parties during the recent session of the Parliamentary Committee on External Affairs). The political importance of the Indo-Chinese States at the present time is readily apparent and the presence of a Canadian element in the Supervisory Commissions (in addition to the active part which Canadians have played in the technical assistance operations of some of the U.N. agencies in that area) would seem to reflect — or is likely to lead to — an interest on the part of the Canadian public in the welfare of those countries. Nepal may not be too well known in Canada — except in connection with Everest expeditions — and it may not be large enough to have substantial influence on Asian affairs. Nevertheless, she is in an exposed position and might be more likely than some other countries to go — or be taken — the wrong way in the absence of encouragement from the West. Such a development (as in the case of Tibet) could have fairly widespread demoralizing consequences.

6. If on this score there would seem to be no basis for selection, it would seem desirable to go on to consider the prospects in terms of:

(a) the possibility, in the circumstances of each country, of finding and carrying out projects which are economically sound and will contribute to social betterment;

(b) our ability to provide the types of aid which each country is able to use;

(c) the extent to which the amounts of aid which we might make available would be likely to make a significant impression in the different countries.

7. With respect to the first of these supplementary criteria the adequacy of the administrative machine in the various countries would obviously be a factor. From this point of view, there may not be much to choose among the countries concerned. It might be noted, however, that in the case of Nepal we might have the benefit of the relatively advanced administration of the Indian Army (at least on the road-building project) and in the case of the other countries we might be able to overcome — or avoid — most of the administrative deficiencies by selecting projects which were not too large or complex (e.g., avoiding counterpart fund ventures or complicated construction projects) or by providing for more detailed technical and administrative supervision by Canadian personnel than has been customary.

8. While in this latter connection the presence of a Canadian diplomatic mission might be of some value, it would appear that, where such detailed supervision was really required, it would be considerably beyond what a mission could supply, and special arrangements would probably be called for whether or not we were represented by a small diplomatic mission in the country concerned.

9. The second criterion would seem to be somewhat more concrete. If we examine the prospective recipients in terms of their ability to absorb the particular kinds of goods which can be procured under the Plan from Canadian sources, Nepal (with its roadbuilding programme) would seem to emerge as a strong candidate on the basis of such information as we have from the various countries so far. Investigation in some of the other countries would, no doubt, also yield projects which could make good use of the kinds of commodities which under present policies we are able to make available.

10. There are, of course, other aspects of the "types of aid" available from Canada which might help in our choice between countries. For one thing, our aid can often be supplied in the French language (a feature of not only our technical assistance but also of descriptions of equipment, supervisory engineering service, etc.). None of the other "donors" is equally well placed in this regard. As a consequence, some of them — and the Indo-Chinese States themselves — might reasonably expect us (and have shown signs that they expect us) to do something in those countries where this is a factor.

11. Another feature of one type of aid which might make us look sympathetically on certain candidates is that our assistance does not create troublesome suspicions or offend national sensibilities; a feature which makes it more difficult for some countries than for others to receive similar assistance from the larger powers. For example, Burma has had difficulty in accepting U.S. aid in view of their differences over the Nationalist Chinese forces. Nepal has had to be careful about U.S. aid because of Indian suspicions, and Indonesia has been worried by the possibility that its position might be — or appear to be — compromised by acceptance of U.S. aid. The fact that those countries have to go very carefully in accepting U.S. aid (and in some cases even have to refuse it) might be regarded as a reason for Canada to go out of its way to do something for them.

12. Concerning the third of the supplementary criteria — i.e., the probable impact of our aid in one or another receiving country — this should presumably be looked at from both an economic and political (or psychological) point of view. The former is difficult to judge in the absence of fuller knowledge about possible projects. The latter is also hard to assess since it depends partly on the effectiveness of the means of communication or publicity within each country. There might be a presumption that, given the limited amount of our aid, the smaller the country the more marked would be the effects. What might be lost sight of in a big country would loom large in a small one. On this basis, Nepal would obviously lead the list. In Cambodia and Laos, too, a little might go a long way.

13. The presence of a Canadian mission might be a factor in this connection also, although its significance would depend on the importance which we attach to publicity for Canada itself as an aim of our Colombo Plan contribution. If a more important objective is to strengthen the existing friendly regimes, we might feel it desirable for them to get most of the credit, and we might be content with the modest publicity which would come our way even though we had no mission in the country. (In this connection, publicity for New Zealand in the Asian countries which it is helping does not seem to have suffered significantly from the fact that there is no New Zealand diplomatic mission anywhere in the Area.

14. It may seem regrettable that the application of the various criteria set forth above does not lead to any clear-cut order of priority. This may be inevitable, since at least in the present state of our knowledge there may be no adequate basis for choosing among the various non-Commonwealth countries. Certainly, it would seem that the addition of numerous other standards (even if their validity was not questionable) would be unlikely to advance us further towards a selection. As noted above, the presence or absence of a Canadian mission would scarcely appear to provide an acceptable basis for discriminating among these countries. As has been noted elsewhere, this is a qualification which other countries might be quite willing to meet if it appeared that we were attaching a great deal of importance to it. It would also not seem to be very satisfactory to make the choice merely on the basis of which countries have already made requests to us. (Such a criterion would point in the direction of Burma and Cambodia). A "first come, first served" principle would not appear to be a very rational guide in a matter as important as the distribution of Colombo Plan aid. An examination of the varying degrees of Canadian commercial interests in the different countries would also not seem to carry us very far. While we may have particular interests in some countries, they would not appear to be significant enough to be decisive.

15. In these circumstances, it would not seem to be either wise or practicable to make, or announce, a choice of merely one, or possibly two countries, as new recipients of Canadian Colombo Plan assistance in the coming year, since such a choice can hardly be made on a basis which would be valid from our point of view and would be understandable to all of the non-Commonwealth countries in the Plan. It might do more harm than good to make a selection which appeared to be of an arbitrary character.

16. It has been suggested that to take on more than one new country might give rise to certain difficulties. For instance, if we go that far, other countries outside the Plan might wonder why we could not provide for them as well. This question would seem to have been raised, however, by the mere fact that the non-Commonwealth countries had been admitted to the Colombo Plan in the first place. That action in itself might seem to have provided a basis for the Middle Eastern and Latin American countries to ask why, if those countries were being provided for, it would not be possible for them to receive aid as well. The mere fact that Canada might not follow the example of other donors in the Colombo Plan and extend its aid to non-Commonwealth members would seem unlikely to increase the risk of pressure for aid from outside countries.

17. Another difficulty mentioned has been that the provision of aid to several new countries within the Colombo Plan would increase the strain on our administrative organization. This (like the presence or absence of Canadian diplomatic missions) is a factor which would clearly have to be kept in mind in determining the amount and types of aid to be given to the different countries. It would seem possible, however, to arrange useful assistance programmes of an appropriate kind for several countries without greater administrative difficulties than would be involved in concentrating any increase in our aid on a single country. If, of course, it were to appear later than in order to carry out worthwhile programmes in the various countries (or, for that matter, to execute a larger programme in a single country) there was need to increase and strengthen our administrative organization, that would presumably be something that could be done. This difficulty would not seem to be an insuperable obstacle to the undertaking of whatever kind of aid programme seems most suitable with whatever additional funds the Government and Parliament may decide to make available.

18. In the light of this discussion, the following might seem to be the best course for us to follow at this stage:

(a) we might recognize that the magnitude of the needs of the non-Commonwealth countries (together with the increasing requirements of Commonwealth countries) would provide adequate justification for any increase in our Colombo Plan contribution which is likely to be practicable in the coming year;

(b) we might agree that, in principle, there would be no objection to the consideration of projects put forward by any non-Commonwealth members of the Colombo Plan and that it might be desirable in certain cases for us to take the initiative in investigating the possibilities of providing useful aid to particular countries;

(c) we might defer a decision as to precisely which Commonwealth countries might be helped and in what amounts;

(d) at the forthcoming Colombo Plan meeting:

(i) any reference to the possibility of an increased Canadian contribution, in the light of such decisions as the Government may have made by then, should be in pretty general terms and without too clear an indication as to whether or not our aid in the future would extend beyond the present recipients;

(ii) the Canadian delegation might adopt a cautious attitude towards any requests that are made and might be careful to warn any applicants that the mere receipt of such requests does not imply that aid will be forthcoming, since all such requests will have to be investigated thoroughly from the technical, administrative and supply points of view and determinations will have to be made in the light of the limitations on our resources and of the competing requests submitted by others;

(iii) we might explore informally but as thoroughly as possible with the Nepalese and Cambodian delegations the projects which they have already submitted (although in the latter case we might be at particular pains to point out that the whole question of the provision of capital aid to any of the Associated States of Indo-China will have to be looked at in the light of our participation in the Supervisory Commissions as well as in the light of the other considerations mentioned above);

(iv) we might endeavour to secure some clear indication from the Indonesian delegation of the types of capital aid which they might seek from Canada, and we might make some arrangements for further non-committal discussions with the Indonesians in Djakarta;

(v) we might await some indication from the Burmese of the kind of aid which they feel could usefully come from Canada (e.g., assistance in the health field which was referred to in the House of Commons Committee on External Affairs and possible assistance in connection with an aerial survey which one of their delegates was to discuss with the Canadian authorities as a Burmese Government-financed project if he had not been killed in the Shannon air crash;

(e) subsequently arrangements might be made for exploratory visits by Mr. Cavell or other members of his administration (accompanied by such officials of other Canadian Government Departments as may be appropriate) to some or all of the countries where it then appears that we may be able to do some really useful work.

NEXT YEAR'S CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION UNDER THE COLOMBO PLAN

As you know, a memorandum is being submitted at an early meeting of Cabinet concerning possible Canadian contributions to various United Nations programmes including United Nations technical assistance to under-developed countries. You may consider that in connection with that memorandum some mention should be made of the somewhat related question of the size of our contribution under the Colombo Plan in 1955-56. You may also feel that, in any event, it would be useful to have a decision concerning our Colombo Plan contribution while the Consultative Committee is meeting in Ottawa.

You are familiar with Mr. Pearson's views on this subject as a result of the exchange which you have had with him during the past few days and I understand that you are in general agreement with his proposal that our contribution should be increased by some $10 million in the coming year. If Mr. Pearson is not able to be present at the Cabinet meeting at which these matters are to be discussed, you may feel that you yourself should raise the question of increasing our Colombo Plan contribution since Mr. Pearson has not had an opportunity to discuss the subject with Mr. Harris or his other Ministerial colleagues. I am therefore attaching a copy of the memorandum which Mr. Pearson sent to you on September 9 together with copies of notes setting forth the considerations which point in the direction of an increased Canadian contribution.³³

CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN SOUTH AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA; REPORT ON CURRENT MEETING

19. The Minister of Fisheries said that, apart from meeting delegates properly on arrival in Ottawa, the general arrangements for the Colombo Plan Conference were excellent.³⁴ The meetings appeared to have gone well and the Asians were particularly gratified with the reception they had received. All delegates were looking forward to the tours of Canada which they were going to make. At the ministerial talks it had been agreed to admit Thailand and Japan, the former as a recipient and the latter as a donor country. There had been no difficulty over Thailand. The principal reason for that country not becoming a member of the organization thus far was that there was no need to join because of the large amount of assistance received from the United States. However, now that all the South-east Asian countries had agreed to become members, Thailand felt that she should no longer stay out. Burma and Indonesia had some objections to Japan's admission, having in mind the brutalities that had occurred during the war and reparations problems which had not yet been settled. However, they eventually had agreed that Japan be admitted. In this connection, some Asian nations were concerned lest the provision of technical assistance by Japan for fishing might lead to the appearance of Japanese fishing fleets near their shores.

The question of raising Canada's annual contributions had still to be settled. This however was related to the question of giving aid to countries not in the Commonwealth and to the renewal of the Colombo Plan beyond its present life of six years.

20. The Minister of Finance added that it seemed possible that any statement on increased contributions could be postponed for the present. The plan had two years to run, although many projects would probably not be completed within that period. The question of renewal of the plan, therefore, would not come up until next year. He himself opposed an increase in contributions at this time. While it was true that Pakistan and Ceylon were in difficulties, the position of other countries had improved. No country at the conference had indicated that its contributions would be increased, although some had said that the rate of spending from amounts already committed would go up. The full $25 million donated by Canada for the current year and approximately $8 million from the past still remained to be spent.

21. In the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Difficulties had arisen in connection with a cement plant in Pakistan and, if these were to be overcome, Canada might have to exercise stricter financial control of the project. It might also be necessary to devote another $1 million to it perhaps from counterpart funds. Ceylon's financial position was weak and there was a requirement for capital assistance so that the fullest possible use could be made of aid already given to that country under the Plan. While it would be desirable to provide aid in Indonesia and Indo-China, plans for projects in these countries were not very far advanced.

(b) Insofar as the question of increasing contributions was concerned, Canada might take the position at the meeting that $33 million was available to be spent and that the government had an open mind as to what its future contribution under the Plan might be. In any event, the question of continuing the Plan would not be settled until the following year.

22. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Ministers of Finance and Fisheries on the current meeting of the Consultative Committee for Economic Development in South and South-east Asia, and deferred decision on the question of increasing the Canadian contribution for capital aid and technical assistance.

NEXT YEAR'S COLOMBO PLAN CONTRIBUTION

In connection with any conversations which you may be having on this subject with Mr. Harris (or in Cabinet) over the next few days, you may wish to have at hand the attached statement which Mr. Sinclair made in the Consultative Committee on behalf of the Canadian Delegation. Paragraph 14 deals with the question of the contribution which Canada might make in the coming year. This statement was approved by Mr. Harris and is understood to be in line with the tentative conclusion reached by Cabinet on October 6.

Presumably, in concluding that any decision to increase Canada's contribution should be deferred, Cabinet was moved either by the fact that the budgetary prospects were too unclear or by some judgement that the needs of the Asian countries for increased assistance were not yet apparent.

While it may not be possible now (or even in the future) to catalogue the essential requirements of the Asian members of the Colombo Plan in detail, it would seem evident that the need for outside aid is greater than it has been in the past if the development programmes are to maintain their momentum and if a reasonable degree of stability is to be achieved. With respect to our own contribution this is all the more true if allowance is made for the desirability of our doing something for those Asian members of the Plan whom we have not been helping in the past.

It is understood that Mr. Harris returned from the Washington meetings of the Bank and the Fund with the impression that India's need for external aid had diminished or disappeared entirely. It is to be hoped that the statement which Mr. Deshmukh made to the Colombo Plan Consultative Committee here will have corrected Mr. Harris' apparent misconception on this point. As Mr. Deshmukh observed: "If anyone asked the question, what would you do if there were no foreign assistance available, our answer could only be 'Well, we will get on as best as we can', but it simply means that instead of aiming at doubling the national income in 20 years we may have to aim at doubling it in 40 years." In view of the very low living standard which even a doubling of the Indian national income over a twenty-year period would permit, it would seem clear that Mr. Deshmukh could hardly have intended to suggest that India did not seriously need outside help.

To the extent that the discussion in Cabinet was influenced by Canada's uncertain — or even unpromising — revenue and expenditure prospects for the immediate future, it would be hard for this Department to question the judgement of the Department of Finance. If, however, you would be prepared to contemplate that an increase in our Colombo Plan contribution might be accompanied by a reduction in the amount which would otherwise be spent on mutual aid next year — as you suggested in your memorandum to the Prime Minister — it would not appear that such an increased contribution would worsen the budgetary outlook.

The reference in Mr. Sinclair's statement, and apparently in some of Mr. Harris' press interviews, to the fact that over $32 million of the money voted in previous years is still unspent would seem to be of limited significance in relation to the question of how much money we should provide next year. By far the larger part of this unspent balance has already been committed or is under active negotiations and cannot therefore be regarded as available for new projects. Unless more than $25 million is appropriated next year it will not be possible to programme for significantly more than that amount.

I do not know whether you would think it worthwhile to press for a more definite decision at this stage regarding the size of next year's contribution. From both the External Affairs and the Finance points of view it might be doubted that a continuation of the present uncertainty is very satisfactory, even though there may be an implied willingness to consider raising the contribution later in the year if that appears warranted. If the other Colombo Plan countries (and particularly those non-Commonwealth countries which are not now receiving any aid from us) assume from Mr. Sinclair's statement that our contribution next year will be the same as in the current year, they may come to the conclusion that we have closed the door on them entirely. Alternatively, if the matter is left indefinite, but with some intimations such as those contained in paragraph 14 of Mr. Sinclair's statement and in certain oral remarks made by the Prime Minister and Mr. Harris, those countries may think that we are prepared to contemplate a larger increase than would be realistic in practice. In other words, indefiniteness may seem equivalent to an almost open-ended commitment. Such a situation could easily lead to serious disappointments and misunderstandings and might give rise to questions concerning our good faith.

Administratively, we also have difficulty in seeing how an arrangement of the kind apparently envisaged in the Cabinet discussion could be made to work efficiently. Would we be expected to go about looking for good projects or would the intention be that we should merely consider such projects as may come to us? The former procedure would be hard to keep in bounds if the amount of available funds was not known and the latter, rather haphazard approach, would scarcely be likely to produce the best projects from our point of view.

As indicated in an earlier memorandum, it would appear to be tidier and more satisfactory for the Government to settle now on what it regards as a reasonable figure and then to proceed methodically within that amount to select over the next few months the countries and projects which might most advantageously be helped by us. For these purposes an increase of some $10 million (possibly at the expense of an equivalent amount of mutual aid) would seem to provide a basis for an effective programme next year.

I am attaching some brief notes† setting forth certain considerations with which you are already familiar which point in the direction of an increase in Canada's contribution under the Colombo Plan in 1955-56.

INTRODUCING THE CANADIAN SECTION OF THE CONTRIBUTIONS
CHAPTER ON OCTOBER 6, 1954

1. At the meeting in New Delhi last year, where we enjoyed the very warm hospitality of our Indian colleagues, I had the privilege of introducing the Canadian section of this chapter. I also had the pleasure of inviting the members to Canada for the next meeting, and am happy now to see the largest and most representative gathering of the Colombo Plan here in our national capital.

2. Before I left for New Delhi last fall, Prime Minister St. Laurent told me to spend some time in South and South-East Asia after the meetings, to learn first hand some of the problems of the area. My wife and I spent almost three months out there, visited almost every country in the Plan, were warmly received and given every opportunity to meet the leaders of the countries and see their programs of development. It was a wonderful experience, and has helped me tell our people in Canada of the problems of Asia, and the great efforts your peoples are making to conquer the problems.

3. When this meeting is over Prime Minister St. Laurent hopes that as many of the delegates as possible will similarly accept our hospitality and see a cross section of our country. We have as you know, arranged a train tour of Central Canada immediately after these meetings, followed by a choice of a plane tour of Eastern and Northern Quebec or a train tour to our four Western provinces, finishing off in Vancouver on October 23rd. This will give you who have come a long way a chance to see some of the developments in our country. It will also give our Canadians, farmers, fishermen, miners, loggers, factory workers, professional men and business men, a chance to meet you, our partners in the Colombo Plan.

4. At the present time our people are busy developing our own national resources and building a more varied economy out of what was primarily an agricultural country. The scale of development activity in Canada today is demonstrated by the fact that last year nearly 25% of our gross national product was devoted to capital investment. Although it may be considered that we are proceeding with our economic expansion under relatively favourable conditions, we do, I think, know something of the problems that a country faces in rapidly developing and widely expanding and diversifying its economy.

5. In the history of our economic development, private enterprise has played a key role. I would like to associate myself fully with the comments made on Monday by the leaders of other delegations and particularly by the distinguished delegate from the United States, about the need to mobilize existing resources of private capital — both domestic and foreign — for the benefit of the countries of South and South-East Asia. At the same time, all of us represented here have recognized that external aid from other sources is required if the development of the area is to go forward satisfactorily. Since 1950 when the Plan first came into being, the Canadian Government has recognized this need, and has provided a programme of aid each year.

6. At this stage I shall make a few brief comments to supplement what has been said in Chapter XI about Canadian participation in the Colombo Plan programme. I recall the remark of Lord Reading that in our mutual undertakings we have no master plan and that the Colombo Plan is a series of partnerships into which governments have entered freely. For over four years now, Canada has been participating in a stimulating and rewarding series of such partnerships, and the experiences which we have shared with our Asian colleagues have helped us to improve our methods of co-operation. We consider that a very useful part of these Colombo Plan meetings is the opportunity we all have, outside of formal Committee meetings, to smooth out what is of necessity a series of complicated and detailed co-operative undertakings.

7. We all agree that the funds which are made available should be applied in the most efficient manner. It is very encouraging to see that our members are planning their projects with increasing care and thoroughness. We are glad to find that the proposals which are submitted to us are being presented in greater detail and with indications that the related administrative and financial arrangements in the country concerned are being carefully studied. This preparatory work makes it easier for both parties to act effectively on projects which are up for consideration.

8. We are also interested in the participation of other agencies or other countries in any project which is proposed. I think all of us recognize the need for effective co-ordination of all the aid that can be supplied. This co-ordination must be essentially the responsibility of the Asian Governments. The countries supplying aid can achieve only a limited amount of co-ordination, outside of the area where the aid is being applied. The most effective consultation can be brought about in the capitals of the Asian countries where all those providing aid — whether governments or other agencies — normally have representatives. We would hope that such co-operation to determine the best use of available external resources will be encouraged.

9. The composition of Canadian aid has varied from time to time. In the past we have not excluded the provision of commodities. Where commodities are requested, we would naturally like to be sure that there are facilities within the country for fabricating or processing such commodities and that the finished product can be used in the economic development programme of that country. Since these commodities generate counterpart funds — and that is one of the important reasons we find for supplying them — they are most helpful to those countries which are finding difficulty in financing the internal costs of essential projects.

10. In connection with this whole question of commodity assistance, we appreciate that some countries are faced with the problem of disposing of surpluses. It is a problem which we have here too. However, it would seem reasonable to suggest that where commodities are provided — whether they be surplus or not — the aims of the Colombo Plan are best served if such commodities are provided in a manner which will ensure that local production of similar commodities in the recipient countries is not disturbed, and that the interests of other nations normally supplying the area — and on which the area may have to rely in the future — are also safeguarded. In that connection it was most reassuring to hear the remarks of the U.S. Delegate so far as their intentions and policies in this respect are concerned.

11. It is thought that the bulk of Canadian aid should take the form of capital equipment. In Canada we produce a wide range of equipment required for many of the economic development projects in South and South-East Asia. It would therefore seem that we can make an effective contribution in this form to the economic progress of Asia. Moreover, through the provision of equipment, Canadian industry and the Canadian people can be intimately associated with the industry and enterprise of their partners in South and South-East Asia. We have not, however, been rigid in this attitude, and on occasion there has been some procurement of equipment from outside sources for our programme, where such equipment was needed to complete a project in which Canada was substantially involved.

12. So far, my comments have been largely directed to the provision of capital aid. We share fully what has been said by Mr. Casey and other delegations about the importance of technical assistance and we are equally anxious that our mutual techniques and working methods in this important field should be constantly improved. During the meeting of officials, the Canadian delegate commented at some length about our Canadian technical assistance programme, and I do not wish to go over the same ground. Under the Colombo Plan Technical Co-operation Scheme we have provided considerable technical assistance in various forms to most of the countries in the area. We are learning with experience, and we would hope that this part of our programme will also become increasingly effective.

13. We are a bilingual country, and our French-speaking Canadians have naturally a special interest in the development of Laos, Cambodia and Viet Nam. Because of this, we can provide, more easily than other countries, as Mr. Casey has mentioned this afternoon, personnel for technical assistance who will not have a language handicap.

14. In conclusion Mr. Chairman, it is not possible for us, at the present moment, to be precise about the total contribution for capital aid and technical assistance which Canada might reasonably expect to make to the Colombo Plan in future years. In the last four years our Parliament has voted over one hundred and two million dollars for the Plan. In the early years it was not possible to spend all the money assigned for capital aid, because the necessary preparatory engineering work had not been done. More rapid progress has been made in the last year, but at present there is still over 32 million dollars of the money voted unspent — some of it to cover projects in progress and some which will be allotted to projects now under discussion. If the welcome expansion of the area of our operations does result in need for increased assistance, I can assure you that the Government of Canada will give the matter the most careful consideration. In this attitude I am glad to tell you that we have the support of opposition parties in our Parliament, our farmer's organizations, and our labour unions.

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE CANADIAN AND OTHER CONTRIBUTIONS
UNDER THE COLOMBO PLAN

It is possible that Mr. Harris may suggest that our contribution under the Colombo Plan is already relatively high in comparison with the contributions of other countries. It might be questioned whether this is in fact the case.

We are only doing about two and a half times as much as the Australians or rather less than that if allowance is made for our relatively higher prices. We are only doing eight times as much as the New Zealanders who are more liberal than we are in the sense that they are allowing their contribution to be spent outside their country. Thus, in comparison with these two countries, our effort is probably less than might be expected on the basis of either national income or population.

The United States is doing more than ten times as much as we are under the Colombo Plan. Since we are concentrating pretty well on the Colombo Plan while the United States is providing economic and military aid through other channels as well both in Asia and in many other parts of the world, it can hardly be represented that we are carrying a disproportionate share of the load under the Colombo Plan.

It is difficult to compare our contribution with that of the United Kingdom in view of the variety of forms which U.K. assistance takes. Most of the United Kingdom "contribution" is represented by Government loans to Pakistan, private loans from the London market and a considerable amount of technical assistance. It might well be argued that despite its continuing financial difficulties the United Kingdom should be doing more, especially in view of recent improvements in the U.K. position. Against this, it has to be recognized that an increase in the United Kingdom contribution might delay — or be used as an excuse for delaying — the further moves towards freer trade and payments in which Canada is so interested. Even if the United Kingdom is doing less than it should be, that would hardly seem to be a reason for us to hold back on our contribution.

Probably of more importance than any of these comparisons in determining the right size for our contribution is the fact that the Asian countries themselves, with their severely limited resources, are financing over 80% of their development programmes. If account is taken of the very much lower prices prevailing in Asian countries, it may well be that in real terms (as distinct from money terms) they are carrying more than 90% of the load. This situation would seem to justify an increase in external assistance, from Canada as well as from other countries.

NEXT YEAR'S COLOMBO PLAN CONTRIBUTION

In the following paragraphs an attempt has been made to set down the various considerations affecting the decision regarding the size of our contribution next year. You may wish to have these points in mind in connection with the discussion of this subject in Cabinet on Wednesday of this week and you may wish to consider whether a memorandum on these lines (with or without the annexe)† should be submitted to Cabinet in advance of that meeting.

A decision concerning the size of the Canadian contribution under the Colombo Plan for 1955-56 is required as a matter of some urgency, if officials are to be in a position to work out an effective programme for the coming year and if the Asian governments are to have an indication of the amount of help which they can expect to receive. Such an early decision would appear to be required both in the interest of ensuring the best use of such funds as are made available and in fairness to the Asian countries which are uncertain about the amount of assistance which they can anticipate from Canada. (In this connection, it might be noted that the Colombo Plan Administrator intends to visit South and South-east Asia early in January to inspect existing projects and to examine with the Asian authorities the new projects which might be undertaken next year.)

It is probably unnecessary to re-state the general justification for Canadian assistance to South and South-east Asia. It seems evident that such assistance, if reasonably well managed, can have beneficial economic and political effects for Canada over the years out of proportion to the amount of money involved. The cumulative effects of the development programmes which we are able to assist can contribute substantially to the raising of living standards, the strengthening of national economies and the countering of unrest in the friendly Asian countries. The aid which Canada has so far provided has already had significant consequences even though much of it has gone into longer term projects which cannot be expected to have their full effects for some time to come.

This year there would seem to be very strong reasons for considering an increase in Canada's contribution. Some of the considerations favouring such an increase are set forth below.

In order to maintain the present rate of development (which is certainly no more than adequate in relation to needs and to the progress being made in neighbouring countries associated with the Soviet Bloc) it will be necessary for the Asian countries themselves to devote substantially more of their limited resources to their economic development programmes. It would appear that their expenditures may have to increase by some 30% over the level for the previous year. These heavier expenditures will have to be made at a time when few of the development projects undertaken in the past will have reached the point at which substantial returns will have started to come in. There are economic and political limitations to what these countries can do for themselves in the present situation. On the most optimistic forecast of the external aid which can be expected the countries of Asia will be called on to finance from their own resources about 80% of the total costs of their programmes. In these circumstances, it would seem fair and prudent for the friendly countries of the West to increase the amount of their assistance.

While in the nature of the capital projects in which Canada is involved there will be some unspent funds carried over from previous years, virtually all of these funds have already been committed to projects in past programmes and have been taken into account by the Asian Governments in their calculations for earlier years. The size of our programme for next year will therefore depend almost entirely on the amount of new money secured from Parliament. An increase in the amount of our assistance can be brought about only by an increase in the Colombo Plan vote.

On the basis of proposals already put forward (which are referred to at some length in the annexe) it would seem evident that if the amount of money were to be limited to the figure of last year Canada would have to turn down many projects capable of contributing effectively to the improvement of the longer term prospects even for the three countries to which we have been providing aid in the past; in fact, in the case of Pakistan we would be unable to take on any new projects of any size. With respect to those three countries present indications are that in addition to equipment for specific projects (which could readily absorb the whole of an appropriation on the present scale), it would be desirable to provide some suitable commodity aid (e.g. aluminum and copper) in order to assist those governments in raising the large amounts of local funds which will be required to carry on sound projects in which we are already directly involved. The requirements of these countries for the kind of aid which Canada has available would themselves appear to warrant an increase in our contribution.

In addition to the needs of India, Pakistan and Ceylon it would seem desirable to make some allowance for the fact that several non-Commonwealth countries in Asia are now members of the Colombo Plan and might reasonably expect a certain amount of assistance from Canada. In view of the fact that the inclusion of these countries in the Colombo Plan accounts in part for its significance as a factor in the present Asian situation, it might be advisable for Canada to provide a limited amount of capital assistance to them (as Australia and New Zealand as well as the United States are now doing). The recent Consultative Committee Meeting showed that Indonesia, Burma, Nepal and the Associated States of Indo-China all have very substantial needs. While it is not possible to say precisely which projects might best be helped until the completion of investigations which cannot be readily undertaken before a decision has been reached regarding the funds available, there would seem to be no doubt that considerable amounts of aid could be usefully provided to sound projects in those countries. In view of the great political importance of several of these countries it would seem most desirable to make some provision for assisting them with projects which are determined to be worthwhile. Such assistance would almost certainly require capital aid and equipment as well as the advice of technicians.

An increase in Canadian aid would seem to be in keeping with the new emphasis which the United States Government is placing on economic assistance to Asia. In addition to the statements made by Mr. Stassen and Mr. Waugh at the Consultative Committee Meeting, it has recently been reported that President Eisenhower has instructed Mr. Dodge to carry through a comprehensive review of the Government's economic security policies with particular reference to Asia. Mr. Dodge's terms of reference would appear to indicate that the U.S. Government is convinced that in a period of what it regards as "competitive co-existence" the free nations must demonstrate their capacity to raise living standards in the under-developed areas more effectively than the totalitarian countries. Any such increase in United States activity in Asia (which would probably be undertaken through the Colombo Plan in some manner) would appear to make it all the more important that Canada should also provide substantial aid. For some countries, the receipt of assistance from Canada or other donors who might be less suspect than the United States would make it politically easier to accept aid from the United States. In this sense Canadian aid could be helpful in enabling the United States to carry out any more ambitious programme of assistance on which it may embark. Generally, Canadian aid would assume increased importance in such a situation in helping to avoid the impression that the United States was dominating the Colombo Plan. Canada's decision not to take part in South-east Asia defence organization would also appear to be a related reason for increasing the contribution which we can make to the stability of South and South-east Asia through the Colombo Plan.

An increase in our Colombo Plan contribution would also seem to have a bearing on our position in NATO and in the United Nations. There may be some reduction in our Mutual Aid under NATO during the coming year. Such a reduction (which incidentally would make it less difficult to finance a larger Colombo Plan effort) would probably be more readily understood by, and more acceptable to, our NATO partners if it were apparent that we were at the same time making an increased contribution towards the improvement of economic conditions in a part of the world which they recognize as strategically and politically critical. This increased contribution might also help us to take a more effective part in the discussion of various economic questions in the United Nations (e.g. on the proposed Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development).

The fact that we were increasing our help to the Asian countries might also, incidentally, have a wholesome effect on the attitude of those countries towards the position which we may be taking in other discussions, for example, in the current review session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

In any consideration of the desirability of increasing the provision of capital equipment or materials under the Colombo Plan, it will be appreciated that such an increase would have desirable consequences for employment in various industries and localities in Canada.

With respect to the technical assistance portion of our Colombo Plan operation it would seem clear that, especially in view of the commitments to be carried forward from the current year, more money will be necessary if even the present scale of these activities is not to be curtailed next year.

Finally, a larger appropriation for both capital and technical assistance would seem to be in line with the increasingly active support which the Canadian public is showing for the Colombo Plan.

An indication of the commitments which have already been undertaken, and of some of the projects which might be taken on next year, is given in the annexe to this memorandum.

In the light of these various factors I would recommend that the Canadian contribution for 1955-56 should be increased by 10 million dollars to a total of 35.4 million dollars.

COLOMBO PLAN; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION 1955-56

49. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 6th, 1954, said that he, and the Minister of Finance, had considered further the question of what the size of the contribution to the Colombo Plan might be for the next fiscal year. He now wished to recommend that there be no change in the amount for capital aid but that an additional $1 million be provided for technical assistance. At the next meeting of the Consultative Committee the future of the Plan would be reviewed. Meanwhile, Canadian authorities should consider their attitude towards it and what the programme after the first 6-year period should be. The countries recently admitted to the Plan would not be in a position to spend capital that might be made available to them in the forthcoming year, but the full $25 million for 1955-56 could usefully be spent in India, Pakistan and Ceylon.

Countries newly associated with the Plan would, however, be able to take advantage of technical assistance and advice which they needed urgently.

50. In the course of discussion, it was pointed out that unemployment was causing anxiety in certain Canadian centres, but even so, it was doubtful if any exception would be taken to additional provision for technical assistance. The money already spent under the Plan had not only helped the receiving countries but had been of direct benefit to communities in Canada where goods had been purchased to implement the Plan.

51. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the Colombo Plan and agreed that the total Canadian contribution for the fiscal year 1955-56 be increased by $1 million to provide for further technical assistance.

JAPANESE ASSOCIATION WITH THE COLOMBO PLAN

The question of Japanese association with the Colombo Plan has been in the minds of Canadian officials and the thoughtful review presented in your despatch has proven most useful.

2. When the question of an observer status for Japan was informally broached prior to the meeting of the Consultative Committee last September, the reaction amongst the delegates to that conference took three forms. Some of the Asian delegations, Indonesia in particular, were concerned that if Japan were admitted a precedent would be created that might make the admission of other countries likely. The possibility that France and the Netherlands might ask to be considered for membership apparently influenced the Asian members. (Moreover, it would create considerable difficulty for Canada if either Communist or Nationalist China were to seek membership on the basis of Japanese participation in the Plan). The Australian (and to some extent the New Zealand) delegation appeared to be very much opposed to the idea of Japan's membership and indicated that they would formally oppose the motion if it were put to the meeting. The third general reaction was that of the United Kingdom (and also, generally speaking, of Canada) that if the Asian countries wished Japan to become a member the request should be considered sympathetically. Japan was undoubtedly aware of these attitudes and as a result the question of her membership was never formally raised.

3. It is doubtful whether it would be advisable for Canada at this time to take the initiative in sponsoring Japan's membership in the Colombo Plan. As you point out in your despatch, cogent arguments can be made for sympathetic consideration of Japan's economic problems. Japan's admission to the Colombo Plan can be viewed from two aspects — as a potential recipient or provider of capital and technical assistance. I am not sure that your suggestion put forward in paragraph 8 that Japan might participate as a receiving nation is in line with the policy that Japan has been following over the last few years. As we understand it, Japan has consistently emphasized that in South and South-East Asia she is capable of providing technical assistance gratuitously and capital goods at a competitive price. This thinking was recently reiterated by Mr. Onta, the Japanese representative at the Tenth Session of the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East. It is doubtful if Japan would properly qualify for aid under the original concepts of the Colombo Plan, which related to under-developed countries in South and South-East Asia. I should think that some of the "sound projects" in Japan which require capital might be the type of proposal which would interest the International Bank or some other agency interested in projects which are of a clear commercial nature. In terms of technical assistance, it is useful to remember that training and other facilities are open to the Japanese under the various United Nations programmes.

4. When you speak of her need to trade, we believe that you have hit upon the real reason for any Japanese desire to join the Plan. It is our view that trade considerations bulk large in Japanese interests in the Plan. It seems likely that she would wish to provide technical assistance and capital goods to countries in the Colombo Plan area and hopes that at least the latter might be financed out of funds made available for off-shore purchasing by other contributing countries. There is no assurance that formal membership in the Plan could be expected to further these objectives to any appreciable extent. Without belonging to the Plan, the Japanese are already providing technical assistance and are supplying some equipment at the United States' expense (as are Belgium, Italy and several other non-member countries). The Japanese are not at a disadvantage with the other countries in the area since most of the information exchanged at the Consultative Committee is eventually made public in the Progress Report.

5. It is unlikely that the attitudes of the other members of the Colombo Plan toward Japanese participation have changed substantially since last year's meeting in New Delhi. Under these circumstances it would hardly be appropriate for us as host government to offer encouragement to the Japanese concerning their participation. If you agree, perhaps this line might be adopted if the Japanese authorities should formally approach you. You might indicate that the matter would have to be referred to Ottawa for instructions and that in all probability, in our position as host government, we would have to refer any Japanese application to the other member governments for their comments. When these had been received it would no doubt be clear to us whether or not it would be appropriate to extend an invitation to the Japanese to attend the Ottawa meeting.

6. You have advanced the suggestion that Colombo Plan capital assistance to approved projects in Japan would set an example to the United States and you hint that you have some doubts about both the purposes and efficacy of United States economic aid to Japan. We are inclined to think that we in Canada should be particularly careful about impugning the objectives of United States international policies and aid programmes lest we add to the great amount of misunderstanding that exists abroad on this subject. When one reviews United States economic aid policy toward Japan over the past eight and a half years and considers the broad generosity of the American approach one cannot but feel that it has been generally helpful. We think this broad motivation still basically underlies the United States approach and that individual current programmes should be viewed against this background.

7. We have no desire to close the door on the question of Japanese participation in the Colombo Plan and we agree that we should not be unduly influenced by the prejudices of other countries. There is an impressive awareness in Canada, to which you have made an important contribution, of the economic problems which face Japan. We have not been unsympathetic in our approach to these problems; for example, our attitude at GATT should assure the Japanese that we are not unmindful of their needs. Nevertheless, for the moment it is not clear that Japan's participation in the Colombo Plan could be reconciled with the basic aspirations of the Plan. It would appear inadvisable for Canada to underwrite any proposal which might result in a weakening of our ties with the other free countries of South-Eastern Asia which we have worked so carefully to create through the medium of the Colombo Plan.

8. While it might not be advisable for us to assume any initiative at this moment, we would appreciate being kept informed of any further developments on this question.

COLOMBO PLAN — JAPANESE MEMBERSHIP

In the course of a meeting on Colombo Plan matters with Emerson Ross and other officials of the State Department and the Foreign Operations Administration, Ross raised the question of the possible inclusion of Japan in Colombo Plan activities. He said the United States would welcome Japanese participation in the Colombo Plan, possibly with observer status, on both political and economic grounds.

2. We were told that the Japanese Government has already made known to the United States Government its interest in being invited to the forthcoming Consultative Committee meetings in Ottawa. From the political point of view Japan's interest is simple and straight-forward — the desire for closer association with other Asian states. We understand that the Japanese Government requested an invitation to the last meetings of the Council in New Delhi and was somewhat puzzled when that request was turned down. The United States Government believes that it would serve a good purpose if Japan could be associated with other Asian states in as many international organizations as possible. From the economic point of view Japan's interest is long-term rather than immediate. If Japan were to be invited to participate in the Colombo Plan at the moment it might not be possible to classify her as either a recipient or a donor country. However, in the course of association with the Colombo Plan opportunities might arise for Japanese action which would serve not only the objectives of the plan but also Japan's economic interests.

3. Ross said that while, in any event, the State Department would have wished to discuss the matter of Japanese participation in the Colombo Plan with Canadian authorities, the fact that Canada was to play host this year to the Committee meetings made consultation even more necessary. It is our understanding that the matter has not been discussed with any other Colombo Plan country. The hope was expressed that you could give your early consideration to the subject since, in the event that you might look favourably on Japanese participation in the forthcoming Committee meetings, the time for additional consultation with other Colombo Plan countries would be relatively short.

4. The conversation then turned to the possible procedures which might be followed in arranging for Japanese participation in the Colombo Plan. Ross said that the United States would prefer Asian sponsorship of the Japanese request and seemed to think that that could be arranged easily if there was general agreement on the desirability of the Japanese association. It was obvious that the United States authorities would prefer to have the matter settled before the forthcoming meetings so that Japan could attend those meetings in whatever status was decided upon. Mention was made, however, of the possibility that the matter could be explored prior to the meetings and, if there was general agreement on the desirability of Japan's participation, the matter could be put on the agenda for formal consideration and action. We tentatively suggested a somewhat more direct approach by way of the Council for Technical Co-operation. Since Japan was likely to fit the role of a donor country, so far as the extension of technical assistance was concerned, we suggested that it might be possible for her to request full membership in the Council. Observer status in the Consultative Committee would not, we thought, be difficult to arrange in these circumstances. The application for full membership in the Council for Technical Assistance might either be made directly by the Japanese Government itself or might be sponsored by some other Asian state.

5. We are inclined to regard the United States view with respect to the closer association of Japan with the Colombo Plan favourably, but we said nothing at the meeting which would prejudice any views which you might wish to put to the State Department. We would be grateful if you could consider this matter with some degree of urgency. It is obvious that before any final decision is reached the views of other Colombo Plan countries will have to be sought but at this juncture I am certain that the State Department would welcome receipt of Canadian views as soon as possible.

COLOMBO PLAN — JAPANESE PARTICIPATION

As you will see from the attached copies of an exchange of correspondence with our Ambassador in Japan, we have been anticipating that the question of Japanese association with the Colombo Plan might be raised in advance of this year's Consultative Committee meeting. We assume that the approach made to you by Mr. Ross was not a formal proposal that Canada should circulate to other Colombo Plan governments for their views. We of course feel the question of Japanese association cannot be dealt with by mechanically enquiring from the other governments how they view it. It will require very discreet discussions in most of the countries involved, and we feel that because of the United States interest they should be prepared to undertake this exploration themselves if they wish the subject pursued. We have already had an indication that New Zealand hopes that the question of Japanese association with the Colombo Plan will not be raised this year, and an implication that if it were they would oppose it. There is no reason to suppose that the Australian position, which was equally firm before the 1953 meeting, will have changed over the past year. We have also had an informal indication from a senior official of one Asian country that they are not enthusiastic about Japan entering the Colombo Plan. We would be reluctant to speculate on the United Kingdom attitude.

2. In our letter No. E-414 to our Ambassador in Tokyo, we outlined how Canadian officials were viewing Japanese association with the Colombo Plan, and it would be appropriate for you to draw these views to the attention of the State Department. Whilst Canadian officials are not opposed in principle to Japanese participation, we do foresee the difficult position in which this might place other countries, and we are anxious to avoid exposing the Colombo Plan unnecessarily to any highly controversial issues which might have the effect of weakening the reasonably effective and cooperative links which we have worked to create through the medium of the Plan.

3. We assume that the State Department will keep us fully informed of the results of any discussions with other Colombo countries.

COLOMBO PLAN — JAPANESE AND AFGHANISTAN PARTICIPATION

Representatives of the British, Australian and New Zealand Embassies, along with ourselves, were convened to a meeting on this question in the State Department yesterday afternoon. We were asked in turn to state our government's views with respect to Japan and to seek their views as regards Afghanistan. A second meeting will be held shortly.

2. Japan. The United Kingdom representative reported that his government would not oppose "association" if all Colombo members agreed; he did not know what London meant by association. The New Zealander said that his government would not oppose observer status if this was the general desire and if it carried the support of the Asian members. He implied that his government would not go beyond observer status. (He added that if one of the purposes of Japanese participation in the Colombo Plan was to push Japanese exports, this could more appropriately be done through commercial channels or through ECAFE). The Australian representative said that his government might not in principle be opposed to association (again undefined); nevertheless, they had very serious doubts about it. (We know from a conversation with a member of the Australian Embassy who came to see us about this last week, that his government fears that Japan would want to use the Colombo Plan to force its exports into the Colombo Plan area.)

3. It became obvious that if the State Department was to get a clear-cut answer, in particular from the United Kingdom and Australia, they would need to ask specific questions. They therefore circulated a departmental paper which we reproduce in our immediately following telegram.† You will note that association has now been defined to mean observer status in the Consultative Committee and full membership in the Council for Technical Co-operation. The United Kingdom, Australian and New Zealand representatives have been asked to obtain urgently the views of their governments.

4. Afghanistan. The United Kingdom, Australian and New Zealand Governments had not yet been asked for their views about Afghanistan. Their representatives have now undertaken to obtain them on the specific question of admitting Afghanistan as an observer at the forthcoming meetings. If the four Commonwealth countries consulted (including ourselves) are not opposed, the State Department will sound out Afghanistan as regards their interest in obtaining observer status. The next step would be for Afghanistan to approach you indicating its desire to attend the meeting as an observer. The State Department rather hope that you would be prepared to circularize this request to members giving it such support as you could in the light of your position as well as that of the United States, United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand.

5. We informed State Department officials in confidence that we had reason to suspect that Pakistan would refuse to sponsor Afghanistan membership and that it might even oppose its membership. We undertook to pass on such additional information as might come to hand. (We had in mind the despatch you are awaiting from our mission in Karachi.)

COLOMBO PLAN, JAPANESE PARTICIPATION

Our views are still substantially those outlined in our despatch No. E-948 of July 30 to you and our letter No. E-414 of May 31 to Tokyo.

2. With regard to the State Department paper of August 24, we are of course at one with the United States in desiring the growth of an economically viable and politically stable Japan closely associated with the nations of the free world. We have concluded a trade agreement with Japan, we grant her m.f.n. treatment, and we have under consideration the question of Japanese entry into the GATT.³⁵

3. Japanese association with the Colombo Plan might further strengthen Japan's ties with the free nations of Asia, but this would depend largely on the attitude of these nations toward Japanese participation, which is as yet unknown. Some of them have still to conclude a peace treaty with Japan and have reparations problems outstanding. On the other hand, closer economic co-operation with Japan might appeal to some of them. The political benefit could not be fully assessed until the views of the free Asian countries are known.

4. We agree that Japanese association with the Plan might, in a limited way, contribute to economic development of the area. Any contribution Japan might make to economic development would probably be in the technical assistance field. If she wished to make such a contribution, in addition to what she is now doing on a more commercial basis, we have no doubt her help would be of real value. We see little possibility of Japan offering capital assistance, unless this were in the form of capital goods paid for by others or in the form of reparations to which she is already obligated. We would certainly agree to Japanese membership in the Council for Technical Co-operation if this were favoured by the other members, particularly those from Asia.

5. If the United States should envisage the Colombo Plan as a means of strengthening the economy of Japan, we would want to have more information before forming a considered view. Our present opinion is that the sort of technical assistance Japan needs can probably best be supplied outside the Colombo Plan. So far as capital assistance is concerned, it is difficult to see this coming from any major source except the United States or the International Bank. Japan might seek to use the Colombo Plan as a means of promoting trade with South-East Asia. This is doubtless a desirable end, but there are perhaps more appropriate means for achieving it.

6. In the matter of observer status in the Consultative Committee we have given thought to the present scope of the Plan, which, for development purposes, covers only South and South-East Asia. If Japan were regarded as a potential recipient — as we think she must be regarded if one is to be realistic — observer status for Japan might lead to expansion of the accepted area of the Plan and ultimately raise the possibility of applications for admission from Korea or Nationalist China. In view of relations between Japan and Korea, and the attitude of many existing members toward Nationalist China, such developments might imperil the co-operative nature of the Colombo Plan. In our view the main immediate consideration is whether or not a Japanese association could be arranged without serious opposition from existing members, particularly those from Asia. We are anxious to avoid submitting the Plan to stresses which might lessen its present effective basis of cooperation. On the question of observer status for Japan in the Consultative Committee, we would prefer to reserve judgment until such time as we have information about the views of Asian members and a clearer indication as to whether Japan is to be regarded as potentially a donor or a recipient.

7. The State Department have suggested that observer status for Japan be "initiated" at the Ottawa meeting. We agree with them that such a proposal should come from an Asian member and that it should be advanced only after it has been established that it would stand a reasonably good chance of acceptance. On the basis of our present information regarding others' views, we fear it might be risky to encourage a formal proposal at the forthcoming meeting. If, in the interval, the United States receives adequate assurance of favourable attitudes, particularly among the Asian countries, the move might be made with confidence. Alternatively, United States representatives might find an opportunity during the meeting to sound out the Asian members informally with a view to deciding their course of action.

COLOMBO PLAN — JAPANESE AND AFGHANISTAN PARTICIPATION

The second meeting was held this afternoon to consider the question of procedure with respect to Japan.

2. We resisted the suggestion that Canada as host government should now take the initiative. We explained that you would most certainly be reluctant to circularize Colombo Plan members before being relatively certain there would be no opposition to Japan's membership in the plan. This position was readily acceptable to all present.

3. The step-by-step procedure which has now been worked out is set out below. We hope that it will not cut across any plans which you might have in mind and that you will consider the following procedure reasonable. In fact, as you will see, the bulk of the effort will be done by Australia. Its representative said that his government would most likely welcome this because it is anxious to derive "full credit" for the attitude which it has now taken with respect to Japanese membership.

(a) Australia will suggest to Japan that it should delay making formal application to you as host government. This is to avoid embarrassment should any member oppose Japanese membership. However, it is unlikely that much harm can result if the Japanese application for full membership has already been despatched to you, since no opposition is foreseen;

(b) Australia will immediately approach the Asian members (i.e., governments which have not so far stated their position) seeking their views on the question of Japan's full membership in the plan;

(c) Australia will inform you (perhaps through this Embassy) of the reactions of the governments thus approached. This information will be passed on to you on a country by country basis immediately it is received in Canberra. Japan will also be informed but only if the reactions are generally favourable;

(d) Japan will file a formal application with you as host government (unless of course this has already been done);

(e) The host government would then circularize by telegram the Japanese application outlining the position taken by the various members. You would also inform the Japanese that the members have been so circularized and that the decision concerning their membership in the plan would be considered at the first meeting.

4. The New Zealand Embassy's instructions are still that the New Zealand Government "would reluctantly agree to Japanese attendance with observer status and membership in the Technical Co-operation Council if other and particularly, Asian members agree". The Embassy is asking whether these instructions still stand in view of the Australian position. They will let us know.

5. Afghanistan. The United States have dropped their proposal for observer status for Afghanistan. This decision disposes of the question at least for this year.

JAPAN AND THE COLOMBO PLAN

Australian Government have asked urgently through High Commissioner's Office here for our reactions in response to Japanese request to them for advice as to whether or not they should approach Canadian Government. Australians report favourable reactions to their soundings from Ceylon, Indonesia, India, and Pakistan. The Burmese reaction is awaited. We do not, repeat not, know if the Indo-Chinese States have been approached.

2. We are telling Australians that we have no, repeat no, objection to their reporting Asian reactions to Japan, in accordance with procedure to which we have agreed, if they now wish to do so. We have been careful throughout not, repeat not, to advise the Japanese as to what they should do. If the Australians wish to do more than report reactions to the Japanese, they might say that if the Japanese decide to apply to us, it would assist member governments if they were to make clear what exactly they are applying for (e.g. Membership in the Technical Cooperation Council or Membership in Consultative Committee).

3. We have been asked by the Japanese Embassy here if it is possible for a country to join the Council for Technical Co-operation without joining the Consultative Committee. Without suggesting whether or not, repeat not, this would be desirable in Japan's case, we have replied that, it is our understanding that this is possible but that the Canadian Government would not, repeat not, wish to give a positive answer on this point without consultation with other member countries. The Embassy has also asked if application for membership in the Council for Technical Co-operation should be made to the Council or to the Consultative Committee. We have said we would endeavour to secure an answer on this point and are asking the Australian, the New Zealand, United Kingdom and United States authorities for their views.

4. According to the Embassy Japan wishes to join the Council but has not, repeat not, yet decided whether, as a member of the Consultative Committee, it would wish to be donor or recipient. In the Embassy's opinion, Japan would now be interested in joining the Consultative Committee only if this were necessary to allow membership in the Council. These views were evidently expressed without knowledge of the favourable reactions Australia has received from several Asian countries. We have indicated to the Embassy that there is no, repeat no, formal distinction between donor and recipient countries (although it is desirable to avoid any misunderstanding as to whether particular countries expect to give or to receive aid).

5. If we receive an application from Japan we will circulate member countries and, presuming that the terms of the application relate to participation in the Consultative Committee, we will propose that it be placed on the agenda. The question of Canada proposing Japan, which Australia has broached, could be decided later.

6. Canberra, London, Washington and Wellington: please secure views of authorities concerned on question raised in paragraph 3.

[Ottawa], September 27, 1954

COLOMBO PLAN — PROPOSED JAPANESE PARTICIPATION

On September 17 the Japanese Ambassador notified the Canadian Government that Japan desires to participate as a full member of the Colombo Plan. The Chairman of the official meetings of the Colombo Plan Consultative Committee reported this development at the first meeting on September 20. The Committee felt that, in accordance with the practice usually followed in the past with respect to new members, the views of member Governments should be secured before action is taken in the Committee. Accordingly, the Department of External Affairs, acting on behalf of Canada as the host Government, has consulted other members through diplomatic channels.

Since a general sentiment in favour of Japanese admission has been indicated in consultations prior to and during the present meetings, member Governments have been told that, subject to confirmation that full participation by Japan would be agreeable to member Governments, Canada would propose (a) that Japan be represented at the first of the closed Ministerial meetings in Ottawa and that Japan be received as a full member of the Consultative Committee at that time; and (b) in anticipation of such action at the time of the Ministerial meeting, that the Japanese Government be invited to have an observer present during the balance of the official-level meetings in order that the Japanese Government might be familiar with the background of the Ministerial meetings. Presumably, if Japan were admitted to the Consultative Committee, the Council for Technical Co-operation takes similar action at an early date.

The question of Japanese membership in the Colombo Plan is one for all member Governments to decide and it is proposed that the Canadian Government, as host Government to the present meetings, should take appropriate action when the views of member Governments are known. In this connection it is desired that the views of the Canadian Government itself be determined.

It would seem desirable that the Canadian Government favour Japanese admission if it is generally the view among member Governments that this course be followed. It would, of course, be desirable that Japan make some contribution as a member of the Colombo Plan and that she should not expect to participate as a recipient. Since there is no formal distinction between donor and recipient members it would seem undesirable to make donor status a pre-condition of Japanese entry. However, the official Canadian view, and that of some other members, as expressed in consultations on this question has been that Japan would be expected to make some contribution and that Japan should not be regarded as a potential recipient because this would enlarge the area in which the Colombo Plan is designed to promote economic development — i.e. South and South-East Asia. Representatives of the Canadian Government and of some other member Governments are taking appropriate opportunities to make their view on this point clear to the Japanese Government.

Recommendation

It is recommended that Cabinet agree that Japan be admitted as a full member of the Colombo Plan if it is the general view among other countries that this course be followed.³⁶

You may be interested in reading the attached memorandum which is an analysis of the Colombo Plan Conference held in Ottawa earlier this Fall.³⁷ If this paper appears unduly long it is because we felt you might be interested not only in the substantive discussions that took place during the Conference but also in the subsidiary aspects of a meeting which marked the first time that Canada had played host on a large scale to a number of important Ministers and officials from countries of South and Southeast Asia.

You will recall that one of the arguments put forward in support of not increasing our Colombo Plan contribution was that the Asian Ministers did not actively seek increased assistance during the meeting. I think paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of the attached paper indicate how essential external aid is considered to be by Ministers like Mr. Deshmukh of India and Mr. Mohammed Ali of Pakistan. While they could not for obvious reasons sound too demanding they both sought to stress the importance of foreign assistance to their countries particularly during this initial period of economic development.

In paragraph 11 of the analysis reference is made to a misunderstanding which appeared to exist with respect to the Canadian contribution to the Colombo Plan. As a result there may be some impression that Canadian administrative machinery is unable to use effectively an annual contribution of approximately $25 million. This of course is an incorrect interpretation arising out of a tendency to confuse uncommitted and unspent money. As paragraph 11 explains, at the time of the meetings only about $7 million remained uncommitted. (As a result of subsequent decisions of Cabinet to provide additional assistance only a little more than $4 million remains available as of this date, and there are of course a number of sound projects under active consideration which would more than absorb this amount).

I am also attaching a printed copy of the final version of the Third Annual Report of the Consultative Committee. Thanks to the excellent co-operation which we received from the Queen's Printer printed copies of this Report have been made available in record time. This report is not to be released until December 15.³⁸

Memorandum

AN ANALYSIS OF THE COLOMBO PLAN CONFERENCE

This memorandum attempts to analyze the recent Conference of the Colombo Plan Consultative Committee by summarizing and commenting upon significant developments in the substantive discussions; and by also appraising the results of Canada's first essay at playing host to a major Conference, at which most of the delegates were from South and Southeast Asia and were largely unfamiliar with Canada, or its people. Without exaggerating the importance of these Colombo Plan Conferences, it should be recognized that they play a modest role in moulding attitudes of at least a number of fairly significant individuals from both Western and Asian countries.

Substantive Discussions

2. The character and tone of discussions in the formal sessions of this year's Consultative Committee meeting closely followed a pattern which had been established at the earlier meetings in Karachi and New Delhi. Most of the work during the first two weeks at the meeting of officials was devoted to the preparation of a draft Report for the consideration of Ministers. The Drafting Committee, after collating the country chapters which had been reviewed and revised by separate working groups, turned most of its efforts towards the preparation of the final sections of the Report in which an attempt was made to describe the progress achieved and to point up the major obstacles which the Asian countries were seeking or should seek to overcome. In that Committee there was a general disposition towards frankness and the avoidance of over-optimism or complacency, but of necessity some parts of the conclusion reflected the effects of compromise.

3. As at Karachi and New Delhi, the meeting of officials in Ottawa fulfilled a useful function. From the Canadian point of view it was particularly helpful to have on hand for a reasonable period of time, a wide and varied group of officials from the Asian countries, familiar with the details of Canada's Colombo Plan operations in their particular countries. However since the major task of the meeting of officials is the preparation of the draft Report, consideration might perhaps be given to the possibility of limiting the preliminary meeting in the future to one or two officials from each country (especially since the number of countries involved has increased considerably), in reality the Drafting Committee; this would allow this smaller body to concentrate more intensively on the preparation of the draft report — which each year becomes a more complicated and time consuming task.

4. During the meeting of Ministers, which lasted for five days, the discussion of the Report and its conclusions was restrained and at times perfunctory. For the most part, leaders of delegations limited themselves to speaking with reference to those sections or chapters which concerned their countries. As one might have anticipated, the most substantial and dignified statements came from Mr. Deshmukh of India and Mr. Mohammed Ali of Pakistan. When speaking of foreign assistance, Mr. Deshmukh spoke with anything but a demanding tone, and one gained the impression that, for India at least, aid in the form of loans might be acceptable (particularly since political strings would be less likely in that case) as well as aid in the form of grants. The Indian statement laid stress on the value of foreign assistance during the initial period of economic development in the country and there was a note of hopefulness about the future of private savings and investment in India. Inhibited by only the inherent dignity of the East, Mr. Deshmukh went to considerable length to confirm the need of his country and others in the area for external aid; and at the same time one sensed that he was paying particular tribute to the acceptability of the Colombo Plan as the instrument for achieving the effective cooperation required for the distribution of external aid. On the importance of external aid, Mr. Deshmukh observed that while they might be able to get along without it they would then have to take forty years instead of twenty to achieve the modest objective of doubling their present inadequate national income.

5. Mohammed Ali sought with somewhat less effect to correct the impression that unfavourable conditions for private investment existed in his country. His remarks, however, indicated a far greater reliance than India on foreign assistance, in the form of both grants and loans. The Pakistan Minister of Finance spoke at length about the disastrous results of the floods and of the fall in prices of cotton and jute, but his statement was probably not as candid or harsh as one might have anticipated in the light of the serious problems which the Pakistan economy is reported to be facing.

6. The statements of most of the other Asian delegates were interesting and provided a useful supplement to the Report. These statements made it clear that the Asian countries were facing up to the gigantic task of financing from their own resources the bulk of the cost of development (the Report notes that about 80% will be financed by Asians this year). The address, by the leader of the Viet Nam Delegation was the only speech to place economic development in its political framework. It was a simple and moving appeal which apparently was not distasteful to any of the other delegates present. For the first time the representatives from Viet Nam, Cambodia and Laos seemed to be at home in the Colombo Plan. The comments directed to them in French by our Prime Minister and by other Canadian Ministers were warmly appreciated. Although members of the Canadian delegation were careful to avoid even an implied commitment, these countries undoubtedly hope to secure capital assistance from Canada as well as technical assistance through the provision of French-speaking experts.

7. The references in several speeches made by Asian delegates to the shortage of consumer goods and the consequent fear of inflation in their various countries provided background to the statement of the United States delegate which concerned itself largely with the new Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act. Assuring the conference that normal markets would not be disturbed or world prices depressed, the United States delegate pointed out that the proceeds arising from the sale of United States agricultural surpluses could be of valuable assistance to Asian Governments in financing economic development projects. There was no evidence of any enthusiastic response from the Asians to this approach.

8. Mr. Stassen spent two days in Ottawa during the Ministerial Meeting, and his comments, which were in addition to the formal U.S. statement, did not come until the last day of the conference. There had been some thought that he might announce a new "Save Asia" plan. As it turned out, his statement was fairly routine in nature, although the conference and the press were greatly interested by his suggestion that the United States intended to devote to projects within the Colombo Plan a portion of the savings which will arise from the ending of the Indo-China war. He also spoke of his Government's interest in the steps that might be taken towards multilateral regional cooperation in Asia commencing to the delegates the successes achieved in Europe through the Regional approach. Whilst Mr. Stassen's comments were otherwise of an unspectacular nature, what he said and what was said by others on his delegation throughout the conference made it clear that the United States Government was anxious that it should be considered as a very active member and supporter of the Colombo Plan. Statements and comments by United States representatives, both in and out of the conference, often betrayed their disappointment at the tendency of both the United States public and the rest of the world to consider that the United States at the best was only a marginal observer of the Colombo Plan. Subsequent reports have reinforced this feeling that the United States Government was leaning towards stronger association with the Colombo Plan. This could of course produce both good and bad effects.

9. There was evidence at this year's meeting that the Colombo Plan was at a transition stage in its development. Delegates frequently referred to the fact that the Plan was at its mid-point or moving into the final stages of at least the first planning period; and the United Kingdom openly acknowledged what all governments appeared to have tacitly accepted, that the Plan would have to be continued beyond 1957. There were other indications that the Colombo Plan was in transition. The membership at this meeting was enlarged to include Japan, which had previously not been associated in any way with the Plan, as well as Thailand and the Philippines, which had been represented at previous meetings by observers. Originally the Plan was initiated primarily in terms of strengthening the Asian countries in the Commonwealth, although it was recognized from the beginning that other countries would be welcome. The entry of Japan involved the conference for the first time in a certain amount of political shuffling. The increased United States interest in the Plan, which was referred to above, was also apparent to most of the Asian countries and there were, of course, passing references to the relationship between the Colombo Plan and SEADO (with no inclination to link the two in a manner objectionable to the other members of the Plan).

10. The broader membership of the Plan may be giving rise to fears in the minds of some of the Asian countries, although there was no particular evidence of this at the Ottawa meeting. The founding members of the Colombo Plan have always recognized that special relationships between countries and between individuals have developed through these meetings. These are relationships which draw in part on the Commonwealth sentiment, in part from the habit of meeting and working closely together over the past few years, and in part on the uncontroversial nature of the aspirations of the Plan. The informality and frankness which develop as a result of these relationships might be extremely difficult to maintain if the Colombo Plan were to become another international agency in the ordinary sense of that term. At the present time there is no evidence in the Colombo Plan of the split between the Asian countries and the West, or in fact between certain countries of Asia themselves, which is often found in other international agencies.

11. By and large, controversial issues were avoided. However Burma, Indonesia and Australia made frequent attempts to record into the Report and the minutes their desire for greater stability in commodity prices. The Report and in fact the published Conference documents avoid a clear cut recognition of what was undoubtedly an issue about which many delegations, including the Canadian, were unenthusiastic. Indonesia also reminded the Conference of the importance of trade with Communist China. Ceylon, on several occasions stressed the importance to their economy of the rice-rubber barter agreement with China.

12. As host to the conference, both Canadian Ministers and officials were called on to undertake a large amount of preparation and work, but Canada played a modest part in the formal discussions of the conference. Since Mr. Harris was serving as Chairman, Mr. Sinclair introduced the Canadian section of the Contributions Chapter. His reference to unspent moneys available for Colombo Plan projects was unfortunately misunderstood by some of the conference and later by the press. Almost all of the unspent money (the figure referred to in Mr. Sinclair's comments was $32 million) has been committed in principle to capital projects in India, Pakistan and Ceylon. Something less than $7 million of funds voted up to the end of this fiscal year were available for disposition at the time of the Conference and numerous requests for assistance from these remaining funds had been submitted by these three countries, as well as by non-Commonwealth countries.

13. Apart from the more general multilateral discussions, the Consultative Committee meetings are usually accompanied by a series of bilateral conversations between the partners who share in the financing of developmental projects in the area. This year the meetings were particularly useful to Canada, since they gave Ministers and a very wide range of officials an opportunity to meet any of those responsible for development planning in the Asian countries. A great deal of useful work was done in discussing projects of interest to Canada which were in operation or were shortly to be undertaken in India, Pakistan and Ceylon.

14. A more reserved attitude was adopted by both Canadian Ministers and officials in discussions concerning new requests for aid. Since no decision had been taken about the size or nature of Canada's contribution for next year, it was not possible, of course, to offer non-Commonwealth countries any encouragement that new capital projects could be undertaken. The representatives of most of these countries and in particular Burma, Indonesia and Cambodia were told that Canada would carefully study any requests for technical assistance which they might submit — and that there appeared to be a wide range of fields in which Canada might assist through the provision of technical assistance. In addition, of course, Burma, Indonesia and Cambodia all have capital projects which they proposed to Canada and they were active in pressing their requests.

15. To a lesser degree, the uncertainty about next year's programme limited discussions of new projects in India and Pakistan. Both of these countries expressed some interest in receiving some commodity assistance. Pakistan admitted that such aid would not only contribute to economic development both through the use of the commodity when manufactured and through the provision of counterpart funds, but would also have at least an anodyne effect on the painful decline in their foreign exchange reserves.

16. The Pakistan Delegation and in particular the Finance Minister, Mohammed Ali, attributed the highest priority to the Punjab tubewell programme which will supply power and irrigation to those parts of Pakistan most reliant on the waters of the Indus basin, the use of which is in dispute between India and Pakistan. (Canada has already agreed to assist in principle in this programme to the extent of $5 million. A decision has been taken to assist in the construction of a hydro-electric plant at Shadiwal on the Upper Jhelum Canal at an approximate cost of $2 million. There are reservations about some of the other projects which form part of the Punjab tubewell programme, but the fullest consideration must be given to them in the light of Mohammed Ali's appeal).

17. In general the meetings, produced a wholesome and co-operative atmosphere. This year's Report is probably more thorough than previous ones. If its conclusions are vague in parts, this may be partially attributed to the difficulty of generalizing for the area as a whole; and it is of course, attributable also to the political implications involved in a frank and realistic analysis of the progress of the economic development programme.

Subsidiary Aspects of the Meeting

18. It was recognized from the outset that the value of the Colombo Plan conference would derive not only from the meetings themselves but also from the atmosphere surrounding them. This had been true of previous Colombo Plan conferences and it was felt it would be especially true of this conference, since it was the first to be held in North America and gave the Canadian Government and people their first opportunity to receive Colombo Plan delegates.

19. In planning the conference the following aims were kept in view: (1) to provide efficient and congenial working arrangements (2) to house the delegates comfortably and to give them opportunities to mix together in an informal and friendly way (3) to provide hospitality which, without interfering with the work of the conference, would afford entertainment and at the same time introduce the delegates to some important aspects of Canadian ways of living and working (4) to give the delegates an opportunity to learn something of Canada and to enable the Canadian people to learn more about the Colombo Plan and the Colombo Plan countries.

20. Many compliments were received from visiting delegations on the efficiency of the conference arrangements and on the facilities designed to make the delegates feel as much at home as possible. After a brief initial period of adjustment, the conference organization, composed of many people from several different departments, worked well together, achieving consistently effective results — sometimes in the face of heavy demands in terms of time and energy.

21. Other facilities provided for the delegates included not only items such as lounges and local transport but also minor gestures such as dishes somewhat to the Asian taste, the display of all national flags (including those of new members as they were admitted), the playing of a medley of national anthems by the carillonneur, and the services of receptionists to assist delegates with miscellaneous enquiries.

22. The functions arranged outside the conference were, on the whole, highly successful. During the period of the officials meeting we were able to arrange these functions entirely with the assistance of local organizations both public and private; during the Ministerial meetings it was necessary to make use of talent and facilities from outside Ottawa since local theatre and musical groups of the right sort were not performing. The officials' meetings got off to a good start with a very pleasant dinner at the Country Club. Thereafter during the two weeks of their meetings, as time allowed, the officials attended an informal tour of the National Gallery, a display at the National Research Council, a tea at the Experimental Farm, a football game, an ice hockey game, an evening on northern Canada, a concert by the Palestрина Choir which included Canadian folk songs, and a conducted tour to Chalk River.

23. The opening day of the Ministerial meetings was enhanced by the kindness of the Prime Minister and the Speaker of the House of Commons in agreeing to receive the delegates on their arrival at the Parliament Buildings and by the courtesy of the Speaker of the Senate in holding a reception for senior delegates and their wives in the late afternoon. The following day the Governor-General held a lunch for the leaders of delegations and a reception for the delegates-at-large; the play presented by a group of Canadian actors which many of the delegates attended in the evening was greatly enjoyed.

24. Views on the CBC's concert of Canadian music, broadcast as part of a Wednesday Night programme were rather mixed. The orchestra and soloists were first-class and the reception afterward was a pleasant affair. Some listeners felt, however, that the music of Canadian composers is less presentable to this kind of group than the work of Canadian painters. We did our best to encourage CBC to put on the right type of programme and we understood there was to be a considerable amount of Canadian folk music in addition to some modern compositions. As it turned out there was less of the former on the programme than we had expected and even this was dropped by CBC at the last minute because they had underestimated the time the whole programme would take.

25. The tea at Kingsmere, regrettably suffered from inadequate organization in certain respects on the part of the officials; while it achieved one objective — that of enabling the delegates to drive through the Gatineau Hills while the autumn colouring was in evidence — it nevertheless fell considerably short of what it should have been as a social event. On the other hand, the tea at the Prime Minister's house for wives of delegates was very pleasant in every way.

26. The farewell dinner, at which the Prime Minister was host, was splendidly successful. Both he and Mr. Deshmukh, who responded to his graceful toast, spoke in a delightfully informal, friendly manner (in both English and French), and the warmest feelings of good fellowship prevailed throughout the evening.

27. Especially during the week of the Ministerial meetings, there were many receptions, dinners and lunches given by delegations or heads of Colombo Plan missions. It would not appear, however, that the delegates felt that they were being "killed with kindness" — at least by their Canadian hosts. On the contrary, the visiting delegates appeared to be impressed with the quiet and natural manner in which they were allowed to sample something of the Canadian way of life and culture.

28. Another objective — to give the delegates an opportunity to learn something of Canada and to enable the Canadian people to learn more about the Colombo Plan and the Colombo Plan countries — was achieved to a considerable extent by indirection. The press and other media, in advance of the meetings, were given very full information about the conference, the Consultative Committee, the Colombo Plan and Canada's part in the Plan. Statements by leaders of visiting delegations were made available; and there was a briefing session for the press just before the meetings commenced. During the meetings arrangements were made to facilitate interviews by the press, radio and TV people, and full co-operation was afforded to the information and press officers of local missions. Mr. Harris and Mr. Taylor as spokesmen for the conference, met the press on a number of occasions. Canadian officials were careful not to engage in activities which might lead to charges of "over selling"; at the same time all concerned with the meetings did everything possible to co-operate with the "media" and to enable them to cover the conference adequately.

29. Before and during the meetings a considerable number of radio and TV programmes about the conference or the Colombo Plan were broadcast. The press coverage in Canada was very considerable — in news and editorial columns and in the form of pictures. All comment on the substantive aspect of the Colombo Plan was favourable to the objectives of the Plan; there was some criticism of it as inadequate in scope, and a majority of editorial writers seemed to favour an increase in Canada's contribution.

30. With the cooperation of this Department, the Exhibitions Commission of the Department of Trade and Commerce produced a very effective Colombo Plan exhibition which was on display in the Parliament Buildings throughout the period of the meetings. It was seen by all the tourists going through the building; and large numbers of school children visited it from time to time. The public was further interested in the Conference by the attendance of a large number of representative groups in Ottawa to the opening session; the response was good, and the galleries were very nearly filled.

31. Every effort was made to obtain adequate publicity abroad. Special arrangements were made to keep local representatives of wire-service agencies informed, and a small number of foreign correspondents attended for a few days. The CBC-IS was especially briefed on the Conference, and it broadcast news items and sent documentaries abroad on discs. During the Ministerial meeting alone there were 62 short-wave broadcasts to South and Southeast Asia. The visit of two radio specialists from India and Pakistan, brought to Canada by the CBC-IS to work for a few weeks with the CBC, was timed so that they could help with broadcasts to their countries, and an Indonesian radio broadcaster, who was here under the Colombo Plan as a trainee, acted as a special commentator for CBC-IS. The BBC relayed some CBC broadcasts and did shortwave broadcasts of its own. The United Kingdom Information Office sent special stories to United Kingdom Missions in Colombo Plan countries. Special arrangements were made to have newsreel coverage of the opening session released in Colombo Plan countries.

32. The post-conference tours were highly successful. About fifty started out on the main tour of Montreal, Kingston, Toronto and Niagara Falls. About twelve took the brief northern tour to Arvida in planes provided by the Department of Transport; it was also to have visited Knob Lake but was forced back by bad weather. About twenty went on the Western tour. Asian delegates made up a high percentage of all the tour parties. The tours gave some Canadians an opportunity to meet a representative group of Asians at first hand and to learn more about their countries.

33. A pleasing feature of the conference and the tours was the extent to which delegates were entertained by non-official groups or simply went off on their own to visit people or places which interested them. This happened quite spontaneously, but always in a way which was of benefit both to the visitors and to the hosts.

34. The impact of Canada upon the Asian delegates was greater than had been anticipated. Subsequent reports have indicated how much the country and the people impressed both Asian Ministers and Officials. The Asians equally left a very dignified and pleasant impression with the Canadian people; it is noteworthy that the tours were carried out without even the slightest evidence of any incidents relating to an unfriendly reception or discrimination.

35. In providing hospitality on the scale indicated in this memorandum for visiting delegates, numbering about ninety at the peak period, the Canadian Government was following the precedent established at previous Colombo Plan conferences in New Delhi and Karachi. Another justification for meeting some expenses not normally met at international conferences was the fact that most of the Colombo Plan countries are short of dollars; Canada's hospitality made it easier for them to send delegations of a suitable size. (In view of the fact that Canada has now taken its turn as host, it would be open to us to suggest that in the future — especially with the increase in the number of member countries, and hence of delegations — it might be desirable for each delegation to cover a larger part of its own expenses).

36. One aspect of the conference arrangements was, as was expected, uneconomical: the use of the Parliamentary Restaurant for lunch. The extent to which this contributed to the easy functioning of the conference will, it is hoped, justify the expense. While the conference accounts have not yet all been settled, it appears that the amount spent will be well within the amount budgeted and in line with the amounts approved for particular purposes.

Ottawa, May 19, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: Our telegram No. 95 of May 18.†

MEETINGS WITH MR. RAJU COOMARASWAMY REGARDING THE 1954/55 COLOMBO PLAN ALLOTMENT FOR CEYLON

As I explained in my telegram, meetings were held in Ottawa between May 6 and May 14 with Mr. Coomaraswamy, the Assistant Secretary of the Department of Finance in Colombo. I am enclosing with this despatch a copy of the letter which was given to Coomaraswamy at the conclusion of these meetings, which sets out the conclusions reached at the official level and which indicates the type of programme which we now propose to recommend to the Ministers. I am also enclosing for your information a copy of the minutes of the Colombo Group meeting on May 11, which represents a summary of the thinking of Canadian officials which led up to the development of the programme set out in the letter to Coomaraswamy.

2. Mr. Coomaraswamy originally presented a list of projects which totalled over $7 million. When it became clear that the Canadian officials were working on the basis of a figure approximately the same as last year, i.e. $2 million, Coomaraswamy proposed that an interest free loan might be made to Ceylon to cover the difference. For reasons that are set out on page 4 of the minutes of the Colombo Group meeting, this proposal was not actively followed up. Moreover, our Prime Minister had indicated that we should not disturb the rough balance which existed last year in the apportionment of Colombo Plan funds to the three recipient countries. Since funds had already been committed to India and Pakistan on only a slightly reduced scale, it meant that the allotment for Ceylon would have to be in the order of about $2 million, a figure roughly the same as last year.

3. As we indicated in our telegram, the new funds which officials are prepared to recommend for the 1954/55 programme will total $2,115,000. In addition, $200,000 will be transferred from the amounts already voted last year for the equipping of a School of Practical Technology. As you will recall, the total funds allotted last year for this project were $500,000, part of which was to be in flour for local building costs and the remainder in equipment. There were some doubts in the minds of Canadian officials about this procedure, but a formula was finally developed as is set out on page 2 of the letter to Mr. Coomaraswamy.

4. Canadian officials were sympathetic to the budgetary difficulties that Ceylon is experiencing, and realized that this forthcoming year was considered a critical one. Nevertheless, we did not consider that the budget presented a crisis calling for extraordinary or emergency aid as for example in the case of the special grant of wheat to Pakistan. The programme which it is now proposed to recommend to Cabinet will contribute to many of the projects to which the Ceylonese Government give extremely high priority. At the same time, we are not likely to be exposed to criticism from the other two recipient countries whose allotments will be reasonably well maintained this year.

5. As you will see, if the recommended programme is approved, a total of $800,000 in flour will be made available for counterpart assistance in 1954/55. Since Australia is the major supplier of flour to Ceylon, we have asked our mission in Canberra to inform the Australian authorities of our intention and to point out that this amount falls well within what we have been exporting over the past couple of years to Ceylon and what in fact Ceylon would expect to purchase from us this year. To avoid placing unusually large amounts of Canadian flour on the Ceylonese market, we would phase the shipments so that part of it arrived in 1954 and the remainder in 1955.

6. We should perhaps mention one other point that came up in a supplementary discussion between Ritchie and Coomaraswamy which touched on the problem of housing the equipment for the research laboratories which Canada is providing. You will recall in your letter No. 178 of March 26† you informed us that the Ceylonese authorities were hoping that Canada might provide counterpart funds which would pay for the local costs of the required buildings. Ritchie pointed out to Coomaraswamy that the Canadian authorities viewed this as a firm commitment on the part of the Ceylonese Government and that there was little likelihood of Canada agreeing to a change in this understanding. It was also pointed out that the estimated cost of the buildings, about $65,000, appeared to be high in relation to the equipment which would be stored in them. If the new programme for 1954/55 is approved, Canada will be assuming a substantial amount of local costs, and in the light of this it is hoped that the Ceylon Government will find some way to provide buildings for this laboratory equipment. The equipment, incidentally, is now available, and we are anxious to ship it as soon as the buildings become available. Mr. Coomaraswamy agreed in the end that it was likely that his Government would be able to make some arrangement. When he returns to Ceylon, it might be useful for you to follow this up to ascertain that the Ceylonese are in fact going to take steps to provide housing for our laboratory equipment.

7. The information in this despatch and in the attachments is, of course, for your own confidential information. We hope that the recommendations will be sent to the Ministers within the next couple of weeks, but it is important that no publicity should be given these proposals at this time. As you are aware from previous exchange of correspondence, it is difficult but essential to avoid premature publicity for Colombo Plan assistance. When a programme has been approved, we will, of course, immediately inform you so that you may undertake the necessary formal notification of the Ceylonese Government.

Procès-verbal de la réunion du groupe de Colombo

Minutes of Meeting of Colombo Group

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], May 11, 1954

Those present:

Mr. A.E. Ritchie, Chairman
Mr. Raju Coomaraswamy, Assistant Secretary, Ceylon Ministry of Finance
Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, Department of Finance
Mr. J.P. Manion, Department of Trade and Commerce
Mr. R.W. Rosenthal, Assistant Colombo Plan Administrator
Mr. P.A. Bridle, Department of External Affairs

Also present:

Messrs. Pratt, Pollock, Churchill, Stoner and Jay
(Mr. Nik Cavell, Colombo Plan Administrator, and Messrs. L. Rasminsky and G. Freeman, of the Bank of Canada, were present at the earlier meetings referred to in the opening remarks of the Chairman).

The Chairman recalled that at its meeting with Mr. Coomaraswamy on Thursday, May 6, the Group had been asked to consider a programme comprising nine projects formally presented through our Mission in Colombo and an additional project (for the removal of the Science Faculty to the new University site at Per-adenya) formally presented by Mr. Coomaraswamy. The Chairman explained that since that earlier meeting a number of discussions had been held among the Canadian officials concerned, who, at a meeting on May 10, had come to the view that, on the basis of there being about $2 million available for capital aid for Ceylon, an appropriate programme might consist of the following:

(1) $1,330,000 for diesel locomotives and sleepers, which had been given high priority in the Ceylon projects and which was included in the Ceylon budget.

(2) $300,000—Gal Oya, which was an attractive project from the Canadian point of view since it would likely appeal to the Canadian public and seemed to have special importance for both the Canadian Government and the public.

(3) $370,000—flour, the counterpart funds from which might be directed to the fisheries harbour.

2. As a counter-proposal, Mr. Coomaraswamy suggested that a programme of about that size might consist of assistance for the following projects:

(1) $600,000 in the form of flour for counterpart assistance to the fisheries harbour project;

(2) $600,000 for Canadian equipment for the port development project;

(3) $910,000 for four diesel locomotives and the balance in creosoted sleepers (all of which would generate counterpart funds);

(4) $160,000—telecommunication equipment for the Colombo airport;

(5) $200,000 for agricultural and other equipment for the Gal Oya dry farming scheme;

(6) $200,000 worth of flour for rural road development.

Mr. Coomaraswamy stressed that this programme, totalling a little more than $2,600,000, was primarily designed to bring relief to the budget position in Ceylon. He explained that the overall programme represented a reduction from the original Ceylon request in the light of the need to present a programme on the same order as in previous years. He said that he understood the difficulties that might arise in respect of the United States equipment that was included in the request in question, and it was his intention to propose that Canadian equipment for port development be supplied up to the total amount listed in his suggested programme. There could be full consultation on means of avoiding or overcoming any technical difficulties that might arise as between Canadian equipment supplied by Canada and equipment purchased by Ceylon from other sources.

3. During discussion it was noted that although the programme now put forward by Mr. Coomaraswamy was in excess of $2 million, it was likely that the total indicated would be reduced by supply difficulties, although the higher prices of some Canadian equipment might offset this and keep the total up. In the event that an excess over $2 million remained after the removal of those items which had too high a percentage of foreign content, it might be necessary to think in terms of not taking on one or other of the projects. In this connection, Mr. Coomaraswamy was warned that the Canadian officials would wish to look most closely at all of the projects listed with a view to determining whether or not they (or the particular items of Canadian equipment involved) were of a kind that Canada would wish to provide under the Colombo Plan.

4. Mr. Coomaraswamy indicated that if it did become necessary to remove a project, he would prefer that projects at the end of the list be taken off first.

5. During discussion it was also noted that, should it become necessary to make cuts in the programme from the point of view of the supply position in Canada, which would take the total below the $2 million figure, consideration would be given to the possibility of increasing the allocation of assistance to the first three projects listed, all of which were in the budget.

6. It was agreed with Mr. Coomaraswamy that the Canadian officials would give urgent attention to his most recent proposals, both from the point of view of availability of equipment and of whether or not individual projects were of a kind Canada might wish to assist, and would have a further meeting with him at 11 a.m. on Friday, May 14 in the Conference Room.

7. If Canadian aid to Ceylon was not to exceed that of previous years, Mr. Coomaraswamy formally advanced a new proposal. He suggested that consideration might be given to the possibility of extending an interest free loan to his country which he hoped might be on the order of $5 million. He pointed out that such a loan would help to meet the special difficulties facing his country's budget this year, and would not be taken by his country as a precedent for Canadian action in subsequent years. He drew attention to the instance in which special emergency aid had been given to Pakistan in the form of wheat which had later been reimbursed to the Colombo Plan vote. He assured the Group that a loan of this kind would be used only to purchase Canadian equipment and to meet local costs in connection with projects coming within the Ceylon budget.

8. To emphasize the seriousness with which the Ceylon Government regards its budgetary position, Mr. Coomaraswamy pointed out that in the preceding years his Government had been faced by a growing and serious trend towards deficit financing and inflation. In an effort to check this, measures were imposed last year which, because of their severity, contributed to changes in the existing government. These measures have been maintained by the government. The estimates for the 1954/55 budget are being kept at about the same level as the previous year. Essential economic developmental projects already started are being continued, despite the natural growth in cost as they progress, only by drastic curtailment of ordinary government expenditures. Generally no new projects are being undertaken despite the fact that several important ones are ready to go ahead if funds or equipment could be made available without increasing the budgetary burden.

9. According to Mr. Coomaraswamy, the estimated expenditure for 1954/55 is Rs. 1040 million ($208 million). Revenue is estimated at Rs. 950 million ($190 million), leaving a gap of Rs. 90 million ($18 million). This gap will be partially closed by a loan of £5 million (Rs. 65 million) from the United Kingdom Government. On the basis of present estimates, this leaves a deficit of Rs. 25 million ($5 million), but Mr. Coomaraswamy pointed out that to this figure must be added a sum of between Rs. 10 million to Rs. 15 million arising from the local costs of hydro-electric projects, the external costs of which are being financed through a loan from the International Bank. There is also a possibility that the Ceylonese Cabinet may decide to add to the estimates the cost of an important part of the Gal Oya development which Ceylonese officials did not include in their estimates. Taking this contingency into account, the estimated deficit for 1954/55 could amount to about Rs. 50 million ($10 million).

10. Mr. Coomaraswamy stressed that the advisers to the Ceylonese Government (including the Reserve Bank) were seriously worried about the possible internal economic effects of a budget deficit, and were urging the Government to budget for a surplus if at all possible.

11. Mr. Coomaraswamy also drew attention to the loss by Ceylon of foreign exchange. In January 1952 external assets held by the Ceylonese Government amounted to Rs. 1200 million ($240 million); today their holdings were only Rs. 650 million ($130 million). The Ceylonese Government expects this loss to continue, although at a slower rate. Because of the demand for imports in Ceylon, any budget deficit would be reflected in a further decline of these foreign exchange reserves.

12. The Chairman mentioned that it had not been made entirely clear to him in what way the Ceylon budgetary position was of the same emergency character as the financial and food position of Pakistan at the time of the special emergency assistance to that country. He also pointed out that when the extraordinary situation in Pakistan had arisen, there had happily been uncommitted funds within the Colombo Plan vote which could be used as a special measure to grant the assistance requested. In the present case of Ceylon, however, there was unfortunately only a small balance of uncommitted funds on hand.

13. Mr. Plumptre expressed the view that it might be difficult to justify the relating of Colombo Plan aid directly to the danger of a budgetary deficit. In his opinion this was a problem which every government faces and against which, in principle, the Canadian Government would generally not be favourably disposed to provide a cushion. On the other hand, he recognized that a real loan might be on a different footing to a grant in respect of assisting to meet a threatened budget deficit. He did not, however, see where there could be alternative sources to the Colombo Plan vote from which funds might be made available for the purpose envisaged. No suitable market for such a purpose could be found in Canada. The Export Credit Insurance Act, which provided certain authority under which loan assistance could be advanced, seemed on further investigation to be unsuitable for the kind of loan which Mr. Coomaraswamy had in mind, since interest rates under it are commercial and such credits are usually for only short terms.

14. In sum, therefore, there seemed only two possible means of providing additional aid to Ceylon at this time. Either there would have to be a general increase in the total Colombo Plan vote this year, or the normal proportion of aid available for India, Pakistan and Ceylon individually would have to be altered in Ceylon's favour. Since neither of these courses was likely to be followed in the foreseeable future, Mr. Coomaraswamy was informed that if he wished to put forward his proposal for a loan on a more formal basis, it would of course be given sympathetic consideration, but he should not be hopeful that a loan would be forthcoming.

Head, Economic Division, to Assistant Secretary, Department of Finance of Ceylon

Ottawa, May 14, 1954

My dear Coomaraswamy,

I wanted to let you know informally before your departure of the conclusions that we have reached at the official level about the projects you have placed before us for assistance from Canada under the Colombo Plan. I am sure you appreciate that anything I may say at this time must be subject to whatever decisions are eventually taken by the Government.

Before turning to the new projects, I thought it might be useful to run over the developments since your visit to Ottawa in July, 1953.³⁹ At that time we were able to notify you that officials were recommending to the Canadian Government that definite approval be given to projects totalling $1,785,000, and that approval in principle, subject to further investigation, be given to a pest control project and to some supplementary assistance for the fisheries pilot project. As you know, these recommendations were accepted by the Canadian Government. The Ceylonese Government was advised of these decisions on July 17 by the Acting Canadian High Commissioner in Colombo. Subsequently your Government was informed of our readiness to provide up to $28,000 worth of assistance for pest control purposes. As we explained at the beginning of our current talks, officials are now recommending to the Canadian Government that in response to the specific request received from Ceylon, the supplementary assistance for the fisheries project referred to above should be provided in an amount which would bring the total Canadian contribution to the external cost of that project up to approximately $1,407,000 (including the $1 million approved in connection with the first year's programme). This will result in an average total programme of approximately $2 million in each of the first two years.

With respect to those proposals which you have suggested might be included in the programme for 1954/55, Canadian officials intend to recommend to the Government that assistance be provided for the following projects:

To be financed out of 1954/55 appropriations

(1) Fisheries harbour

Canadian officials will recommend that flour to an amount of $600,000 should be supplied so that the counterpart fund equivalent could be used for local costs at the fisheries harbour in view of the high priority which you have given to this project.

³⁹ Voir/See Volume 19, Document 615.

(2) Colombo port development

Canadian officials will recommend that electrical and other equipment (details to be agreed later) should be made available to assist in the development of the Colombo port up to an amount of $400,000.

(3) Railway equipment

Canadian officials will recommend that in 1954/55 three additional diesel locomotives should be provided, together with a quantity of mixed Douglas fir creosoted sleepers, up to a total cost for all these items of $700,000.

(4) Development of Colombo airport

We will recommend that telecommunications equipment for use at Colombo airport should be supplied under the new programme up to an amount totalling $205,000.

(5) Agricultural development in Gal Oya

Canadian officials will recommend that agricultural equipment, a transmission line and certain other related items be supplied up to a total of $210,000 for use in assisting agricultural development in the Gal Oya area.

The total of the above programme which we propose to recommend to the Canadian Government for 1954/55 is about $2,115,000.⁴⁰

To be financed out of 1953/54 appropriations

(6) Rural roads

In 1953/54, the Canadian Government assigned an expert to Ceylon to assist in preparing plans for a School of Practical Technology. At the same time the Government agreed to supply a quantity of flour, the proceeds from which would be used to meet construction costs of this School, and it also undertook to contribute towards the costs of equipping the School when built. Since, in the ordinary course, such equipment will not be required until 1955/56, and since 1954/55 is regarded as a critical year in the Ceylon Government's financial and development programme, Canadian officials are prepared to recommend to their Government that it agree that $200,000 of the amount set aside for this purpose may be used in 1954/55 for the provision of flour to be sold for rupees which, in turn, will be applied to the costs of culverts and other materials needed in Ceylon's rural road-building programme. The Canadian officials will recommend that it be understood between the two Governments that the costs of equipment for the School of Practical Technology would be included as part of any regular programme of aid to Ceylon in 1955/56, subject to the appropriation of funds in that fiscal year.

This arrangement would have the effect of adding the equivalent of $200,000 to the funds available to the Government of Ceylon in the particularly difficult year 1954/55 without thereby increasing the amount of new money to be allocated by Canada to Ceylon in that fiscal year or in the next.

The availability from Canadian sources of the bulk of the materials and equipment required for these projects within the amounts indicated has been investigated in a preliminary manner, and it is confidently expected that these contributions will be feasible if the programme as outlined above is approved by the Government. The precise composition of the aid which might best be given to these projects cannot be settled definitely at this time, since, in the event that this programme is approved, it will be necessary to enquire further into, and to consult with the Ceylonese authorities on, a variety of details. These would include specifications for some of the equipment, the feasibility of relating such equipment as is available from Canada with any equipment which Ceylon may be procuring from other sources for these same projects, and the general practicability of using effectively in some of these projects the types and amounts of equipment which Canada might supply from the larger list which you have submitted in presenting your proposed programme. It will also be necessary at a later stage to discuss with the Ceylonese authorities such matters as the administrative arrangements for some of these projects and the terms governing the creation and use of counterpart funds where appropriate. For example, if the programme suggested above is approved, counterpart funds will be generated by the flour and by the railway equipment.

Your presentation and explanation of the various proposals have been most useful and have helped Canadian officials to determine the form of the recommendations which should be sent to the Ministers. It will be appreciated that it is difficult to compare the amount of assistance provided in one year with that provided in another, if only for the reason that the period in which assistance is actually provided rarely coincides with either the fiscal or calendar year. In the nature of the operation, detailed decisions about individual projects, expenditures of funds and indeed the receipt of goods or services tend to be spread unevenly over the years. It is to be hoped that the programme outlined above, if approved by the Canadian Government, will make an effective contribution to Ceylon's economic development during the current year.

I am sure I speak for all of those with whom you have had contact here in Ottawa, when I say how much we appreciate your coming to Canada at this time to discuss the new programme for Ceylon. Your presence has been most helpful, and I hope to be able to inform you shortly of any decisions which the Ministers may reach.

Yours sincerely,
A.E. RITCHIE

DESPATCH E-483

Ottawa, October 25, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE CEYLON DELEGATION DURING THE CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE MEETING

In other despatches we have reported to you some of the supplementary discussions that Canadian officials had with the Ceylon Delegation during the recent Consultative Committee meeting. There is attached to this despatch a copy of a letter† sent to this Department by Mr. Cavell which summarizes the discussions which he had with Mr. Raju Coomaraswamy about the various Canadian projects in Ceylon.

2. I think only item 2 concerning the scientific equipment for the University requires an explanation. On several occasions Canadian officials urged Coomaraswamy in the strongest terms to try to find the money to provide the building for this equipment for the University of Ceylon. There has evidently been a genuine misunderstanding on this point. The Ceylon authorities seem to have assumed that we were going to supply the building or that a suitable one was already available at the University, while it was our impression that we were only providing equipment. Coomaraswamy pointed out that the only way in which his Government could secure money would be to make a special request to Parliament. This would undoubtedly cause considerable embarrassment for the Government and lead to much criticism of Colombo Plan activities in general. Canadian officials indicated that it was not easy for the Canadian Government to find the funds for this building, although this appeared to be now the only possible course. Canadian officials have therefore under consideration a proposal that Canada should provide up to $50,000 in flour. If it is decided to make such a recommendation to Cabinet and if it is approved, the counterpart funds arising from the sale of this flour would be used to finance the costs of construction of the building.

3. Coomaraswamy explained that he would be leaving Washington about October 28. If by that time the Canadian Government were in a position to notify him that it was likely that this new flour would be made available, he could make arrangements to transfer money from existing counterpart funds so that work on the building could get under way immediately. These funds would then be reimbursed from the sale of the $50,000 worth of Canadian flour.

4. If Canadian officials decide to recommend such an expenditure, no new funds will be involved. There is sufficient saving arising out of the 1953-54 allotment for diesels to provide for the purchase of this flour. You will recall that it was originally anticipated that Canada would supply three diesel locomotives; but it was later agreed that two diesels of a more powerful nature would be provided. (Whilst funds for the flour could presumably be found in the 1953-54 vote for the diesels, this does not imply acceptance of the principle that unexpended moneys of this nature are freely available to the recipient country for whom the original allocation was made).

5. We will cable you as soon as a decision is taken in Ottawa concerning the financing of a building for the University.

COLOMBO PLAN — AID FOR CEYLON

At its meeting of May 28, 1954 the Treasury Board approved, out of funds available for technical assistance projects, the supply of laboratory and other equipment for the Faculty of Agriculture at the University of Ceylon, at a cost of approximately $17,000. At the time that this equipment was requested by the Ceylon Government, a request was also made that Canada should assist in the construction of a building at the University to house this equipment. It was suggested, however, to the Ceylon authorities that such a building might be made available by the University or by the Ceylon Government. The Ceylon Government have now informed us that because the University is in a very difficult financial position, it is impossible for the University to finance the cost of this building. There is also no existing appropriation from which the Ceylon Government could finance it and the only way in which the Ceylon government could find the money would be to request a special vote from the Ceylon Parliament, which is not considered practicable at this stage. In these circumstances, the Ceylon Government have renewed their request that Canada should assist by financing the construction of the building. Canadian officials have informed the Ceylon authorities that they consider it regrettable that Ceylon is unable to provide this building from its own means. In the circumstances, however, it appears desirable that consideration be given by the Canadian authorities to this request, especially since the equipment itself is virtually ready for installation.

It is estimated that the cost of construction of this building will be less than $50,000. This could be financed through the provision of flour from Canada which would in turn be sold by the Ceylon Government and the counterpart funds so established would then be used to meet the cost of construction of the building. The provision of this flour would not involve the allocation of any new funds to Ceylon, since the amount required could be found in the unused balance remaining from an allocation under the 1953-54 programme to provide diesel locomotives to Ceylon.

Recommendation

It is recommended that Canada should assist by financing the construction of a building at the Agricultural Faculty of the University of Ceylon in which laboratory and other equipment being provided from Canada would be housed. Canadian assistance would take the form of flour to be made available in the amount necessary to provide up to $50,000 for this purpose. The funds would come from allocations already made to Ceylon under earlier programmes.⁴¹

COLOMBO PLAN — ALLOCATION OF RUPEE COUNTERPART FUNDS ARISING FROM CANADIAN AID

On September 12, 1951, Cabinet approved an expenditure not to exceed $15 million for the supply of wheat to India under the Colombo Plan, on condition that the Government of India be requested (a) to set up "counterpart funds" equal in value to the wheat eventually provided, and (b) to use these funds for development projects in consultation with Canadian officials.⁴² $10 million worth of wheat was in fact provided to India under the 1951/52 programme of capital aid, and rupee counterpart funds of equal value have, with the agreement of Canadian officials, been allocated by the Indian authorities to meet the local costs of the important irrigation and hydro-electric project at Mayurakshi.

2. At its meeting on September 13, 1952 Cabinet approved the supply to India of a further $5 million worth of wheat during the fiscal year 1952-53 on the understanding that as for the earlier gift, rupee counterpart funds to an equivalent value would be established.⁴³ On March 27, 1953, Cabinet approved the provision to India of 40 locomotive boilers on the understanding that counterpart funds would be established in an amount which would be appropriate in the light of arrangements for financing the Indian Railways and other relevant considerations.⁴⁴ Subsequent negotiations with the Canadian supplier indicated that the cost of the boilers would be considerably less than the original estimate, and on November 17, 1953, Cabinet agreed that 10 locomotive boilers, additional to the 40 previously approved, should be provided from the amount of $2.08 million which had been set aside for this project.

3. The rupee counterpart funds arising from the 1952-53 $5 million gift of wheat have been set aside by the Indian authorities. The counterpart funds arising from the supply of locomotive boilers will not be set aside until delivery to India has been effected. Because the locomotive boilers make a direct contribution to Indian development, and because financial and administrative difficulties would arise if the Indian Railways were debited for the locomotive boilers at the equivalent of the price of their manufacture in Canada, it has in principle been agreed with the Indian authorities that the counterpart fund to be set up should be the equivalent of the international market price for similar boilers. The exact price per locomotive at which the counterpart fund should be established is still under consideration.

4. The question of the allocation for development purposes in India of the counterpart funds arising from the $5 million wheat gift and the supply of 50 locomotive boilers has been discussed with the Indian authorities who have proposed that they be applied against the local costs of the Mayurakshi Irrigation and Hydro-Electric Project to which it was previously agreed the counterpart funds from the 1951-52 $10 million wheat gift should be allocated. In view of the size and importance of the Mayurakshi Project and of Canada's special interest in it, it is considered that Cabinet approval should be obtained before agreeing to the Indian Government's proposal.

5. The Mayurakshi Scheme is one of the high-priority projects in India's five-year economic development plan. It is situated in the State of West Bengal, and will on completion irrigate 600,000 acres of land with an estimated resultant increased yield of approximately 400,000 tons of food annually. The Mayurakshi works, on which very considerable progress has already been made, will include a hydro-electric plant. It is expected that the project will be completed in 1955. In addition to the agreed allocation of the rupee counterpart funds arising from the 1951-52 $10 million gift of wheat, Cabinet has approved the provision for this project of $3 million worth of Canadian manufactured electrical equipment for which contracts are at present being placed. The Indian proposal has been discussed on an interdepartmental basis, and it is considered that the allocation of these rupee counterpart funds to the Mayurakshi Project would be desirable and useful. Assurances have been received from the Indian authorities that local expenditure of more than the amount of rupee counterpart funds arising from the $5 million gift of wheat and the provision of 50 locomotive boilers remains to be incurred on the project.

Recommendation

It is recommended that Cabinet agree to the Indian proposal that the counterpart funds arising from the grant of $5 million worth of wheat, and the provision of 50 locomotive boilers from Canada under the Colombo Plan be allocated to help meet the rupee cost of the Mayurakshi Irrigation and Hydro-Electric Project.⁴⁵

Ottawa, February 22, 1954

Dear Ed [Ritchie]:

RE COLOMBO PLAN, USE OF COUNTERPART FUNDS FOR MAYURAKSHI DAM

I refrained last week from raising this question except in reporting the decision to the Prime Minister, but I would like to ask you what we gain by allocating further counterpart funds to the Mayurakshi project. We have already, I understand, provided dollars and many rupees to this, we are associated with it to as large a degree as would seem necessary and apparently the project will go ahead to completion as rapidly if we do not aid it as if we do. Consequently the real effect of this application of counterpart funds must surely be simply to ease the budgetary problem of India and spare funds for other projects in regard to which we will have neither influence nor association.

Incidentally, the Cabinet paper did not touch on this sort of thing at all — I regard it as mainly an elementary explanation of the financial background with no real argument at all in support of the action proposed. Surely the considerable apparatus we have erected to deal with Colombo Plan matters is capable of something better than this?

Yours sincerely,
BOB [BRYCE]

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], March 1, 1954

Dear Bob [Bryce],

RE COLOMBO PLAN; USE OF COUNTERPART FUNDS FOR THE MAYURAKSHI DAM

In your letter of February 22 you have raised some very fair questions concerning the uses to which our counterpart funds are being put and concerning the manner in which the proposal referred to above was presented to Cabinet in our memorandum of February 16. Without going into too long a discussion, I hope that we can satisfy you on both scores.

I would start with the assumption that our counterpart funds can be allocated only to projects which are already in the Indian Five Year Plan and which are regarded as of a sufficiently high priority to be scheduled for early execution. It would, I think, be quite unreasonable for us to require such funds to be used on projects which are outside the Plan (or which come later in the Plan), especially if we are not prepared — as we generally are not — to meet the entire external and internal costs of such projects. We should then be making the Indians divert some of their own limited development resources to projects which they did not regard as sufficiently important or urgent. Even in the unlikely event of our being willing to cover the whole costs of such “new” projects, I think the Indians would have strong objections to such a course from a political (and “planning”) point of view. In any case, the understanding is that the projects to be assisted shall be ones agreed with the Government of India within the current phase of the Five Year Plan.

In these circumstances, it would seem pretty clear that the “real” economic effects of supplying goods which yield counterpart funds (apart, of course, from the usefulness of the goods themselves) should be judged not so much in relation to individual projects as in relation to the progress of the development programme as a whole. The theory is that such counterpart funds, by increasing the availability of resources to the Government of India’s Special Development Fund (and not merely to the current governmental budget), make possible a corresponding acceleration of the country’s economic development without additional inflation. That, I think, is the effect which our counterpart funds (and those of other countries) have in fact been having. Expenditures by the Indian Government on economic development are probably greater than they would otherwise have been by something like the amount of the counterpart funds. (That is not, of course, to say that the progress of the Five Year Plan is ahead of schedule. As you know that Plan always envisaged a good deal of foreign assistance — in fact somewhat more than has been forthcoming — to help in meeting internal as well as external costs).

In comparison with this main objective of influencing the general rate of economic developments, the allocation, or attribution, of our counterpart funds to particular projects does not have very much, if any, economic significance. It is largely a matter of choice on the basis of such considerations as:

(a) the extent to which the association of Canada's name with the project (given its type, technical and administrative soundness, location, etc.) will have an immediate and lasting favourable impact on some sections or other of the Indian people — without, of course, detracting from the part which is being played in the project by the present Indian Government whose position we are anxious to maintain and strengthen;

(b) the degree of nominal participation by Canada which is required in order to have the best effect. (Ten per cent might go unnoticed. A somewhat larger percentage — especially if combined with Canadian-made equipment — might lead to its being identified for all time as a "Canadian", or "Canadian-Indian", project;

(c) the interest which participation in the project might be expected to arouse in Canada; and

(d) the problem of securing statements of expenditures attributable to our counterpart funds which will be satisfactory to the Canadian Auditor General (see his latest report); a problem which might be considerably more manageable for a few well-run projects than for a large number of scattered ones.

From all these points of view, I think Mayurakshi is a pretty good (even an excellent) project to which to attribute something like the amount of counterpart funds so far allocated to it — and possibly some more. I also doubt that it is more likely than any other project which would be eligible for our counterpart assistance (in the sense of being included in the Five Year Plan with a high priority) "to go ahead to completion as rapidly if we do not aid it as if we do." Equally, so long as we are reasonably satisfied with the project, I do not see that we should be too worried at the possibility that such action may "spare funds for other projects in regard to which we will have neither influence nor association" — since this, too, would be true to the same degree of any other "eligible" project which we might take under our wing.

Even if you accept all — or most — of this, you may still feel that more should have been said in support of this recommendation in the Cabinet memorandum. I shall not take refuge in the frequent exhortations which we have received from Ministers and others to keep our submissions short, although I must say that it would take a pretty formidable memorandum to explain fully the significance (or mystique) of allocating counterpart funds. Since this was a memorandum addressed to Cabinet, I shall also not make too much of the fact that the original Cabinet decision of September 12, 1951 had envisaged that these particular counterpart funds would be used by the Indian Government in consultation with Canadian officials (as noted in the opening paragraph of the memorandum of February 16, 1954). Ministers have been given a good deal of information about counterpart fund operations in memoranda relating to various projects over the past two or three years and they have become fairly familiar with the Mayurakshi project in particular as a result of earlier discussions about both equipment and counterpart funds. Moreover, the proposal dealt with in the memorandum to Cabinet had been discussed at some length (and agreed) interdepartmentally and no doubt the Ministers primarily concerned had been consulted (and briefed) by their officials. Since the action being recommended to Ministers was primarily in the nature of a confirmation of this interdepartmental understanding, and was in keeping with the decision of January 1952 concerning the first $10 million, the memorandum seemed adequate for the purpose. In the future, we can, of course, attempt to make our presentations more detailed and thorough if that is thought desirable.

In case you may feel that we have not been giving enough attention to the intricacies of the counterpart fund arrangements, I attach a copy of an exchange of correspondence† which we have had with the Auditor General on the subject. Since you may also wonder whether we are concentrating solely on Mayurakshi as a matter of convenience and are not being alert to the possibilities of other projects, I would draw your attention to despatch No. 1103 of October 29, 1953 from New Delhi and in particular to paragraphs 13-17 of the enclosure (copy attached).‡ Finally, in order that you may have a comprehensive summary of the present position in respect of both capital equipment and counterpart funds, I am attaching a memorandum of January 14, 1954 with accompanying tables.‡⁴⁶

COLOMBO PLAN: COUNTERPART FUNDS

The Indian authorities have once again drawn to our attention the problem arising from the counterpart fund arrangements which governed the provision of $5 million worth of Canadian wheat to India in 1952-53. Our records show that the Indian High Commissioner in Ottawa was instructed, in October 1952, to raise this problem with you. We are also under the impression that the problem may have been mentioned in a wider context to Messrs. Deutsch and Ritchie when they visited New Delhi last autumn.⁴⁷

2. The substance of the Indian difficulty is, briefly, as follows. As part of our 1951-52 Colombo Plan programme Indian received a $10 million gift of Canadian wheat. This wheat was purchased at International Wheat Agreement prices and agreement was reached between the Canadian and Indian authorities that counterpart funds would be established in respect of the wheat in an amount equivalent to the Canadian purchase price of $10 million. The same counterpart fund arrangements applied to the subsequent Canadian gift of $5 million worth of wheat under the 1952-53 programme of aid to India. However, in this case we stipulated that the wheat should be purchased outside the International Wheat Agreement.

3. The Indian authorities claim that India's remaining wheat requirements in 1952-53 were procured under the International Wheat Agreement at a price of $1.80 per bushel. The gift wheat from Canada, which was based on a price of $2.17 per bushel, was added to the general pool for sale in the Indian market. The result was that the sales proceeds from this wheat were less than the price at which the wheat had been procured in Canada and a Government of India subsidy was required to bring the relevant counterpart fund up to the level stipulated in the earlier understanding between the Canadian and Indian Governments.

4. Apparently the Indian audit authorities have questioned the procedure under which credits have been made to the Special Development Fund in respect of our 1952-53 wheat gift in an amount higher than that which was realized from the sale of the wheat by the Government of India. The Indian authorities are hoping, therefore, that it will be possible for us to review these counterpart fund arrangements in an effort to see if something can be done to meet their position. They have suggested that our more recent understanding that counterpart funds for Canadian equipment would normally be credited at the "international market" price might provide an analogy for the procedure they are advocating in the case of the 1952-53 wheat. This is not, of course, a strictly valid analogy since the International Wheat Agreement price is, to all intents and purposes, a preferential price. However, you may be prepared to accept the selling price fixed by the Government of India for this wheat in the domestic market (which would presumably be somewhat higher than the I.W.A. price) as an appropriate price for counterpart fund purposes. This would at least eliminate the accounting problem of a Government subsidy for wheat supplied to India under the Colombo Plan.

COLOMBO PLAN: WHEAT COUNTERPART FUNDS

We are not aware of any talks while Messrs. Deutsch and Ritchie were in New Delhi concerning the possibility that, in determining the amount of counterpart funds required, wheat supplied by Canada under the Colombo Plan should be valued at the I.W.A. price, or the price actually received by the Indian authorities, rather than at the higher Class II price.

2. You will be familiar with the letter of Jan. 17, 1952 from Mr. Heeney to Mr. Saksena which indicated the general terms on which wheat would be provided. That letter proposed that deposits into the counterpart fund account would be "the rupee equivalent of total expenditures by the Canadian Government in respect of wheat supplied to India". The letter went on to recognize that "as the Indian Government is under no obligation regarding the price at which the wheat is distributed in India, receipts by the Government of India of the proceeds of sale of the wheat, after taking into account costs of ocean transportation and other costs incurred by the Government of India, will not necessarily be equal in value to the expenditures made by the Canadian Government". These terms were accepted by Mr. Saksena on behalf of his Government in a letter of February 25.

3. In connection with the subsequent request for a further $5 million worth of wheat, Mr. Saksena indicated in a letter of August 19, 1952 that "his Government desires that this should not be in addition to purchases made under the International Wheat Agreement, as was the case last year, but should form part of it". In our reply of September 15, we informed the High Commissioner that, in deciding to make available the amount of wheat requested, the Canadian Government had specified that "the quantity of wheat procured with this amount of money is to be outside the International Wheat Agreement and additional to any amount which India may be purchasing from Canada under that Agreement".

4. In the light of these various exchanges, we would not think it appropriate to alter at this stage the basis on which counterpart funds should be calculated. In any discussions which you may be having with the Indian authorities on this subject, you might wish to make the following points:

(a) since the wheat provided by Canada to India under the Colombo Plan was supplied on a grant basis and not imported commercially by the Indians, it was not considered appropriate to count it against India's import obligations (or Canada's export obligations) under the I.W.A.;

(b) in view of the fact that these transactions did not appear to qualify for inclusion within the I.W.A., the Canadian Wheat Board had no alternative but to charge Class II (or non-I.W.A.) prices;

(c) the Canadian Wheat Board was, in fact, paid at those prices;

(d) as indicated by the correspondence referred to above, the Indian authorities were aware of the situation and accepted the wheat on this basis;

(e) there is no similarity between these transactions and those involving the locomotives or the Mayurakshi electrical equipment where Canadian prices appeared to be high in relation to prices from other sources. As you will be aware, the Canadian Class II price for wheat compares favourably with any "world market price" for wheat outside the I.W.A.

(f) as we pointed out in our letter of January 17, 1952, it is no affair of ours if the recipients of Canadian wheat under the Colombo Plan choose to subsidize their distribution of wheat for domestic reasons;

(g) the arrangements for India are the same as those made for Pakistan which is also being required to credit Colombo Plan wheat for counterpart fund purposes at the Class II price;

(h) insofar as the counterpart funds resulting from these wheat transactions are devoted to projects scheduled for execution currently under the five-year plan, the Indian problem appears to be entirely a bookkeeping one without real economic (or even budgetary) significance;

(i) apart from the question of principle mentioned in (a) above, and apart from the fact that the Indian authorities had accepted Canadian wheat on the proposed terms, the alteration of the arrangement at this stage after the transactions have been completed and entered in our books would present problems for us from an accounting and auditing point of view which would be at least as serious as those which are troubling the Indian authorities.

5. In the light of all these factors, we are not inclined to request other Departments here to reconsider the arrangements already made with the Indian authorities. We would hope that, in the circumstances, the Indian Government would not press the matter further.

6. Incidentally, in the light of your letter, we were somewhat puzzled by the first change which the Indians proposed in the press release concerning Canadian aid to the Mayurakshi project as reported in your telegram No. 135 of April 22.† You will recall that the original draft of this release referred to agreement on the proposal of the Indian Government that additional counterpart funds "arising from" Canadian aid be allocated to Mayurakshi. This was revised to refer to counterpart funds "raised out of" Canada's economic assistance to India. We trust that this alteration was not intended to limit counterpart funds to the actual proceeds received by the Indian Government from the sale of the wheat. This would be an interpretation which would not be acceptable to us for the various reasons indicated earlier in this letter.

COLOMBO PLAN: AID PROGRAMME FOR 1954-55

The Indian authorities have now submitted to us three major projects for which they would like assistance from Canada under the auspices of the Colombo Plan. The Indian proposals are based on recommendations by the Planning Commission and carry the concurrence of the Minister of Finance.

2. As you know, approximately $10 million of Canadian aid funds has already been committed toward the completion of our locomotive procurement programme which was initiated during the preceding fiscal year. The balance of the programme, on the basis of the Indian proposals, might be made up as follows:

Chambal Project: generating plant and equipment (three units of 23,000 KW each).	$4,000,000
--	-------------

Chambal Project: equipment for substations in Madhya Bharat and Rajasthan.	$4,000,000
--	-------------

Small Thermal Power Sets and equipment for local transmission and distribution schemes.	up to $5,800,000
---	-------------------

Rihand Project: generating plant and equipment (three units of 40,000 KW each).	$5,000,000
---	-------------

3. The Indian authorities have, as you will note, submitted a programme which would extend over the next two years. This period is co-terminous with the remaining period of operation of the current Five Year Plan. A two-year programme along the lines suggested would, therefore, facilitate the task of the Indian planners in formulation the balance of their own development programme. It would also have the advantage of ensuring that the various items of generating and transmission equipment will be available when required.

4. Needless to say, the Indians are fully aware that funds for Canadian participation in the Colombo Plan are appropriated from year to year. They have suggested, however, that it might be possible for us to obtain approval in principle for a two-year programme subject to the necessary funds being voted by Parliament. This was, of course, the procedure we adopted in acceding to the Indian request for 120 W.P. type locomotives last year.

5. Even if the formulation of a two-year programme at this stage were acceptable to the Canadian Government (and I think that this approach to long-term planning has much to recommend it), it would seem that the programme proposed by the Indians is likely to absorb funds in excess of those which are normally allocated to India under the Colombo Plan in any two-year period. If we assume that about another $10 million will be required to complete the provision of 120 steam locomotives to India,⁴⁸ and if we also assume that the price estimates included in the Indian proposals are reasonably close to the actual cost of the equipment in Canada, the aggregate of our contribution to India during 1954-55 and 1955-56 would be $28.8 million. This is about $1.5 million more than, on the basis of past experience, we are likely to have available for expenditure in India.

6. It may, however, be that the Indian estimates are higher than prevailing prices for this type of equipment in Canada.⁴⁹ It is also possible that the Government may find itself in a position to increase the appropriation for economic aid under the Colombo Plan in 1955-56. In the absence of either of these factors the Indians themselves have suggested that we treat the figure of $5.8 million for the provision of thermal power sets as a maximum figure, and that we select only as many of the small town and rural electrification projects as can be financed within the amount which will be available to India. We might also, at least until the end of this year, leave ourselves an uncommitted margin of about $1 million which we could, if necessary, devote to the small industries programme and the Delhi milk supply project (see paragraphs 16 and 17 below). This formula would, I think, make it possible for us to agree in principle at this stage to the Indian proposals as a whole.

7. If we decided to deal with the Indian proposals successively, the Chambal Project should probably be given the highest priority. It is our understanding that the excavation work for the dam foundations is already under way. We have also been told that the specifications for the generating plant and equipment were recently completed by the Central Water and Power Commission and that a final project report is now in active preparation. Copies of the specifications and the project report could be made available to us at an early date. In the meantime work has

⁴⁸ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Closer to 11 million now [O.G. Stoner]

⁴⁹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

This of course we cannot say until we see list of desired equipment. [O.G. Stoner] been started on the drawing up of the designs and specifications for the grid substations.

8. You will recall that the possibility of Canadian aid for the Chambal Project was first raised with us in the spring of 1953 when Mr. Cavell had an opportunity of discussing the project at an official meeting of the Planning Commission. Since that time much progress has been made and there is every evidence that the Government of India considers it to have a very high priority among the major multi-purpose projects now under construction. The cost of the project is now estimated at about 100 million dollars (Rs. 52 crores against an earlier estimate of Rs. 33.75 crores). It is expected that, on completion, the project will irrigate a total area of 1.2 million acres, about half of it in Madhya Bharat and the other half in Rajasthan. The additional foodgrain yield expected is of the order of 400,000 tons annually.

9. The United States Government agreed last year to make available $1,669,873 worth of construction equipment for the project. This contribution was matched by an Indian undertaking to spend about 2 million dollars (Rs. 1 crore) on initial construction work. I understand that additional United States funds are likely to be allocated to the Chambal Project for the procurement of construction equipment and supplies. On the other hand, we have been assured by the United States Technical Co-operation Mission that they have not been asked to contribute to the hydro-electric side of the project and that they do not propose to offer such a contribution on their own initiative.

10. The next highest priority after Chambal is assigned by the Indians to the provision of thermal power sets and equipment for the small town and rural electrification project. This project forms part of the recent expansion of the Five Year Plan and was formulated specifically to provide additional employment in the rural sector. The small thermal and diesel generating units which we have been asked to supply would serve to meet the needs of cottage and small-scale industries and would also be used to activate pump sets for irrigating and draining agricultural land. The project is intended to cover five states and would thus have the advantage of spreading the Canadian contribution over a wide geographical area without any concomitant problem of implementation or supervision.⁵⁰

11. The Rihand Valley Development Project in Uttar Pradesh is not yet sufficiently far advanced to permit the drawing up of detailed specifications for the hydro-electric equipment which might be provided by Canada. The project involves a total cost of about 70 million dollars (Rs. 35.2 crores); of this about Rs. 32.93 crores is expected to be spent by March 31, 1957. The foreign exchange cost is estimated to be about 47% of the total cost and this makes Rihand an attractive and suitable project for external assistance. The United States Government has already undertaken to contribute $11 million in the form of construction plant, equipment and supplies as well as technical services. The Indians for their part agreed to match the United States contribution by setting aside about 33 million dollars (Rs. 16.69 crores) for internal expenditure on the project.

⁵⁰ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Why not? A.E. R[itchie]

12. On completion the Rihand Project is to have an installed capacity of 240,000 KW. Only half this capacity is envisaged for the first phase of the project. Some of the power thus made available will be used for a wide range of basic industries in the area to be served by the project. Power from the Rihand Valley Development will also be used to irrigate about 1.6 million acres from close to 4,000 tubewells which either have been or are expected shortly to be constructed. A further 450,000 acres are expected to be irrigated in the neighbouring state of Bihar. The aggregate increase in foodgrain production is estimated to be about 600,000 tons annually.

13. I attach for your information one copy each of the following documentation which is relevant to the Indian proposals:

(a) Extract from the 1952 project report on the Chambal Project comprising an analysis of the irrigation and power aspects of the project (the full report is, I think, in Mr. Cavell's hands);

(b) Draft project statement on the supply of plant and equipment for small town and rural electrification;

(c) Operational Agreement No. 20 of March 29, 1954, between the Governments of India and the United States on the project for Rihand Valley development.

14. You will note that the draft statement on the provision of small thermal power sets was obviously drawn up for submission to the United States Technical Co-operation Mission. The Indians did not, of course, suggest to us that any of their proposals had previously been referred to other donor governments and agencies or might still be under consideration in other quarters. However, we were able to confirm that an identical request for thermal power sets had, in fact, been addressed to the Americans. The Americans had also at one time been asked to undertake an advance commitment to provide the hydro-electric equipment for Rihand but had declined to do so until the project had moved off the ground.

15. The Ministry of Finance seemed a little taken aback when we suggested that the cause of using foreign aid to full advantage might have been served better if we had at least been told that some of the projects proposed for Canadian participation had also been submitted to the Americans. Mr. Prem Narain of the Ministry of Finance thought that the request for thermal sets had not been met by the United States Technical Co-operation Mission (the fact is that they have not yet had an opportunity of considering it) and that any earlier request for hydro-electric equipment for Rihand must surely have been premature. Be that as it may, it is our understanding that the Americans would have no objection to our going ahead with either project provided we keep them informed. I propose to confirm this understanding by writing to the United States Ambassador.⁵¹

16. It is possible that, at a later date, a request may be directed to us to contribute to the Delhi milk supply project and it is partly for that reason that I suggest that we keep until the end of this year about $1 million of the 1954-55 appropriation uncommitted. We have been informed that the Delhi milk supply project is now being worked out in detail by the Central Ministry of Food and Agriculture and that

⁵¹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
When? [A.E. Ritchie]

an advisory board, comprising representatives of the Ministry of Finance, the Planning Commission and Delhi State, has been constituted for this purpose. Evidently the Central Government is prepared to meet all the internal costs of the project and is thinking of using Colombo Plan aid for the purchase of dairy machinery and equipment. We might wish to provide some of this as well as provide counterpart funds and, possibly, the services of an expert and facilities for training Indians in Canada in the field of dairy development.⁵²

17. It is also possible that, at a later date, we may be asked to contribute to the Small Industries Programme. I am writing you separately about recent developments.

18. I do not know if the Indian proposals in their present form are formulated in sufficient detail to enable you to reach a decision in principle on the projects put forward for Canadian assistance. Supplementary documentation on the Chambal and Rihand projects is in preparation and will, of course, be made available to us as soon as it is completed. In order to hasten the preparation of material and facilitate its consideration by the Colombo Group you might wish to have a senior Indian official come to Ottawa to present the proposals. This could no doubt be arranged at relatively short notice.⁵³

At the last meeting of the Colombo Group held on July 5, consideration was given to the programme for India for 1954/55. The minutes of this meeting have not yet been completed, but when they are available you will see that prior to the discussion of the Indian programme, the Group gave general consideration to the future scope of our Colombo Plan operations. Whilst the possibility of suggesting ⁵² Note marginale :/Marginal note:

That would be of considerable interest to agriculture. [O.G. Stoner]

⁵³ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Although it is a sizeable task of production, I think one copy of all documentation should go to each member of group. Could these projects then be discussed at next Group meeting. Escott [Reid] and the Indians may be too low in their figure (para 5) of $10 M[illion] for the locomotives. May we discuss? O.G. S[toner] to Ministers an increase in the amount of funds to be made available in the next couple of years was by no means ruled out, it was felt that it would be prudent to proceed in our planning on the assumptions that roughly the same amounts would be available for the present three recipient countries. On these assumptions, we should consider that for 1954/55 approximately $13 million will be available for India, approximately $9 million for Pakistan and approximately $2 million for Ceylon. A memorandum will be sent to our Minister which will enable him to discuss with his colleagues in advance of the Consultative Committee meeting in September the considerations which affect the assumptions on which our Colombo Plan programme is based.⁵⁴

2. On the basis of negotiations with the manufacturers here in Canada, it now appears that about $10.4 million of this year's appropriation for India will be required to complete the procurement programme for the 120 steam locomotives. This would mean that about $2.5 million would remain for allotment in 1954/55.

3. The projects put forward in your letter No. 603 were carefully reviewed by the Group, and the comments and suggestions which you made in that letter were most helpful. For a variety of reasons there was an apparent lack of enthusiasm for Canadian participation in the Chambal project. Mr. Cavell, during his last visit, was not impressed with the development and the management of this scheme. Moreover, it is one in which we would share responsibility with the United States, and it is not clear whether there is a separate or independent portion of the project for which Canada could assume full responsibility. Although we understand that the first phase of the Chambal project is included in the Five Year Plan, could you tell us whether all those aspects of the project in which the Indians envisage Canadian participation are also included in the Five Year Plan? It was also felt that on the basis of past experience, the prices which the Indians had quoted, particular for the generating plant, would be substantially below the corresponding prices in Canada; and this would have the effect of making the Indian request for assistance in 1954/55 to Chambal greatly in excess of the amount of funds which remain for India for this fiscal year. We, of course, have not closed the door on the Chambal project and we are mindful of the priority which the Indians themselves attach to this project. It is necessary that further documentation should be made available on this project before a final decision is taken, but we thought it best to let you know for your own information the lack of enthusiasm which marked the Group's discussion of this project.

4. The provision of small thermal power sets would in many ways be a model Colombo Plan operation. It would have the effect of stimulating local industry and it has a very obvious political appeal. Tangible proof of Canadian assistance and the cooperation of the Central Indian Government would be spread to a wide variety of communities. There are also encouraging signs that Canada might be able to compete reasonably favourably with world prices in the provision of both thermal and diesel power units. This project would introduce a flexible element into the Canadian programme which might be very helpful to us in our planning both for this year and for future years. For these reasons, the Group were inclined to look favourably at the possibility of providing a few "package" units which could perhaps include a standardized power generating unit, a certain amount of pole-line equipment and perhaps certain industrial raw materials that could be used by the Indians to manufacture transmission lines, etc.; we propose to obtain as soon as possible from Canadian manufacturers quotations for this equipment and an indication of the amount of time they would require to supply it. It would be helpful for us if, whilst these aspects are being studied in Canada, you might give consideration to the priority which might be established between various communities to which the Indians referred in their documentation of this project. We would also like to know what arrangements would be made between the central and the various provincial or municipal authorities for the distribution of these units and whether there would be any counterpart funds generated.

5. In the consideration of the Rihand project, there appeared to be many of the same objections which exist for Chambal. In the light of the information in your letter No. 651 of June 21, we are convinced that we should proceed with the greatest caution in this project.

6. The Group was interested in the developments in the small scale industries programme in India, but it was felt that a closer study would have to be made before any decision could be taken about Canadian participation. When the Group has had an opportunity to review thoroughly the report on small industries, there may be merit in asking Dr. Ensminger to visit Ottawa. It is conceivable in the light of his own timetable that it might be possible to have Dr. Ensminger in Ottawa briefly about the time that the meetings of the Consultative Committee will be held.

7. Canadian participation in the Delhi milk project still appears subject to numerous objections, most of which we have expressed to you in earlier despatches. We are apprehensive that a certain number of domestic political difficulties may be inherent in this scheme, and there is some doubt that it is sufficiently closely related to economic development. We appreciate that no formal request has as yet been made for the Delhi milk supply, but in any preliminary discussions you may wish to bear in mind those objections which we foresee. You might at some stage usefully enquire to what extent the Indians consider that this project might be undertaken by private commercial interests.

8. The comments in this letter are of an interim nature, since no decisions have as yet been taken about any of the projects. We are by no means categorically opposed to the Indian suggestion that a two year programme should be considered, but in view of the lack of enthusiasm for Chambal and Rihand, the need for such forward planning may be reduced.

9. When you have had an opportunity to consider both the points raised in this despatch and the minutes of the last Colombo Group meeting, you may wish to comment on the trend which is developing in our consideration of the future programme for India. It may be useful at some stage for a senior Indian official to visit Ottawa to present proposals. However, at this moment such a visit would probably be premature, since we require more information and study before we are in a position to evaluate the new proposals accurately.

*High Commissioner in India

New Delhi, July 17, 1954

Dear Mr. Deshmukh,

During the remaining two years of the first Five-Year Plan, Canadian aid already authorized to India in the form of industrial raw materials and steam locomotives is expected to generate more than $17 million worth of rupee counterpart funds. The Umtru project will absorb a little over $2 million of this, leaving a balance of about $15 million for allocation to other development projects in India.

Your officials have recently proposed that our available counterpart funds be used for certain medium-sized irrigation projects. The projects proposed for Canadian aid were Bhadra in Mysore, Matatila in Uttar Pradesh, Musi in Hyderabad, Vaigai in Madras and Ghod in Bombay. Two of these projects, Bhadra and Matatila, are already under construction but I assume that any aid from Canadian counterpart funds could be directed to those phases of the projects on which expenditures have not yet been incurred. The aggregate cost of the five projects is about $57 million.

I understand that all five projects are located in areas affected by chronic scarcity, that they are intended to produce more food and to create more employment, and that the Government of India has specifically expanded the Five-Year Plan to include them and proposes to proceed with their construction on a priority basis. On the other hand the estimates which we have been given by your officials indicate that the annual value of these projects is proportionately well below the estimate which you have given us for the Mayurakshi project in West Bengal. Your estimate was that this would yield annually food of a value equivalent to half the capital outlay. Our publicity in Canada about the Mayurakshi project, to which in all about $20 million of Canadian aid has so far gone, has laid great emphasis on this estimate. We have pointed out that every two dollars of Canadian money put into Mayurakshi will every year produce one dollar's worth of foodstuffs for the Indian people.

This does not mean that it would not now be possible for us to convince Canadians who have an interest in India's economic problems of the economic importance to India of the five medium-sized irrigation projects which your officials have put up to us. The task, however, would, I think, be more difficult for these projects than for other high priority projects in India to which Canadian counterpart funds might be devoted. It is not only that we have emphasized in our publicity on Mayurakshi the size of the return on the investment, but that Canadians who are interested in the problem may also have been impressed by the view of some writers on the subject that smaller irrigation projects as a general rule should yield a greater return than larger ones such as Mayurakshi.

I do not rule out the possibility that the Canadian authorities may agree that some or all of the available counterpart funds should be devoted to medium-sized irrigation projects but because of the considerations set forth above I hope that it may be possible for your Ministry to submit to us for consideration a number of other projects to which Canadian counterpart funds could be devoted so that the Canadian authorities may have a wider choice.

In giving thought to this question you will, I know, wish to keep in mind certain broad political considerations as well as the more obvious economic considerations affecting counterpart fund aid.

What I mean by broad political considerations is that among projects of equal economic importance some are more likely than others to appeal to the imagination of the Canadian and Indian people. Some are more apt than others to increase public support in Canada for the Colombo Plan. Some are more helpful than others in achieving the desire of your Government that the people of India realize that through the Colombo Plan they are brought "into cooperative effort" with the other Colombo Plan countries. Basically, I think, it is the concept of Indian-Canadian partnership which it should be our aim to foster. This means, I suggest, that as a general rule a project should have an identifiable and substantial Canadian content and an identifiable and substantial Indian content so that it may become known as an Indian-Canadian project.

The purely economic considerations have been set forth many times in discussions between our two Governments. They apply, broadly speaking, in equal measure to direct Canadian aid in the form of equipment and commodities and to indirect Canadian aid from counterpart funds. Briefly, they are that Canadian aid should be devoted to projects within the Five-Year Plan to which the Indian Government attaches a very high economic priority. These projects should be calculated to increase the production of goods and services in India and, by extension, to stimulate the development of the Indian economy as a whole. The Indian authorities should be convinced that there is a every reasonable assurance that the projects will be carried out speedily and efficiently and that they will result in enduring monuments to Indian-Canadian cooperation and friendship.

These general economic considerations apply, I think, to every development project in which Canada participates directly or indirectly in India. To these must be added, in the case of counterpart fund aid, the overriding consideration that counterpart funds add to the rupee resources at the disposal of the Government of India and, as such, help to ensure that the economic development programme can move forward without imposing undue strains on the Indian economy as a whole.

In addition to the broader political and economic considerations on which it is desirable that Canadian aid from counterpart funds should be based, there is a question of accounting to which the Canadian authorities attach great practical importance. For each project to which Canadian counterpart funds are allocated the Canadian authorities require audited statements of disbursements which will be satisfactory to the Canadian Auditor-General. These statements complement similar audited statements of counterpart fund credits which arise from Canadian aid in the form of commodities or equipment.

I do not wish, by making suggestions on the kind of projects that might be most sympathetically received in Ottawa, to appear to desire to limit in any way your freedom of choice. I know, however, that apart from the construction of medium-sized irrigation projects the Canadian authorities concerned have in the past expressed an interest in the use of Canadian counterpart funds on the development of small-scale industries, on the establishment and improvement of Indian technical and other training institutions, particularly for medium and low-grade technicians, and on the expansion of the fishing industry and fishermen's cooperatives.

In the past Canadian counterpart funds have been used entirely on one project, the Mayurakshi Project. Into this project about $17 million of Canadian counterpart funds have gone. There are obvious administrative advantages in putting all the money available into one high priority project. But it may be that the political considerations which I have attempted to set forth above might make it desirable to use the counterpart funds which will become available during the next two years either on up to half a dozen projects in various parts of India or on some such broad programme as that proposed for the development of small industries from which benefits would accrue to various localities and regions of India.

If there were in many parts of India schemes which Canada had helped to finance, it might be easier for the Canadian people to come to feel that they were playing a part in your great nation-wide enterprise of increasing production in India and so raising the standard of living of the Indian people. It would also have the advantage that people in many parts of India would be able to see with their own eyes evidence of the goodwill of the people of Canada to the people of India and of the extent to which the people of Canada are prepared to convert this goodwill into concrete and practical efforts to help the Indian people to attain their objectives of economic development.⁵⁵

Yours sincerely,

COLOMBO PLAN AID PROGRAMME FOR 1954-55⁵⁶

It would, I think, be unrealistic to expect that, as the Indian Five Year Plan moves into its penultimate year of operation, the choice of projects which meet all the conditions of eligibility for aid from abroad remains unlimited. Even as early as the spring of 1953 we found it difficult to evolve a programme which would absorb the funds available to India under our Colombo Plan appropriation. Since that time the pace of investment in the economic development programme has been measurably accelerated and I doubt if there are, in fact, many projects which are included in the current Five Year Plan and on which a start remains yet to be made.

2. In transmitting to you the proposals made by the Indian Government I did so under the impression that the projects proposed for Canadian aid were, by and large, sound and that we could participate in them to good advantage. They are projects which are immediately productive and which belong to that broad range of development schemes which has been described in the July 10 issue of The Economist as the "economic infra-structure . . . on which the safeguarding of existing living standards for a growing population must depend". In the circumstances I was sorry to learn that, with the single exception of the small town and rural electrification schemes, the Indian proposals met with only modest enthusiasm on the part of the Colombo group.

3. As far as the Chambal and Rihand projects are concerned, the Indian authorities are now in a position to provide us with the basic background documentation which will enable you to assess the technical and administrative soundness of these projects. At the same time, I am asking the Indian authorities to reply in detail to the specific points on which the Colombo Group has requested further clarification. It is my understanding that Canadian participation in either project is envisaged by the Indians on the basis of responsibility for an entirely separate and distinct (and as such identifiably Canadian) phase of the project. As I pointed out in my previous despatch on this subject I share your anxiety that we avoid as far as possible any overlapping of Canadian and American spheres of responsibility for the planning and construction of the Chambal and Rihand projects.

⁵⁶ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Mr Jay: I would appreciate your views on [my] observations at end of letter. P. B[ridle]

4. You will be glad to know that the Government of New Zealand is interested in contributing to the Delhi Milk Supply Project. This has been confirmed to us by the Ministry of Finance and by Messrs. McGregor and Webster, the two New Zealand officials who attended the recent policy session of the Council for Technical Co-operation at Colombo. In fact, we have been given to understand that because the scope for New Zealand aid to India was limited, the Ministry of Finance has for some time held the Delhi milk project in reserve for possible New Zealand sponsorship.

5. When Messrs. McGregor and Webster called on us, they agreed with us on the urgency of expanding the production of milk in a country where the national diet was so preponderantly composed of cereals. They were aware that a project of this nature was unlikely to be tackled by private commercial enterprise. It involves a substantial subsidy in the initial period of operation if milk is to be sold at prices which the consumer can afford. It also involves, of course, an element of control over the movement of cattle from urban areas which is unlikely to be available to a private producer. There are, therefore, social and economic aspects to a milk supply project in a country like India which make it more suitable for public than private management and operation. Mr. Sinclair, the Minister of Fisheries, who visited the Bombay Milk Supply project, would, I think, agree with this.

6. In view of the reluctance of the Ministry of Finance to request Canadian aid for the Delhi milk project and in view of your own reservations, we told Messrs. McGregor and Webster that, so far as we knew, the Canadian authorities would not wish to stand in the way of New Zealand participation in this project. We said that you were, no doubt, aware of the special contribution which New Zealand was likely to be in a position to make in this field and that, in any case, proposals had now been made to us by the Indian Government for a programme which would more than absorb the funds expected to be available for India in the two-year period 1954-56. To facilitate the task of the New Zealand team we showed them some of the more important documents which we have on our records concerning the Delhi milk project.

7. There is one further point which I should like to raise at this interim stage. You have indicated that, in principle, you would have no objection to the formulation of a two-year programme provided such a programme comprises an acceptable set of projects. At the same time, you have suggested that the Indian proposals as they now stand involve an expenditure of Colombo Plan funds which, in the most favourable contingencies conceivable, is unlikely to be available for expenditure in India. It is my impression that, if only for reasons of finance, we shall sooner or later have to drop the Rihand project whether or not the Americans decide to participate in it. I would recommend, therefore, that we give first consideration to the Chambal and rural electrification projects, leaving the Rihand project aside until we have a clearer indication of the cost of the balance of the programme and the probable size of the allocation to India. I suggest that we proceed on the same basis in our subsequent negotiations with the Indians.⁵⁷

COLOMBO PLAN: USE OF COUNTERPART FUNDS

We have now had a further opportunity of discussing with Mr. C.V. Narasimhan of the Ministry of Finance the type of projects which it may be useful for the Indian authorities to propose for assistance from Canadian counterpart funds.

2. It appears that the Nandikonda project, an immense irrigation project which is intended to benefit Andhra State and contiguous regions of Hyderabad, will require considerably more planning before it can be recommended for Canadian participation. The fact is that Nandikonda is only one of several possible projects on the Krishna River and the determination of a site is likely to require some delicacy in reconciling conflicting regional interests and pressures. No final decision on the site is expected for at least six months and we felt that, in the circumstances, there was little purpose in having the project submitted to us at this stage. Its implementation is, in any case, bound to fall largely outside the period of the current Five Year Plan.

3. As for the Kandla Port Trust Development, we pointed out again that, attractive as the project was from the point of view of Indo-Canadian co-operation, the question posed itself whether the project would continue to be justified on economic grounds if political relations between India and Pakistan were restored to normal. The Five Year Plan had stated that "There is need for rectifying the consequences of Partition and providing a natural outlet for traffic previously catered for by Karachi. It is mainly for this reason that the development of Kandla as a major port was recommended by the West Coast Major Port Development Committee".

⁵⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

The first paragraph of this despatch takes a line which perhaps needs to be carefully assessed in relation to previous reports from New Delhi so that its significance can be accurately reflected in the paper being prepared for the Colombo meeting on the question of increased Colombo Plan aid. P. B[riddle]

Noted for discussion at group meeting [O.G. Stoner]

Supposing, however, that in the course of time political and other differences between India and Pakistan subsided and a customs union between the two countries were set up. Would the Kandla port development still be an economic proposition or could, in that case, the needs of Northern and Northwestern India be adequately met by Karachi?

4. Mr. Narasimhan thought that the need for Kandla could be demonstrated even in the context of a customs union between India and Pakistan. Plans for the Kandla port development antedated Partition although it was true to say that Partition had accelerated the construction of the new port. But there was congestion in the west-coast ports of the Indian sub-continent and it was clear that the economic development of Rajasthan, in particular, would generate increasing pressure on existing port facilities. In any case, it was agreed that the Kandla project would be included in the Indian proposals for Canadian counterpart fund aid and that you would consider the suitability of this project in the light of all the available information.

5. The possibility of our being prepared to assist in the establishment of four regional institutes of technology to promote the development of small-scale industries in India was reiterated briefly in our conversation with Mr. Narasimhan. He undertook to draw up a brief note on this project in consultation with the Ministry of Commerce and Industry under whose aegis the small industries programme will be operated. It is our understanding that plans for the construction of the regional institutes are still very much in the embryonic stage. On the other hand, our counterpart funds will accumulate over a period of about two years and there is, therefore, no a priori reason why our planning of a programme of assistance from counterpart funds should not be projected forward over a similar period.

6. We suggested to Mr. Narasimhan that Canadian participation in the environmental sanitation programme was likely to meet most of the considerations set out in the High Commissioner's letter of July 17 to Mr. Deshmukh. The programme is being undertaken by the Government of India in conjunction with the United States Technical Co-operation Mission, which will supply equipment, and WHO, which will supply some of the required personnel. The rupee cost of the programme over a two-year period is estimated at roughly $24 million, of which one half represents the cost of the rural phase of the programme and the other half the cost of the urban phase. The purpose of the environmental sanitation programme is primarily to provide a safe water supply in villages and towns all over India. As a major contribution to public health in this country I imagine that the programme would have a considerable appeal to public opinion in Canada.

7. Since the New Zealand Government has now indicated that it is prepared to sponsor the Delhi milk supply project, we agreed that there was no purpose in retaining it on the list of Indian proposals for aid from our rupee counterpart funds. The project is likely to be implemented in three stages at a total cost of about $1.6 million. I assume that the New Zealanders will, as in the past, make an equivalent amount in pounds sterling available to the Indian Government to cover both local costs and the cost of equipment from abroad.

8. In so far as the fisheries project was concerned we again made it clear to Mr. Narasimhan that it was, of course, not our intention to initiate proposals. The reason why we had mentioned the possible advantage of including a project in this field in our counterpart fund aid programme was that such projects had, in fact, been submitted to us on a previous occasion but had not been followed up. We were thinking, in particular, of the inland fisheries project in Orissa where it was at one time thought that Canada could make a worthwhile contribution, including some equipment and possibly the services of an expert or experts to help in the operation of fishermen's co-operatives. Mr. Narasimhan recalled our interest in this project and undertook to investigate whether there continued to be scope for Canadian participation in it. As you know, the United States Technical Co-operation Mission has contributed extensively to both deep-sea and inland fisheries projects in India during the past year.

9. The stage has now been set for Mr. Deshmukh to propose formally that we assist one or more of the projects which we have agreed may be suitable for Canadian aid from counterpart funds. Mr. Deshmukh's proposals will be accompanied by a brief description of each project put forward for our consideration. On the basis of your preliminary preferences it will then, I presume, be in order for the Indians to go ahead with the formulation of detailed project statements.

CONFIDENTIAL

COLOMBO PLAN — CONVERSATIONS WITH THE INDIAN DELEGATION TO THE CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE MEETING

During the recent Consultative Committee meeting, officials in Ottawa had many opportunities to discuss with the Indian Delegation questions of special interest to Canada. We have already written to you with respect to the Umtru project. The purpose of this despatch is to summarize briefly other discussions that we had with the Indians about Canadian-assisted projects. I am also attaching to this despatch a copy of a letter sent to this Department by Mr. Cavell which reports on his meetings with Indian officials.

2. The Indian Delegation was (at least comparatively) a very strong one. Among the officials Mr. Narasimhan and Mr. Narain were, of course, quite familiar with projects which Canada was assisting or which had been proposed for Canadian assistance. The only exception to this was the biological control station project, which none of the Indian Delegation appeared willing or prepared to discuss.

3. There was some discussion about counterpart funds, and the Indians spoke about the allocation of the counterpart funds that remain as a result of the aluminum and copper supplied. You will see from Mr. Cavell's letter that they suggested several projects for these funds, most of which are known to you. We understand that Mr. Deshmukh on his return will make formal proposals to you about the allocation of the remaining counterpart funds, bearing in mind the points which emerged in the very useful exchange of letters between you and Mr. Deshmukh concerning the principles that should govern the use of counterpart funds.

4. The Indians were given the impression by Ottawa officials that the remainder of the 1954-55 programme might include the provision of small generating plants for Indian communities. The Colombo Group will probably recommend that funds be made available for this project in 1954-55; and it may well be that this is a project that could be usefully carried further in 1955-56.

5. In our discussions we were mindful of the observations which you have made from time to time about the Chambal project, and the Indians were given the impression that the possibility of Canada assisting in this project should not be excluded, particularly if there is a separate portion of the project which might be clearly regarded as suitable for a Canadian contribution. On the other hand, the Indian Delegation were informed that the likelihood of Canada assisting the Rihand project was very slight.

6. The Indian Delegation enquired about the possibility of securing additional quantities of commodities, presumably aluminum and copper. Although they were informed that a limited amount of commodity assistance might be available, they did not press this request. They may renew it again, however, with you on their return to New Delhi, when we could consider it more formally.

Ottawa, September 30, 1954

My dear Ed [Ritchie]:

We had a meeting with the Indians yesterday and the following points emerged.

1. Umtru

There are now virtually no outstanding points on Umtru so far as we and the Indians are concerned. Our Consulting Engineers are sending a man to Ottawa for further talks which will take place before the Indians leave, and subject to their Minister raising some point, which he is not expected to do, there is nothing more to be discussed on Umtru unless you have some points in your mind.

2. Counterpart Funds

The Indians think there are some two million dollars not allocated, and they suggest that we agree to these funds being applied to (1) a new port at Kandla; (2) technological institutes for cottage industries; (3) national sanitation; and (4) inland fisheries.

In our discussions we narrowed these suggestions down to (2) and (4) above, and personally I would be quite prepared to see all counterpart funds go into technological institutes, but I think first preference should be given to the needs of Umtru and any other such project into which we might enter in the future. For instance, if we set up a project for small power plants, each one will require a building and maybe some distribution lines, transformers, etc. Lines and transformers are made in India, and from our point of view it would be much better to apply counterpart funds in completing that part of the project which would not come from Canada.

In general, on the counterpart funds, as you know, we have already agreed with India that the lowest price at which they could have obtained equipment anywhere in the world shall be the basis for the setting aside of these funds, but even this general agreement leaves us with some problems. Should we take the lowest price to be any tender they received on any given item of equipment, or how should we arrive at a figure? Such things as escalation clauses, etc. could easily enter into final calculations, and my suggestion would be that on each project we gather as many facts as we can and then arbitrarily fix upon an amount in rupees which shall from then on be the counterpart funds generated by any given project. Such an arrangement now would prevent all kinds of arguments in years to come when we shall not be as familiar with details as we are now, when all kinds of new people will be dealing with this matter and other difficulties might have arisen.

So far as the Auditor General is concerned, whilst I am not very familiar with his activities, I would think that his only legitimate concern, if any at all, is the accounting for such funds and not fixing the amounts of them. That it seems to me is our business in the Policy Committee.

3. Chambal

It is more and more obvious that any contribution we make to Chambal will have to be integrated with contributions from other aid agencies. We have learnt by painful experience the headaches that this causes, and with this the Indians here entirely agree. My personal and very strong inclination is to keep out of such entanglements if possible, and that means leaving both Chambal and Rihand alone. Both are huge projects and our contribution would be relatively small and completely lost compared to that of F.O.A. or the Bank. Thus Canada would get no credit, but that does not concern me nearly as much as the very great difficulty of fitting our contributions into that aid put up by much larger and more powerful agencies.

4. Biological Control Stations

We discussed this matter but the Indians have no details with them and it looks as if we must continue to work it out bilaterally by correspondence.

5. Mayurakshi

India is pressing us to accelerate our delivery on certain parts of the electrical equipment. We have done our best on this and it looks as if it simply cannot be done, and we so informed the Indians at the meeting. Of course we are still trying.

6. Technical Assistance

Mr. Narasimhan stated that from what little he had seen he was much impressed with Canada as a training ground and that upon his return he would advocate a change in their attitude towards training here.

7. Small Generating Plant Project

It was explained to the Indians that this was a project which appealed to us which we could do very readily, and they have agreed to get us more information concerning the overall plant required.

8. Commodities for Next Year's Programme

The Indians are anxious to continue the commodities programme into the next financial year, and we should consider this before they leave and if necessary discuss it with their Minister.

Yours sincerely,
NIK [CAVELL]

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 108-54

[Ottawa], April 28, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

COLOMBO PLAN — PROGRAMME FOR PAKISTAN 1953/54, 1954/55

During the financial year 1953/54, Cabinet approved assistance for the following projects in Pakistan in the amounts indicated:

(a) August 10—extension of aerial resources survey—$1 million⁵⁸

(b) September 9—additional funds for Warsak Project—$3.5 million⁵⁹

In addition, in May last, Cabinet agreed to the temporary financing from Colombo Plan funds of a second $5 million emergency gift of wheat to Pakistan to avert famine.⁶⁰ Following on approval by Parliament of the Final Supplementary Estimates, this amount has been reimbursed to the Colombo Plan fund.

The Government of Pakistan is now anxious to be informed of the decisions of the Canadian Government on the other projects which were formally put forward for Colombo Plan aid from Canada in 1953/54. The assistance requested was as follows:

(a) Provision of a thermal power plant for the Ganges-Kobadak Irrigation Scheme in East Pakistan.

(b) Provision of three or four small canal falls hydro-electric units for the Punjab Tubewell Drainage and Irrigation Programme.

(c) Provision of a 153-mile electrical transmission link between Dacca and the port of Chittagong in East Pakistan.

The possibility of Canadian aid for the Ganges-Kobadak Project and for the Punjab Canal Falls power development was raised in my memorandum to Cabinet of August 4, 1953, when it was recommended, and Cabinet agreed, that a Canadian engineer familiar with the construction of thermal power plants be sent to Pakistan to report on the feasibility of the Ganges-Kobadak scheme so far as the power component was concerned, and to draw up specifications for a suitable thermal unit; in addition it was decided that an engineer should investigate the proposed Punjab canal hydro-electric power units. In the meantime no decision was taken on the provision of the aid for these two projects.

A full engineering report on the proposed thermal power unit for the Ganges-Kobadak scheme has now been received from Mr. R. Hanright, Canadian consulting engineer, who has also submitted a report on the requested electrical transmission link between Dacca and Chittagong. The H.G. Acres Company has submitted a preliminary report on the Punjab Canal Falls hydro-electric schemes.

In the light of the engineering reports which have been received, further interdepartmental consideration has now been given to the question of providing the requested assistance to Pakistan for the three above schemes. These projects and the considerations affecting them as agreed upon on an interdepartmental basis at the official level are outlined in the Annex to this submission.

In addition, and in order to round out the 1954/55 programme of assistance for Pakistan, the officials concerned have considered the possible allocation of a further $2 million for the provision of equipment for the Warsak hydro-electric project. This project and previous Cabinet decisions with respect to Canadian aid thereto are also described in the Annex.

⁶⁰ Voir/See Volume 19, Document 634.

The total of assistance which it is suggested might now be allocated for Pakistan is as follows:

Ganges-Kobadak	- $1.8 million
Power for Punjab Irrigation and Drainage Scheme	- $5.0 million (in principle)
Dacca-Chittagong Link	- $4.0 million
Warsak	- $2.0 million
TOTAL	$12.8 million

Of the above total sum, $5 million might be regarded as completing the 1953/54 programme for Pakistan, since the 1953/54 allocations to date total only $4.5 million compared with $10 million in 1951/52 and about $9 million in 1952/53. On this basis, and if Cabinet were agreeable to the provision of aid as suggested, the programmes for the two years would be as follows:

1953/54		1954/55
Extension of aerial resources survey	- * $1.0 million	Ganges-Kobadak)
		Punjab Power)	-say, $5.8 million
Further allocation for Warsak	- * $3.5 million	Dacca-Chittagong Link)
Ganges-Kobadak)		Warsak)	- $2.0 million
Punjab Power)	-say, $5.0 million
Dacca-Chittagong Link)
Total	- $9.5 million	Total	- $7.8 million

* already approved

It is suggested that it would not be prudent to envisage aid to Pakistan in the current fiscal year in excess of the amount of $7.8 million indicated above until anticipated demands on 1954/55 appropriations to provide continuing aid for India and Ceylon are clearer, and it also becomes clear whether it will be desirable to provide any assistance to Indonesia and other Colombo Plan countries which have not so far received any Canadian capital aid.

Recommendation

I recommend that additional assistance to Pakistan under the Colombo Plan be provided as follows and be financed from the balance of funds appropriated for Colombo Plan purposes in earlier years and as necessary from the further Colombo Plan appropriation which Parliament is being asked to approve for 1954/55.

(i) Ganges-Kobadak Scheme

It is recommended that Canada provide (a) a suitable thermal power plant for the Ganges-Kobadak scheme; and (b) the services of Canadian engineers to assist the Pakistan engineering authorities in the erection and installation of the equipment to be supplied from Canada. Estimated cost — $1.8 million.

The above assistance to be provided on receipt of prior assurances from the Government of Pakistan that the appropriate Pakistan authorities accept responsibility for:

- (a) all costs not covered by external assistance;
- (b) ocean freight and insurance on the Canadian equipment to be supplied;

(c) the establishment of a rupee counterpart fund in respect of the equipment to be provided from Canada, in an amount to be agreed between the two Governments;

(d) the foundation work, building, and all other civil work connected with the thermal power station, together with supervisory engineering services foremen and the necessary labour.

(ii) Punjab Canal Falls Hydro-electric Projects

Because of the technical uncertainties and the possibly important political implications of these projects in connection with the canal waters dispute between India and Pakistan (outlined on pages 4 and 5 of the Annex), it is recommended that final decisions on assistance for this project be deferred, but that the Government of Pakistan be informed

(a) of the willingness in principle of the Canadian Government to provide electric generating equipment and necessary engineering services and possibly certain transmission lines in the Punjab for the tubewell irrigation and drainage scheme to an amount of the order of $5 million;

(b) that the final decision on whether such aid will be supplied and on the precise form in which any power might be provided would depend on the further investigation of the Canal Falls sites at Shadiwal, Chichoki-Mallian and Gujranwala by Canadian hydro-electric engineers, and the possibility of providing power more efficiently and reliably by other means;

(c) that in view of the urgency which the Government of Pakistan attaches to assistance for this project, the above engineers will arrive in Pakistan in three to four weeks and will be instructed to submit a technical report on which firm decisions can be based on the three proposed hydro-electric developments or alternative sources of power at the earliest possible moment.

(iii) Dacca-Chittagong Link

It is recommended that Canada provide the electrical equipment and material required for the Dacca-Chittagong link in accordance with the recommendation of the Canadian consulting engineers, together with engineering services, to include all engineering, supervision of designs and drawings, supervision of installation, and assistance to the Pakistan engineering authorities in the preparation of foundation and installation specifications. Estimated cost — $4 million

The above assistance to be provided on receipt of prior assurances that the Pakistan authorities will

(a) supply all the material for foundations and housings;

(b) prepare all roads and rights-of-way for the transmission link;

(c) provide all necessary labour and meet all local costs;

(d) set aside a rupee counterpart fund in respect of the aid to be provided from Canada in an amount to be agreed between the two Governments;

(e) assume responsibility for ocean freight and insurance for the equipment to be provided from Canada and local transportation in Pakistan of such equipment to the site of erection.

Any Canadian assistance for the Dacca-Chittagong link should be closely coordinated, in consultation with the Pakistan authorities concerned, with the results of the power survey being conducted by the United States in connection with the Karnafuli project.

(iv) Warsak Hydro-electric Project

It is recommended that a further allocation of $2 million be made for the Warsak project against the estimated cost of the hydraulic, electrical and related equipment required for this scheme.

Should Cabinet approve the above recommendations every effort will be made to ensure that adequate arrangements are made by the Pakistan authorities for the efficient execution of the schemes, for the coordination of the activities of the agencies and authorities concerned, and for the effective administration of each project on completion.⁶¹

GANGES-KOBADAK IRRIGATION SCHEME

This is a project to increase agricultural production in the Ganges delta area of East Pakistan. It is planned that some 2 million acres will eventually be covered by the scheme and it is estimated that the increased water supply during the dry season and improved drainage during the monsoon will, through higher yields and double cropping, permit the production of an additional 975,000 metric tons of foodstuffs annually. In its first phase, the project will cover approximately 250,000 acres, of which 175,000 will be irrigated. For this initial phase, the annual increase in food production is estimated at 130,000 tons. The Ganges-Kobadak Irrigation Project has been investigated and developed in detail by a specialist F.A.O. team under the leadership of Dr. van Blommestein. A soil survey and land use survey have been carried out. The F.A.O. recommendations for the first phase of the development are reflected in the pro forma for the scheme which has been formally approved by the Government of Pakistan. The basis of the project is the pumping of water from the Ganges River into a network of irrigation canals. Periodic flooding during the monsoon will be controlled by enlarging and clearing old river channels which have become silted and by artificial drainage. The project involves three main components; a power station, a pumping station, and the irrigation and drainage channels.

Canada has been formally asked to assist the Ganges-Kobadak Project by the provision of the coal burning thermal power station to be composed of two 5,000 kilowatt units. The F.A.O. team has expressed the hope that any plant provided by Canada should be designed to burn either coal or wood, since the burning of local woods would probably be more economical than the use of imported coal. The amount of power which could be provided by a station of the kind requested would be somewhat in excess of the immediate power needs for the initial phase of the scheme, but all the power will be required during the next phase of expansion, and there is a demand for industrial power in the area.

An agreement has been negotiated between the United States and the Government of Pakistan for the provision by the United States of the pumping equipment required for the scheme and other assistance in an amount of $1,950,000. It is understood this agreement will shortly be signed, but that it will not be brought into operation until the United States authorities are assured that power will be provided. United States assistance for Ganges-Kobadak Project is thus linked with the provision of a thermal power station by Canada.

In accordance with the decision of Cabinet of August 5, 1953, the Ganges-Kobadak scheme, particularly its power component, has been examined by a Canadian consulting engineer, Mr. R. Hanright, who has reported favourably on the provision of a plant of the size and character requested. An option at an attractive price on a suitable thermal plant owned by the Ontario Hydro-Electrical Commission has been obtained. The High Commissioner in Karachi has recently advised that financial provision for its share in the implementation of the project has been made by the Government of East Bengal. At present a thermal power plant composed of two 5,000 kilowatt units is contemplated. The question of the most suitable type of fuel to be used remains under discussion. The possibility of providing boilers adapted to burn either coal or wood is under investigation. If that is not technically feasible, agreement will be reached with the Pakistan authorities on the choice to be made between the use of coal or of wood as seems most appropriate after further consultation. In the circumstances, it would appear timely to decide what Canadian assistance might be provided for this project in response to the request by the Government of Pakistan.

PUNJAB CANAL FALLS HYDRO-ELECTRIC PROJECTS

The Punjab is the most important agricultural area of West Pakistan. Farming in this area depends on irrigation waters drawn from the rivers of the Indus system. A serious problem exists in the Punjab as a result of the seepage of waters from the irrigation canals over the years. The water table has risen in certain localities, and land is going out of cultivation through waterlogging and the related increased salinity of the soil. The Pakistan authorities have estimated that as a result of these conditions 2 million areas of agricultural land have already become unfit for farming, and about 40,000 acres are going out of cultivation each year.

To rectify this situation, the Pakistan authorities, in cooperation with the F.A.O., have drawn up a tubewell drainage and irrigation project. The proposal is to sink tubewells in the waterlogged areas in order to lower the water table. The pumped water would (a) be carried to water-short areas through the existing irrigation system and (b) be used to wash out saline land in order to restore it to cultivation.

The first tubewell project in the Punjab was started in 1945 and under this scheme 1,350 tubewells were sunk. It proved impossible fully to carry out the planned programme, because after partition the power generated at the Rasul Hydro-electric Station, which was originally intended to energize the wells, had to be diverted for urgent industrial purposes. Power is now required to run these wells and some 2,000 additional wells which the Government of Pakistan is proposing to sink following on further studies with respect to their siting and the completion of a ground water survey for which an agreement has been negotiated with the United States authorities. A pilot scale tubewell project is now in operation in the area under the technical direction of F.A.O. officials.

The Government of Australia has undertaken to assist the Punjab tubewell project and has agreed to provide £2 million worth of equipment, mainly pump motors, tubewell casings and drilling equipment.

The successful implementation of the Punjab drainage and irrigation scheme depends on the provision of power for the pumps. In this connection, the Government of Pakistan has requested Canada to provide three hydro-electric units which would rely for the generation of power on existing canal falls. According to the plan, each of the units would be of 12,000 kilowatts. Two of the units would be situated on the Upper Chenab Canal and two on the Upper Jhelum Canal.

In accordance with the decision of Cabinet of August 5, 1953, a preliminary investigation of the proposed canal falls hydro-electric sites has been undertaken by an engineer of the H.G. Acres Company. The Company has reported that the canal projects would have several advantages and that the cost of energy from them would compare favourably with that from alternative sources. However, it has been suggested that no commitment be made to provide these power stations until:

(a) it is known that the availability of flow from the drainage area to the canal head works is positively assured as to quantity and continuity;

(b) the foundation conditions are fully known and proved satisfactory by sub-surface exploration, sampling and testing;

(c) the sites are inspected by an expert hydro-electric engineer who may assess all conditions and data.

The H.G. Acres Company has estimated that the cost of providing the hydro-electric transmission and switching equipment required for the three power developments would be of the order of $5 million.

The reference in the H.G. Acres report to the availability of water flow from the drainage area to the canal head works relates in part to the possibility of Indian diversion of the rivers on which the two canals in question depend for their water. The information which has been received from the High Commissioner's Office in Karachi indicates that there is little or no possibility of Indian diversion of the Jhelum, but that some Indian diversion of Chenab waters, although difficult and expensive, would be technically feasible. Such diversion would, of course, have major political repercussions and presumably would only be undertaken by India if it was prepared to take the serious risks involved. The whole question of the division of the border waters between India and Pakistan is now under consideration in the World Bank, but the Bank's recommendations have not yet been made public. However, it would seem unlikely that any recommendations which the Bank might make would involve any substantial reduction in the flow of the Chenab through Pakistan.

So far as the foundation conditions at the three proposed canal falls sites are concerned, certain investigations are being undertaken for the Pakistan Government by Swiss-borings Limited. The results of this company's investigations are not yet known.

There is a possibility that the provision of hydro-electric plants on the Punjab canals by Canada may be regarded by the Government of India as prejudicial to the canal waters dispute between the two countries. For example, the Indians might consider that the erection of such hydro-electric plants would have the effect of strengthening the Pakistan claim to the disputed waters. Since the three sites for which it is suggested aid should be considered are in Pakistan territory and the flow of water to them appears to be relatively secure, short of Indian diversion of the Chenab (with the political results which such diversion would involve), it would seem that any Indian protest about the provision to Pakistan of the aid requested for power development in the Punjab would be unwarranted. The Governments of Australia and the United States are apparently willing to provide assistance for the Punjab tubewell scheme, and Canadian refusal to participate therein on political grounds would adversely affect the relations between Canada and Pakistan, more particularly as the project is clearly of great importance to the improvement of agriculture in the Punjab and the Government of Pakistan attaches the highest importance to it.

In all the circumstances, it would seem desirable to defer at this stage any final decision on the actual provision of hydro-electric units for the proposed canal falls sites. At the same time, it is suggested that the Government of Pakistan should be given an assurance that in principle Canada would be prepared to provide power for the tubewell scheme, but to leave open for the time being and until further investigations have been carried out, the final decision on whether such aid would be supplied and, if so, in what form. In this connection, account should be taken to the extent possible of the power survey of West Pakistan which is to be undertaken by the Pakistan authorities at the suggestion of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

DACCA-CHITTAGONG LINK

As part of the electrical development of East Pakistan, it is proposed to construct a transmission line between the diesel plant now under construction near Dacca and the port of Chittagong, where there is an urgent demand for power. This line will form part of a future grid system for which the major source of power will be the hydro-electric station which is being developed on the Karnafuli River some 40 miles from Chittagong. When the Karnafuli development is completed, the power will flow over the Dacca-Chittagong link in the reverse direction.

Canada is being asked to supply the transmission line from Dacca to Chittagong, a distance of approximately 153 miles. The project has been inspected by Mr. R. Hanright, Canadian consulting engineer, who has estimated that the cost of engineering the transmission line and providing the imported materials would be of the order of $3.7 million.

At the instigation of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, a power survey of East Pakistan is to be undertaken as part of the engineering examination of the Karnafuli hydro-electric development which is being financed by the United States. The IBRD representative in Pakistan has indicated that there would be no need for the Canadian Government to hold up its decision on the Dacca-Chittagong link until the power survey has been completed. He has suggested, however, that Canadian assistance for the project should be fully coordinated with the results of the power survey.

In view of the importance of providing electric power to the Chittagong area, of the favourable report on this project by Mr. Hanright, and the important part which the requested transmission line will play in the Karnafuli grid, it is considered that the Dacca-Chittagong link would be a suitable project for Canadian assistance.

WARSAK HYDRO-ELECTRIC PROJECT

The Warsak project is located on the Kabul River in North-west Pakistan. The plant is being designed to produce 150,000 kilowatts of electric energy, which will be used in the North-west Frontier Province and in the neighbouring power-short Province of Punjab. The Warsak scheme will also contribute to increased food production through the irrigation of 93,000 acres of land. The project is expected to take seven years to complete. It was examined by Canadian engineers and found to be a sound practical scheme which could be undertaken in the confidence that it would produce electric power efficiently and economically.

Cabinet considered Canadian participation in the Warsak project on March 26, 1953 and agreed that $3.4 million should be allocated from the 1952/53 Colombo Plan Vote for the provision of part of the necessary generating and related electrical equipment. Cabinet was at that time informed that the equipment requirements from outside Pakistan would amount to approximately $14 million. In this regard, Cabinet agreed that the Government of Pakistan should be informed that additional allotments would be made for Warsak in subsequent years within the limits of the amounts available to Pakistan out of funds which might be appropriated by Parliament for Colombo Plan activities.

On September 9, 1953, a further allotment of $3.5 million was made for the Warsak project to cover the estimated cost of the provision of Canadian consulting engineering services for the re-design of the project and the supervision of construction.

It has also been agreed to allocate the rupee counterpart fund arising from the two $5 million gifts of Canadian wheat to help meet the local costs of this project.

The High Commissioner in Karachi has advised that the Pakistan authorities are anxious that a further allocation of funds for the Warsak project be made from funds which may be available for projects in Pakistan from moneys to be appropriated for Colombo Plan activities in 1954/55.

So that funds will be available to meet the costs of the hydraulic and electrical equipment which must be imported for the project as and when the need arises, it would seem desirable to make a further allocation of funds for the Warsak project.

CONFIDENTIAL

COLOMBO PLAN AID FOR PAKISTAN

1. Daudkhel Cement Plant

Cabinet has so far approved the allocation of $5,500,000 towards the external costs of this project from the 1951-52 and 1952-53 votes.

It was originally hoped that the construction work at the plant would be completed by the spring of 1955. There has however been a delay largely due to faulty concrete pouring and other aspects of the work undertaken by the contractor engaged by the Pakistan Government. A Canadian official from the Department of Defence Constructions together with a senior executive of Canadian Overseas Projects Ltd. recently visited the site and in conjunction with the Acting High Commissioner in Karachi held discussions with Pakistan authorities and with the various private contractors involved in this project. Much of the faulty construction work has now been repaired and there has been an undertaking that construction work to be done in the future will be of an improved quality and that it will be subject to closer supervision and inspection by both the Pakistan authorities and by the Canadian supervising engineers. There is now a clear understanding with C.O.P.L. about their responsibilities and the position of the Canadian Government engineer at the project, as well as the steps to be taken if progress does not continue at a satisfactory pace. In the light of these assurances and of the subsequent reports from the Acting High Commissioner in Pakistan Canadian officials consider that the construction is now proceeding about as satisfactorily as can be expected in the circumstances and that the Pakistan Government is endeavouring to carry out the responsibilities which it previously had incurred with respect to this project. It should be noted that no Canadian equipment or material has suffered as a result of the delay in the initial construction work.

The original estimates of the external cost of this project have been revised in the light of these developments and, more particularly, of experience resulting from further exploration at the site. The factors which have been taken into account include:

(a) A determination that a steam power plant should be substituted for the diesel plant which it had originally been the intention to provide. Because of fuel supply and transportation facilities the steam plant will be more economical to operate. From a technical point of view it will also be a more dependable and satisfactory source of power. Moreover such a plant will be better able to provide the increase in electric power which will be needed.

(b) The unusual soil conditions which have been revealed by excavation work have led to increased costs for the design and planning of the plant and for the amount of reinforcing steel which will be required in its construction. It is considered that such soil conditions could not have been anticipated on the basis of the initial exploration of the site and could therefore not have been allowed for in the original estimate of costs.

(c) Since the project was first approved there have been increases in the price of some of the electrical and other equipment which Canada has agreed to supply.

As a result of such factors it is now estimated that an additional $1,250,000 will be required to finance the external cost of this project. Of this increase only approximately $100,000, resulting from increased administrative and supervisory costs, can be attributed to the delay in the progress at the project.

2. Request from Pakistan for Commodity Assistance

Over the past several months the Pakistan economy has been showing considerable strains reflected largely in an acute shortage of consumer goods. At the industrial level most plants have been experiencing severe shortages of imported raw materials and repair parts owing to the stringent restrictions on imports imposed by the scarcity of foreign exchange. This situation appears to be having economic consequences, and is not without its effects on the political situation.

The Pakistan Government has made a request to Canada for assistance under the Colombo Plan in the form of commodities. They specifically asked for paper board and newsprint to the amount of $1.2 million and aluminum ingots and sheets and copper ingots and sheets to the amount of $3 million.

Aluminum and copper have been provided in the past under the Colombo Plan. As part of the 1953-54 programme for India approximately $5 million worth of these commodities were sent to India. If the request from Pakistan were approved there would be established counterpart funds resulting from the sale of these commodities which would be devoted to specific development purposes, to be agreed upon between the two governments. Moreover the fabricating facilities in Pakistan have been investigated and it has been established that their domestic industry would be able to utilize these commodities directly in the development programme.

Canadian officials consider, therefore, that of the commodities requested aluminum and copper would be most appropriate for inclusion as part of the Colombo Plan assistance to Pakistan this year. In view of existing commitments and other contemplated demands on the 1954-55 Colombo Plan vote Canadian officials recommend that about $1 million in aluminum and copper be provided as part of this year's programme. If this recommendation is approved it is suggested that the aluminum and copper might be supplied in the proportion and in the forms which appear to be most suitable in the light of the need and the availability of processing facilities.

The Pakistan Government has also requested commodity assistance from the United States. The Heinz Mission was appointed by the United States Government to examine the economic situation in Pakistan and on the basis of their report it is understood that approximately $76 million in agricultural commodities, consumer goods and industrial raw materials would be provided to Pakistan with a view to ensuring that aid would be provided in the form most needed and that duplication would be avoided. There has been an informal exchange of information between the United States and Canadian authorities concerning the economic situation in Pakistan and the aid measures which are being considered by both countries.

3. The Extension of the Aerial Resources Survey

As part of the 1951-52 programme for Pakistan Cabinet approved an aerial resources survey covering some 160 thousand square miles at an estimated cost of $2 million. In the 1953-54 programme this survey was extended to include other parts of West Pakistan at an additional cost of $1 million. It is considered that this survey can make an important contribution to the economic development of Pakistan both in helping the efficient exploitation of mineral and other resources and in assisting the vital efforts to increase agricultural output in Pakistan.

The Pakistan Government has now asked if the Aerial Survey which is being carried out by Photographic Survey Corporation of Canada could be further extended to cover a soil survey of an additional 35 thousand square miles at an approximate cost of $50 thousand.

It is the opinion of Canadian officials including those from the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys who are familiar with the work being undertaken in Pakistan that the extension of the survey would contribute usefully to the economic development of Pakistan and that the most economical method of carrying out the soil survey would be in conjunction with the present aerial resources survey now being undertaken by the Photographic Survey Corporation in Pakistan.

4. Summary

The cost of the 3 projects referred to above would total $2,300,000. The funds could be found from the Colombo Plan funds on hand. If these grants were approved this would bring the total aid approved to Pakistan in 1954-55 to $10.1 million (not all of which will be taken up this year). This is slightly in excess of the amount of $9.5 million allocated to Pakistan in 1953-54. There is however no commitment that any fixed amount should be made available each year to any of the Colombo Plan recipient countries. It should also be remembered that Pakistan has been experiencing an economic crisis which is making it particularly difficult for them to sustain their economic development programme without increased external assistance.

Recommendations

It is recommended that out of funds already available additional assistance should be extended to Pakistan for the following projects:

(a) The allocation of an additional $1,250,000 to finance the increased costs at the Daudkhel Cement Plant as described in Section 1 above.

(b) The provision of up to $1,000,000 worth of aluminum and copper in the proportions and in the form considered most suitable in the light of developmental needs and existing fabrication facilities and on the understanding that equivalent counterpart funds would be established for agreed development projects.

(c) The extension of the aerial resources survey presently being carried on in Pakistan to include a soil survey of an additional 35 thousand square miles at an estimated cost of $50,000.⁶²

CANADIAN AID TO NEPAL

You have, no doubt, wondered what progress was being made in the preparation of a suitably revised memorandum embodying the Nepalese request for road maintenance equipment from Canada under the Colombo Plan. Such a memorandum was, in fact, submitted to us under cover of a letter of March 4. The reason it was not sent forward to you is that it did not appear to us to be the kind of document on which Canadian officials could usefully base a recommendation to Ministers. I am attaching four copies of the relevant memorandum now merely as a background for recent developments connected with the Nepalese request.

2. You will agree, I think, that although the revised submission by the Government of Nepal conforms broadly to the outline which we drew up for the convenience of the Nepalese authorities, the presentation of the request still leaves a good deal to be desired. It also contains a number of references to possible Canadian aid in fields other than road maintenance and these will, of course, eventually have to be deleted. All this is, however, merely a matter of presentation and does not affect the substance of the question which is whether Canadian assistance to Nepal of the nature and scope envisaged is a sound proposition at the present stage of Nepal's economic development.

3. It seems fairly evident from the Nepalese submission that Nepal has neither the technical personnel nor the technical facilities to undertake a road maintenance programme of its own. We have no evidence that there is a sufficient number of trained people in the country competent to operate whatever equipment we might decide to make available to Nepal. Nor do we have any guarantee that such equipment would be adequately maintained. In the circumstances, I think there would be little purpose in asking the Nepalese Government for formal guarantees which they might be all too willing to give but which we know they could not with the best will in the world implement.

4. We have now written again to the Nepalese Embassy for certain clarifications which should help us to make up our mind as to where we go from here. These clarifications relate to the arrangements which are now in force for the maintenance of the road linking India with Nepal and subsidiary roads in the valley of Kathmandu. It is our assumption that such maintenance, to the extent that it is being done at all, is in the hands of Indian engineers who, as you know, constructed the Thankot-Bainse section of the main Indo-Nepalese road link. If our assumption is correct, it is obviously in our interest to assign responsibility for the maintenance of the Canadian equipment to these engineers and to discuss with them in detail the list of equipment submitted to us by the Nepalese to determine whether this is, in fact, the equipment best calculated to meet the needs of the Nepalese road maintenance programme.

5. I feel that, depending on the nature of the clarifications we receive from the Nepalese in response to our latest enquiry, the alternatives open to us are:

(a) that we make equipment available to Nepal on the formal understanding that Indian road engineers are given responsibility for road maintenance in Nepal and that we confirm this understanding in a tripartite exchange between Canada, Nepal and India;

(b) that we make this equipment available as part of a broader programme which would comprise the assignment to Nepal of two or three Canadian engineers qualified to operate the Nepalese Government's road maintenance programme at the outset and to train Nepalese engineers to take over after the initial period.

6. Either alternative is, I suppose, open to objection on political grounds. If we decided to adopt the first alternative, the Nepalese might resent the fact that we required the guarantee of a third country as a condition for our assistance to them. If the experience of the Americans in Nepal is any guide, the second alternative might not commend itself to the Indian Government although I imagine that, in practice, they would perhaps welcome a situation where the Americans no longer had a monopoly of "foreign" aid to Nepal.

7. I understand that the Americans have in recent months been careful to consult informally with the Indians about any request for economic or technical aid which was being submitted to them by the Nepalese Government. They have done so in recognition of India's special position in Nepal. In our own case there are, of course, additional reasons why it is useful for us to co-ordinate the provision of road maintenance equipment with the programme of road survey and construction in Nepal with which the Indians are associated on a continuing basis. Accordingly, when I called on Sir Raghavan Pillai on April 23 in another context, I took the opportunity of acquainting him with the broad terms of the Nepalese request to us.

Sir Raghavan was just on the point of leaving Delhi to attend the Colombo Conference but asked me to raise this matter again with him on his return from Ceylon. It was his view that both Canada and India stood to gain from a close integration of the efforts which the two countries were making to aid in the economic development of Nepal.

8. It occurs to me that, without prejudice to our final decision on the Nepalese request, it might be useful at this stage if you were to investigate which of the items listed in the Nepalese request are available from Canadian production. The answer to this question might presumably affect our subsequent discussions with the Nepalese. We, on our part, shall continue to explore a basis on which it might be possible for us to provide to the Nepalese Government the equipment which they have requested from us. I assume that we would not wish to turn down the Nepalese request for aid under the Colombo Plan unless the conditions for extending such aid could, in fact, be shown to be clearly unsuitable.⁶³

CANADIAN AID TO NEPAL⁶⁴

There are undoubtedly reasons why Nepal should receive some Colombo Plan aid and, in view of our road-building experience, Canada would appear to be in as good a position as any country to help. Nepal's standard of living is probably as ⁶³ Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:

Mr. Ritchie:

1. I have drafted a letter to Nik [Cavell] for your signature re paragraph 8.

2. I am asking Commonwealth for their comments.

3. We seem to find ourselves in the midst of a tri-partite negotiation on this one in contrast to our normal practice. Subject to India's concurrence alternative (b) in paragraph 5 might be preferable. This would ensure that Canada was associated fully with the project. It might also relieve suspicion of Nepal that we were in collusion with India, at the expense of Nepal's independence. We might consult with India without actually bringing them into active participation in the project. [O.G. Stoner]

Yes. I think we might get an assurance from the Nepalese that competent engineers would be available and we might have an informal understanding with them that they would complete arrangements for the services of such engineers (Indian or others) before we undertook the projects. We would not have to specify Indian engineers formally, even if we took some course like (a). A.E. R[itchie]

⁶⁴ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

I agree with the general line taken by Mr. Cornett. P. B[ridle]

low and its vulnerability to Communist infiltration as great as any country in Asia. The question here is the manner in which such aid should be extended and, in particular, the degree to which India should be consulted and perhaps actively involved.

2. In general we agree it is desirable that Canada's name should be fully associated with our aid projects and that we should avoid action which might be interpreted as slighting the independence of the recipient countries. However, the case of Nepal is a bit unusual. India maintains that she has a "special position" in Nepal which, although not clearly defined, appears to amount to a sort of benevolent paternalism and to mean that discussions with foreign countries should be carried on with the full knowledge of the Indian authorities. I note that Mr. Saksena is shown as representing Nepalese interests in Canada. It is our impression that Nepal is so backward and unstable that it is nearly certain to be dominated by one of its neighbours, China or India. I see no strong reason why we would wish to disturb India's special relationship with Nepal. It is clearly in our interests to strengthen territories bordering on China but I doubt if anything we might do would enable Nepal to stand entirely on her own feet. Consequently our effort to assist her might better be developed in concert with those of India.

3. As you are aware, the United States is giving direct aid to Nepal and is suspected by India of trying to undermine its influence there and to encourage the Nepalese to stand alone. Even if this was the American intention, which is unlikely, the geographical position of Nepal is such that the effort would almost certainly fail and would merely add to the instability of the country. The Indians are quite sensitive about their special relationship and we would be well advised not to get into the position where we might share with the United States the role of scapegoat for disturbances such as those of last month. (See N.Y. Times for June 1). Moreover the fact that India's "special position" is recognized by the United Kingdom, and to some extent by the United States, leads us to believe that it would not be wise for us to take a different position.

4. There may be further political advantage in not disturbing India's relationship with Nepal as the present connection tends to involve India in any disputes between Nepal and China and this may have a salutary effect on the Indian assessment of Red China's intentions and methods of operation.

5. In short, we consider that we have relatively little interest in having Nepal kindly disposed towards Canada as a direct donor country, and that this interest is more than outweighed by the undesirability of disturbing India's special relations with that country or India's friendship for Canada. This might not preclude action along the lines of the second alternative in paragraph (5) of our High Commissioner's letter which, as you point out, would be desirable in terms of our present Colombo Plan programme, but we should only be prepared to act in this way if the Indians are fully aware of our intentions and agree to our doing so. Should the Indians raise objections, it would be our view that we should defer to their views and work out any plans for assistance in conjunction with them.

6. It might be profitable to explore alternatives other than the two set forth in the letter from New Delhi. The Indians would probably be flattered by a proposal to make the maintenance of the Nepalese roads a joint Canada-India project with Canada providing most of the machinery and India the majority of the skilled personnel. This would be in line with the general objective of the Colombo Plan to encourage the Asian countries to extend aid to one another. Although this approach would approximate alternative "A", it would be less likely to injure Nepalese sensibilities than the blunt request for assurances that India be given full responsibility for road maintenance. It could be pointed out to Nepal that this arrangement is similar to the one adopted for the Thal Experimental Farm in Pakistan.⁶⁵

I attach for your information a copy of our letter of May 24[†] to the Nepalese Embassy in New Delhi and the Embassy's reply of July 8.[†] This correspondence takes us, I think, as far as we can reasonably go without further guidance from you.

2. You will note that the latest Nepalese communication acknowledges that the Government of Nepal would not be in a position to spare the technical personnel to operate and look after any road maintenance equipment which Canada might provide. Accordingly, the Nepalese are prepared to request us to send along with the equipment technical experts to supervise its use and maintenance and to train Nepalese technicians to take over this responsibility after the initial phase. They also suggest that some Nepalese engineers might go to Canada to be trained in road maintenance operations and techniques as part of the project. It is my impression that this type of broader approach to an economic development project has in the past recommended itself to us.

⁶⁵ Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:

Mr. Ritchie

1. Aid to Nepal should be discussed soon at a C[olombo] G[r]oup meeting, particularly since it may affect our new program to India. Because of large number of items in July 5 meeting it was not included on agenda at that session.

2. This is a useful memorandum and the course suggested in para 6 is along the lines of one we discussed. However, I still believe we must be careful not to appear to be supporting India's unwelcome paternalism! O.G. S[toner]

Mr Stoner: I think this is worth circulating to Group with reference to Escott's [Reid] earlier despatch. A.E. R[itchie]

3. If it is not considered feasible to couple our economic aid to Nepal with technical assistance, the Nepalese apparently do not exclude the alternative of asking for Indian engineers to operate the road maintenance programme. In that event, I imagine that we should wish to associate the Indian authorities from the outset with any technical discussions which it may be necessary to arrange before the Nepalese request is given final consideration.

4. The Nepalese Embassy's communication of July 8 confirms my impression that the list of equipment appended to their formal submission to us should be regarded as flexible. In their anxiety to obtain as much equipment as possible from us the Nepalese may well have drawn on the experience of one of their engineers who was recently in Canada to study highway and bridge construction to present a list of equipment which was likely to be available from Canadian production. Whether or not this equipment really meets the requirements of weather and road conditions in Nepal is probably a matter which should be further investigated by a qualified road engineer from Canada.

5. My own suggestion is that we let this matter ride until the Nepalese Secretary for Planning and Development, Mr. B.B. Pande, visits Ottawa in conjunction with the meetings of the Consultative Committee in September. If you agree, I shall ask the Nepalese Embassy here to ensure that Mr. Pande is prepared to discuss this matter in Ottawa. In the meantime, I propose to tell the Embassy that the Nepalese request for road maintenance equipment under the auspices of the Colombo Plan has now been transmitted to you for consideration.

6. I continue to feel, as I suggested in my letter under reference, that in dealing with the Nepalese request we stand to gain from the closest possible co-operation with the Indians. There is, therefore, much to be said for our discussing the specific terms of Nepal's request for Canadian aid with the Indian authorities before Mr. Pande reaches Ottawa. On the other hand, you will agree, I think, that there is little purpose in my discussing this matter in detail with Indian authorities unless I have some indication whether you are seriously considering acceding to the Nepalese request provided a suitable project can be based on it. It is on this point that I shall require your guidance at the earliest feasible opportunity.⁶⁶

CONFIDENTIAL

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE DELEGATION FROM NEPAL
DURING THE COLOMBO PLAN CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE MEETING

During the recent meeting of the Consultative Committee, officials in Ottawa were able to hold some conversations with the Delegation from Nepal concerning the possibility of Canadian Colombo Plan assistance for that country. The Nepalese Delegation was led by Maj. Gen. Maahabir, and included Mr. Pande, presumably the senior civil servant in charge of planning, and Mr. Rana, a young Nepalese who had previously been in Canada under the technical assistance programme. Despite the fact that Maj. Gen. Maahabir's comely entourage, consisting of his wife, two daughters and two governesses, lent considerable colour and interest to many of the extra-conference activities, officials in Ottawa were not left with the impression that the Nepalese representatives were particularly serious-minded or competent.

2. Mr. Pande and Mr. Rana called on both Mr. Cavell and this Department to discuss some of their projects. They also spoke at some length to Canadian newspaper men about their needs. Attached to this despatch is a copy of a letter from Mr. Cavell to this Department which reports on his conversations.⁶⁷ As you will see, the Nepalese spoke to Mr. Cavell of three projects; and when they visited this Department they added a fourth, the supply of railway cars, the need for which arose largely out of the unwillingness of India to make sufficient rolling stock available to transport Nepalese trade over the Indian railroads.

3. As a result of our previous exchanges with you, we were well informed about the road building project. Mr. Cavell is also looking into the technical and supply aspects of the ropeway.

4. The requests from Nepal are under consideration by Canadian officials, but it is now quite obvious these requests will have to be very carefully examined both in relation to the availability of funds and to the competing demands from other countries and in relation to the ability of the Nepalese authorities to administer the projects. We should be particularly grateful for any further advice which you can give us on the latter aspect, possibly after discussing it informally with U.S. and

New Delhi, November 25, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: Your Despatch No. E-740 of October 25.

COLOMBO PLAN: CANADIAN AID TO NEPAL

I am inclining more and more to the view that the risks involved in extending Canadian aid to Nepal may be too great to make the game worth the candle. You have yourself referred to the technical and administrative risks which are, bluntly speaking, that Nepal has no administration to speak of and that there is scarcely any technical competence which could be associated with a Canadian project in Nepal or which could be relied upon to maintain such a project in operation.

2. Even more grave, however, are the political risks of conflict between ourselves and the Indians which would seem to be inherent in most of the projects proposed to us by the Nepalese. That the Nepalese delegation in Ottawa proposed these projects on the grounds that they would serve to make Nepal more independent of India merely shows how warily we have to tread.

3. The Indians consider the inclusion of Nepal in their defence perimeter vital to their strategic interests. If a complete administrative breakdown in Nepal is to be avoided, Indian influence in the country may have to continue to be strong and susceptible of application at the appropriate time. This special position of India in Nepal has been conceded by the United Kingdom and the United States and the Indians hold that it has also been conceded by China. In the circumstances, for Canada to base its aid to Nepal on projects which are overtly designed to circumscribe the Indian position is plainly impolitic and against our own best interests.

4. I find it difficult to take seriously two of the projects which were submitted to you by the Nepalese in Ottawa. These relate to the provision of railway rolling stock and aeroplanes to Nepal. It is absurd for Nepal to claim that either of these projects would make the country less subject to Indian goodwill when Nepal has no technicians competent to run either a railway or an air service and when, in any case, heavy reliance would continue to have to be placed on Indian facilities. The railway rolling stock, for example, would operate over Indian railroads.

5. As for the provision of road maintenance equipment, I am now convinced that such a project would have to be closely correlated with the work which Indian army engineers are doing in Nepal. The position in respect of roads has been outlined to you by the Nepalese. It is, briefly, that the recently completed road to Kathmandu is, in fact, an emergency road. It is subject to annual washouts by rain and floods and thus cannot be said to serve effectively either economic or strategic needs. I understand that the United States has agreed, after consultation with the Indians, to repair this year's flood damage as part of American flood relief to Nepal but our colleagues in the United States Embassy here do not believe that, in the long term, annual repairs of this road are likely to prove an economic proposition.

6. Indian army engineers are at present mapping out an alternative road which would be about 80 miles longer than the direct road to Kathmandu but not subject to the same annual weather hazards. It is estimated that this alternative road will take at least two years to construct. If, therefore, we contemplate making road building equipment available to Nepal under the Colombo Plan, I strongly suggest that we do so in consultation with the Government of India, and that we earmark it for the new road. In this way we might be instrumental in having the road completed ahead of schedule.

7. On the face of it, the project of helping Nepal extend the present ropeway from Dhursing to the railhead at Amlekhgunj would appear to have much to recommend it. As you have pointed out, the Nepalese have satisfactorily operated the existing section of the ropeway and they may be expected to operate a 24-mile extension with equal success. Such an extension would eliminate the present necessity of trans-shipment of goods consigned to Kathmandu. It is also unlikely to clash with any plans which the Indians may have to improve transportation and communication facilities between India and Nepal.

8. On the other hand, the economic aspects of the project would obviously have to be looked into with great care. It may be, for example, that the present supply of available power will not be adequate to operate the contemplated extension. This, at least, is what the Americans have suggested to us on the basis of their experience in helping to bring the ropeway over the last four miles from its present northern terminus into Kathmandu. It may also be that, with the completion of the alternative road which the Indians are now mapping out, transportation by truck over the new road would be more economical than by ropeway. In that case, our contribution to the economic development of Nepal might more suitably take the form of Canadian trucks and trailers.

9. We have discussed this matter privately with our British and American colleagues. They have agreed to let us have such further information as you may require to enable you to review the Nepalese proposals for Canadian aid. When this additional information is in your hands you may wish to authorize me to discuss the road building and ropeway projects specifically with the Indian authorities. I am, in any case, satisfied that only out of such discussions with the Indian authorities is there any chance that a suitable project for Canadian aid to Nepal is likely to emerge.

10. To sum up: because of the political instability, the intrigues and the administrative incompetence of Nepal, participation by Canada in any project there will mean an excessively large number of administrative headaches. The Nepalese want to get as many Western countries as possible involved in Nepal since they think they will be able to play those countries off against India. Canada's interests would not be served by getting involved in this game. Any goodwill we secured in Nepal in this way would be outweighed by ill will in India. If, therefore, we decide to give any economic aid to Nepal it should be done only in a partnership with India.

You will have seen references to the rumoured Pakistan-United States Military Security Agreement. The High Commissioner for India called on Mr. Ritchie on December 10th, on instructions from his Government, and made representations to the effect that the Government of India regarded the projected military security agreements with the greatest concern. Mr. Saksena followed this interview up with a letter dated December 11th, copy of which is attached. As you will see, the language used by Mr. Saksena in this letter is pretty extreme and his oral presentation of the case to Mr. Ritchie was even more so. While Mr. Saksena emphasized that he was making representations on the instructions of Mr. Nehru, it is possible that he himself may be responsible for some of the strong statements and rather ambiguous hints contained in his letter. Mr. Pearson has been informed, in the attached telegram of December 16th,[†] of the substance of Mr. Saksena's representations and of the reports which we have received from our High Commissioner in India on this subject, in case he may wish to discuss the matter with Mr. Eden while in London.

2. You will observe that the Indian Government suggests that an expression of Canadian opinion to the Governments of the United States and Pakistan would be helpful at this juncture. It would plainly be a very delicate matter for the Canadian Government to make any such representations in Washington and Karachi, and in this connection Mr. Pearson has been asked for his comments.

3. Meanwhile Mr. Saksena has asked whether he may have an interview with you to put the position of his Government, on this subject, to you personally and I should be grateful to know whether you would be prepared to see the Indian High Commissioner.

4. You may have noticed a report of the New York Times Service, appearing in today's Montreal Gazette to the effect that Mr. Nehru:

"...has ordered his nationwide Congress Party machine to organize demonstrations against the proposed United States military aid Pakistan in all of India's 28 states.

Although Prime Minister Nehru, who is president of the Congress Party, has decreed that direct condemnation of the United States and Pakistan should be avoided, his campaign is thought likely to generate a nationwide wave of anti-Americanism on an unprecedented scale".

5. It is unfortunately apparent that unless the United States decide in the interim not to proceed with military assistance arrangements to Pakistan this subject will probably be a very burning one at the time of your own visit to the Indian sub-Continent and it is to be anticipated that representations will be addressed to you by both the Indian and Pakistani Governments.

LETTER NO. 276-HC/53

Dear Mr. [C.S.A.] Ritchie,

I spoke to you yesterday about the projected United States - Pakistan Military Pact. In this letter I am giving you the background of this question and briefly summarizing the views I conveyed to you verbally. I shall be grateful if you would kindly bring this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister. He might perhaps agree to afford me an opportunity to discuss it personally with him.

As I explained to you yesterday afternoon, there has recently been a spate of speculation, more particularly in the American Press, in regard to a Military Pact between the United States and Pakistan. Some of the writers have referred to the possibility of Pakistan agreeing to grant bases to the United States for military purposes, while others have stressed that the intention of the United States was to grant military aid to Pakistan. Even though we recognize fully the sovereignty of Pakistan and its right to enter into any international commitments it likes, we could not obviously remain indifferent to developments across the border which might affect profoundly the situation in our own country. Prime Minister Nehru, therefore, on the basis of reports which he had seen, made a press statement in which he referred to the dangers inherent in a move of this kind and stated that a Military Pact between Pakistan and the United States of America would be of "the most intense concern to India".

Objection was taken both in Washington and in Karachi to Prime Minister Nehru's statements and it was alleged that no decision in regard to acquisition of bases in Pakistan had been taken. It was, nevertheless, admitted that talks on the subject of a military alliance had taken place and the grant of military assistance by the United States of America to Pakistan was contemplated. As a matter of fact, matters would appear to have gone far beyond this point. Talks between Military Commands of both sides are reported to have taken place and visits by Military Missions have been exchanged. It is, therefore, fair to assume that the groundwork of a plan for military assistance to Pakistan has been prepared and now awaits implementation. Our view is that if this plan is implemented, a dangerous situation full of the most explosive possibilities would arise in India, the gravity of which could not be overemphasized. Through a delicate balancing of forces and the peaceful intent of the Government of India, peace has hitherto prevailed in our part of the world. The United States, by its action to enter into a Military Pact with Pakistan would disturb this delicate balance and would create conditions which would undermine the peace and stability of the sub-continent. The United States would, in our view, be guilty of aiding the aggressive intent of Pakistan against India — a Commonwealth country which has endeavoured throughout to maintain friendly relations with all countries and whose only offence, if it can be called an offence, has been to refuse steadfastly to subordinate her conscience to the will of the United States. I am giving below in the form of questions and answers our reactions to the projected Military Pact.

Q.1: Why is Pakistan anxious to enter into a Military Pact?

A: It must be obvious to any discerning person that Pakistan is not immediately or directly threatened by the Soviet Union or Communist China; nor, judging from the pronouncements in its Press and by its leaders, is it greatly concerned with the spread of communistic activity in the country. Further the urge to adopt defensive measures against the Soviet Union should, if anything, have shown abatement because of the recent easing of international tension. Pakistan has, nevertheless, been increasingly insistent on securing military aid from the United States of America. Why? Quite obviously for one reason, and one reason only, and that is that she desires to build up her military strength first to use it as a bargaining factor in dealing with India, and, if these efforts fail, by waging a regular war against her. In the circumstances which exist any other conclusion would be contrary to reason and entirely untenable.

Q.2: Why is the United States anxious to enter into a Military Pact with Pakistan?

A: In the first place, the United States desires to forge another link in the chain which she has been fabricating to encircle the Soviet Union.

Secondly, it would certainly appear that this step is being considered as a means of bringing pressure on India to abandon her so-called neutralist foreign policy and be coerced into joining the anti-Communist bloc. I venture to prophesy that if the United States persists in consummating its Military Pact with Pakistan, it will fail in the attainment of both these objectives. You may rest assured that India will, in no circumstances, succumb to outside pressure and abandon a foreign policy which has the solid and united support of all her people. With a hostile India, the military support of Pakistan is scarcely likely to achieve the objective which the United States Government has in view.

Q.3: What will be the effect of a Military Pact on Pakistan?

A: Pakistan has declared on numerous occasions that the be-all and end-all of her foreign policy was to wrest control of Kashmir. Hostilities in this area ceased after an understanding was reached that a solution would be sought through peaceful means by holding a plebiscite. Both sides have adhered to this arrangement because of the balance of power in the sub-continent. If now Pakistan receives military assistance from a third party, it would find itself strong enough to adopt towards India a more aggressive attitude. Public opinion in Pakistan, which is highly inflammable, would be whipped up by demagogues who would dangle before the people the bait of a successful military exploit. It is also not unlikely, conditions being what they are in Pakistan, that the increase of military power would result in the overthrow of constitutional government and the establishment of a military dictatorship.

Q.4: What will be the effect of the Pact on India?

A: The country will be swept by anti-American feeling from one end to the other and all prospects of collaboration between India and the United States will cease. By the same token all prospects of peaceful settlement of the Kashmir and other disputes between India and Pakistan will also disappear. Tension between India and Pakistan will increase, and India will be forced into re-thinking and reorganization of her defence arrangements. To cope with the increasing military might of Pakistan, she will have to increase her military power, in the first instance, from her own limited resources, thus applying a brake on much-needed economic development. She will also, in all probability, be forced to seek such outside assistance from other quarters as she is able to get. The cold war will thus be brought to India and it would be difficult to prevent the outbreak of actual hostilities. Because of international repercussions, hostilities in India could scarcely be localized and the probability is that these developments would lead to a world-war. Another country which will be similarly affected will be Afghanistan. Its relations with Pakistan have not been always happy and it will be similarly forced to look elsewhere for support to counter the military threat from Pakistan.

Q.5: What will be the effect on the Soviet Union and Communist China?

A: The Pact would give cause for serious offence to both these countries. They would take all possible steps to counteract this settlement. Not only will they try to establish bases on borders of India and Pakistan and take such other steps as logistics will permit, but they will further redouble their efforts to win over the people of India and Afghanistan to their side. Because of the Military Pact between the United States of America and Pakistan, a climate would have been created in India which would be most favourable to the communist cause. They would have willing listeners and also willing tools. The Pact thus would be a menace to stability of India, to the hard-won freedom of the people and to the cause of democracy in the East.

Q.6: Can United States prevent misuse of force by Pakistan?

A: The answer to this question is definite, and emphatically, "No". The United States has informed us that it does not consider that the Pact will imperil India's interests. This hope, in the context of prevailing sentiments and events, is utterly futile and meaningless. If planes, arms, explosives and other war materials are given to a country, there is no power on earth which could stop it from using these engines of destruction against any country. Any assurance which the receiving country might give to the donor country is not worth the paper on which it is written. In the case of Pakistan, it must be obvious to all except the wilfully blind that her sole objective in seeking this pact is to employ her enhanced military strength against India, first in arguments, and later on the field. The fact that recipients of military assistance cannot be controlled has been amply demonstrated by the conduct of President Syngman Rhee in Korea and by the threatening manoeuvres of the Italian Army, equipped with NATO arms on the frontiers of Yugoslavia. Neither of these protégés of United States could be controlled in the exercise of threats held out by them against their opponents.

Q.7: What is the scope of the Pact and when will it be implemented?

A: The United States Government, beyond admitting that it was thinking of giving military assistance to Pakistan, has vouchsafed no information to us in regard to the scope of the projected Pact or of the degree of military aid which Pakistan will receive. As regards the time of implementation, we learn from newspaper reports that plans will be speeded up on the return of Vice-President Nixon from his tour. It is also reported that Vice-President Nixon is strongly in favour of the grant of military assistance to Pakistan.

As I explained to you yesterday, my Government regards the projected military alliance with the gravest concern. We feel that the consequences of such a Pact will be serious, far-reaching and unpredictable. The Government of Canada will, no doubt, decide its own course of action, but we feel that an expression of their opinion to the Governments of United States and Pakistan will help.

Yours sincerely,

R.R. SAKSENA

Memorandum by Secretary of State for External Affairs

UNITED STATES—PAKISTAN MILITARY NEGOTIATIONS

I received a visit this afternoon from the Indian High Commissioner, during which we discussed the reported negotiations for military assistance from the United States to Pakistan. Mr. Saksena reported his conversations with the Prime Minister during my absence and indicated his satisfaction with the Prime Minister's statement that, although official representations to the United States would not be in order, he would take advantage of any opportunity to raise the matter informally. Mr. Saksena outlined briefly the Indian position along familiar lines although his expression of them was considerably milder than had been the case when he spoke to Mr. Ritchie.

I told Mr. Saksena that we had already shown an interest in Washington in this subject, but that when Mr. Heeney visited Ottawa next week I would ask him to see Mr. Dulles or Mr. Bedell Smith to ask for information on the United States intentions towards Pakistan, explaining that we had a natural interest in matters affecting a member of the Commonwealth. It was of course a delicate matter. We would not wish to offend the Pakistanis by any action which might lead them to believe that under pressure from India we had dissuaded the United States from pursuing a policy which Pakistan would like. I added that we knew very little except what had been reported in the press about these negotiations. If what was involved was merely a question of giving to Pakistan surplus arms, we presumed there would be no objection and that in such a case India itself might be interested in securing supplies. I presumed, however, that more than this was involved, that something in the nature of an M.S.A. agreement was contemplated and this would of course involve or at least imply a more definite alignment of Pakistan with the West than had previously been the case. We, of course, were much interested, because it contributed to our own security, in any arrangement which would assist countries in strengthening themselves against Communist aggression, but we realized of course that there were in this case other aspects which would cause India concern. I said that I felt, however, that the United States' intention was simply to strengthen this area.

Mr. Saksena said that whatever the intentions of the United States were the net result would be that Pakistan would be strengthened vis-à-vis India. I asked him if India would be disturbed if an agreement of this kind were reached between, for example, Burma and the United States, and Mr. Saksena said, after a moment's thought, that he did not think there would be any objection. (If this would indeed be the view of the Indian Government it would seem to dispose of the Indian argument that a political-military tie between the United States and any South East Asian country would upset the balance of forces in that area and introduce an element which would tend to draw this area into the cold war.)

Mr. Saksena expressed his satisfaction with the steps which I proposed taking. He quite understood our difficult position vis-à-vis Pakistan and implied that India was not asking us to intervene with the Americans by saying that what they really wanted was for us "to understand".

Dear Mike [Pearson],

As you can well imagine the situation here is tense and confused. The Indians are, of course, doing their best to make us believe their dire predictions of what is likely to happen within India if the United States agreement with Pakistan goes through. The Americans in private conversations and inspired press stories are doing their best to counteract this propaganda.

I would have more confidence in my own appreciation of what is likely to happen in India if I had been here for thirteen years not thirteen months. As it is I feel very conscious of my inability to gauge how the underlying forces and the stresses and strains within India are likely to be affected if the United States does grant military aid to Pakistan on a considerable scale.

It is not simply, of course, that this country is so large and that its various regions differ so widely; it is much more that so many of the deeper currents of ⁶⁸ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Thank you L. St. L[aurent]

Indian life lie far under the surface where a westerner can scarcely hope to penetrate.

For example, there must be a bitter struggle going on within Hinduism between what we would call modernists or liberals and the fundamentalists or traditionalists. I assume that this struggle is reflected in the politics of this country. This should not surprise a Canadian since in the eighties and nineties in Canada, much less profound differences within the Roman Catholic church in French Canada were reflected in politics in French Canada. But Laurier though he was accused of being a liberal with a small "l" had never, unlike Mr. Nehru, written books openly declaring himself to be a rationalist and pouring contempt on the beliefs of many parish priests.

There are fundamentalist Hindu groups within the Congress party with leaders such as the President of India, Dr. Prasad. There are more extreme Hindu fundamentalist groups outside the Congress party. These groups tend to be contemptuous about the whole of western civilization or at least to believe that it is safer for India to try to reject as much of western civilization as possible.

One indication of their attitude is their fairly successful campaign against the use of English and the efforts which they are making to degrade the teaching of English.

Another indication of their attitude is their suspicion of Indian officials who wear western dress, send their children to western schools and speak English and not Hindi. Most Indian officials now wear Indian dress to official Indian Government evening functions though they wear western dress at the office. It looks as if they will soon be virtually compelled to wear Indian dress at the office. The more anglicized pro-western officials already feel their position weakened and this kind of rule will make them feel weaker still. Conceivably if the Hindu fundamentalists should get even stronger the situation in India could become similar to that behind the Iron Curtain: anyone educated in the west would be suspect and would eventually be pushed out of any position of influence.

Dr. Katju, the Home Minister, is a very charming, cultivated lawyer who has been most friendly whenever we have met but his public statements attacking foreign missionaries were so extreme that the Prime Minister had to water them down. They were sufficiently extreme when passed from mouth to mouth as to lead some illiterate Hindu villagers to believe they were doing what he wanted when they beat up some fellow villagers who had become converted to Christianity.

The big industrialists form another right-wing group within the Congress party. They don't like nationalization and they are not necessarily Hindu fundamentalists, though Birla is, but they like protection against foreign imports and they can use for their own purposes xenophobic nationalism stirred up by the Hindu fundamentalists.

The Hindu fundamentalists are opposed to a secular state. The more extreme of them want a Hindu state just as the Muslim fundamentalists in Pakistan want an Islamic state. One might think that because of this they would want as few Muslims in India as possible and would not, therefore, be keen on India annexing Kashmir. On the contrary, they are strong advocates of a firm policy in Kashmir.

The worse relations get between predominantly Hindu India and predominantly Muslim Pakistan the easier it will be for the more extreme Hindu fundamentalists to reduce the forty million Muslims in India to the role of second class citizens. It would be too much to hope that there would not be a Senator McCarthy among them who would go so far as to call many of the leaders of the Muslim minority, Fifth Columnists.

The Communists are strong among the frustrated intellectuals and the lower middle class. Anti-Americanism is for them a most useful cry. Like all Communists they are in Toynbee's sense westernizers because their aim is to impose a western conceived pattern on India but in practice they have no difficulty in playing on the same anti-western passions as the Hindu fundamentalists.

I have been told recently by a very good authority that in the armed services and even in the Foreign Service there are a few officers who though not Communists have been swept off their feet by what seems to them to be the way in which Russia and China have put themselves in a position where they can now talk to the United States as equals. They are also tempted by the totalitarian shortcuts to economic improvement.

Since the death of Gandhi and Patel,⁶⁹ Mr. Nehru has reached a position of dangerously lonely eminence. He towers above all the other leaders of the Congress party. I understand that there is no one in Cabinet who has any substantial influence on him in matters of foreign policy. Pillai has not been able to exercise the same moderating influence on him as Bajpai did.

When a statesman has reached the position of lonely eminence that Mr. Nehru has he is likely to be the centre of palace politics and to be surrounded by flatterers. I am told that many of the people who surround Mr. Nehru pour flattery on him in order to get power for themselves or his support for the policies they favour and that he does not appear to be sickened by this flattery; that for the most part, these flatterers press him into extreme courses; that they do not counsel moderation; and that they also encourage him in those apprehensions of United States policy which he shares with liberal democrats very much like himself in the British Labour party.

Mr. Nehru loves to go about the country addressing hundreds of thousands of people. He returns to Delhi exhilarated. But the adulation of hundreds of thousand of one's countrymen is a dangerous stimulant.

Mr. Nehru is I am certain a very great man. He is, as you know, liberal, humane, rational, intelligent, very westernized in his values and in his ways of thinking. But how deeply has an already proud aristocrat been affected during the past five years by power and adulation? The more deeply he has been affected the greater the danger that resentment at United States policies and tactics and at the insulting language directed against him in the press of the United States may drive him into public speeches and courses of action which will make it very difficult for Congress to vote economic assistance to India or India to accept it and which in other ways will widen the rift between India and the United States and narrow the gap between India and the Soviet Union.

Sardar Vallabhbhai Jhaverbhai Patel was Minister for Home Affairs, Information and Broadcasting, and States, and Deputy Prime Minister of India from August 1947 until his death in December 1950.

Two months ago I was fairly certain that, though there were cross currents, in general things in India were moving in what we in the west would consider the right direction both in foreign policy and in internal development. Even then, however, the balance was nicely poised. But if the depths are stirred in India, as they may well be if many Indians should believe that the United States is putting pressure on them to join the western camp, I do not know what will happen. My guess is that the resulting stresses and strains within India will result in strengthening the forces in India which are inimical to the best traditions of the west and which in the long run are opposed to the interests of the west.

Perhaps we in the west have to run this calculated risk. You in Ottawa are able to judge this. I cannot from here. But I would be happier if I could feel more certain than I am now that United States policy towards India is based on a cool calculation of the long-run national interests of the United States and that there has been a careful weighing of military, political, economic and "moral" considerations, and of long-run against short-run factors. As it is I have the uneasy feeling that United States policy towards India today is greatly influenced by wholly understandable but nevertheless irrational factors — in particular a resentment against Mr. Nehru for his moral lectures to mankind, his general attitude of moral superiority, his criticisms of United States policy, his organization of an opposition to the United States in the United Nations, and his failure to show gratitude to the United States for the economic aid they have given India.

Mr. Nehru is guilty in not having realized sufficiently that India like every other country should conserve its diplomatic resources and that it cannot afford the luxury of indulging in public crusades against other countries, especially when they are powerful and friendly, except on the very rare occasions when the national interests of India can be served only by conducting such public crusades. Mr. Nehru is also at fault in not having realized, at least until recently, that his moral stature in the world has been diminished by his attitude on Kashmir.

The Belgian Ambassador told me last week that he found in Brussels this summer that officials in his Foreign Office had been "bored" by India's behaviour on the colonial question. The French Ambassador who was likewise on home leave this summer told me that he found boredom and resentment among officials in his foreign office. He also found among many of his colleagues at the Foreign Ministry in Paris a stubborn belief that Mr. Nehru is pro-Communist. When he spoke to them of his admiration for Mr. Nehru and his conviction that Mr. Nehru is a great man, a liberal and as pro-western a Prime Minister as India could have, he found that his remarks were met with a feeling of impatience.

I am sure in Washington there is much more resentment and boredom about Mr. Nehru than in Brussels and Paris. I am also sure that in Washington there is much more scepticism about the reality of Mr. Nehru's belief in the values of our western civilization and in his private protestations that his policy of non-alignment serves the interests of the west as well as those of India. It seems to me that the scepticism is more the result of boredom and resentment than of an attempt to probe into Mr. Nehru's mind and spirit.

Yours sincerely,
ESCOTT REID

CONVERSATION WITH THE INDIAN HIGH COMMISSIONER

Mr. Saksena spent an hour with me this morning and brought up a number of questions.

1. He asked me whether I could give him any further information about the American reaction to the Pakistani aid arrangement or on the progress that had been made in this matter in Washington.

I told him that we discussed the matter twice with the State Department, but had not received any new information. I gave him my personal view that the publicity which this matter had attracted may have caused the United States Government to give it a second thought, and that there had obviously been a reexamination of one kind and another, for no action had yet been taken. I also pointed out that, as I told him before, the proposed arrangements did not go nearly as far as some people either hoped or feared, and that there did not seem to be any question of territorial bases involved. Indeed, I felt that the alarm over bases had been somewhat exaggerated in India. Mr. Saksena's views, however, remained unrevised and unrepentant. He said that all the talk about bases had come originally from the United States in the form of Press stories, and that the Indian Government was quite justified in taking alarm. In any event, even without bases, the matter was important and would cause great harm, as upsetting the balance of military power between the two countries.

Mr. Saksena then asked me if there was any ministerial or departmental foundation to Mr. Daniell's story which appeared in the New York Times a few days ago that the Prime Minister on his Asian tour had no intention of mediating between India and Pakistan on this problem; that Canadian opinion felt that its importance had been exaggerated by India; that because India wished to be neutral was no reason that neutrality should be enforced on other countries, like Pakistan.

I told Mr. Saksena that I was sure this story had not come from the Department, though it was quite accurate in his expression of the Prime Minister's anxiety not to be involved in this dispute during his visit. Mr. Saksena seemed a shade disappointed that we were taking such a negative attitude. I told him, as I told him before, that we appreciated the importance of the issue and deplored the trouble it had caused. I added, moreover, that while we did not think Pakistan should be condemned for strengthening itself against Communist aggression (Mr. Saksena intervened that it was not Russia but Kashmir and India that Pakistan was thinking of). Nevertheless, I was somewhat worried about the new suggestion that American aid should be linked with an association of Pakistan, Iran and Turkey for co-operative defence. My worry was not concerned with the three countries co-operating for this purpose, but with the interpretation that might be given to it as a further eastward extension of NATO.

2. Mr. Saksena felt that I had gone too far in my statement in the House yesterday in insisting that the release of non-Communist prisoners in Korea was not only legally but morally justified.⁷⁰ He said that the prisoners in question, under the armistice arrangement, indeed, even under our interpretation of it, should have been returned to civilian status, whereas, in fact, they had merely become conscripts in Chiang Kai-shek's army without any choice. There is, of course, something in this argument, but I told the Indian High Commissioner that our main objective was to liquidate this problem with a minimum of trouble, and this was the only way in which it could be done. Furthermore, I argued that the prisoners in question could have opted for return to China if they had so desired. Mr. Saksena did not, however, seem to think that they had, in fact, been given this alternative.

I think that we should enquire of the Americans as to what has happened to these Chinese prisoners; whether they were released to civilian status or merely paraded into Chiang Kai-shek's army whether they wished to go or not.

3. Mr. Saksena, while emphasizing that he was not making any representations on the subject to the Canadian Government, read to me memoranda in which his Government made representations to the United Kingdom Government on:

- (a) The Central African Federation, with its discrimination against Africans and non-Europeans;
- (b) The situation in Kenya;
- (c) The situation in British Guiana;
- (d) South African treatment of Indians and other non-Europeans.

I asked him if he would leave with me the memoranda in question, and he said he would send them along next week for departmental consideration.

He emphasized that India had the right to make its views known on these matters, not merely because they concerned persons of Indian race, but because of India's Commonwealth connection.

4. I took advantage of the opportunity to explain to Mr. Saksena in considerable detail the reason why, at the last minute, we had changed our view and decided against holding an Assembly at this time.⁷¹ The High Commissioner seemed to understand our position.

PRIME MINISTER'S TOUR

Ottawa, February 2, 1954

Dear Mr. [C.S.A.] Ritchie,

The Minister has talked to the Prime Minister about the general line he will follow in conversations during his tour. As you know, Mr. St. Laurent's purpose is to see for himself something of the countries he will visit, especially those in Asia, to meet and talk with leaders in these countries, and to demonstrate to the people of these countries the friendly interest of the Canadian people. His trip is, in the best and largest sense of the term, a "goodwill tour." I enclose a copy of his statement on the tour to the House of Commons on January 29th.

The Prime Minister will, of course, be very much interested in whatever the leaders he talks to are prepared to tell him about their policies and points of view, and he will naturally, where appropriate, explain our policies and points of view. While there are no policy questions which he wishes to raise, there are what might be called general effects which we hope his visit will create in the various countries; and it is probable that leaders in some countries will raise policy questions with him.

France, Germany and Italy

In the papers which we have submitted for inclusion in the Prime Minister's Brief,[†] you will find references to matters which may be mentioned in discussions in the European countries which you will visit. We have also provided documents which will provide you with background material on some of the main items. You will, of course, find yourself on familiar territory during the European part of the tour both because of your previous experience in that area and because of your responsibilities in the Department which kept you closely in touch with European affairs until a recent date. It seems hardly necessary, therefore, to include in this letter any detailed information about the European countries which you will visit.

We have attempted to cover in the Prime Minister's Brief and the collection of background papers the main items of concern in France, Germany and Italy, but there are a few pieces of unfinished business for which the Missions in those countries will be responsible for providing up-to-date information. In view of the fluid political situations in France and Italy, we have asked the Embassies there to have ready on your arrival up-to-date lists of Government members. We have also asked the Embassy in Bonn to bring up to date a section of the Prime Minister's Brief which reports on developments at the Berlin Conference only up to January 31. We are forwarding to the Embassies in France, Germany and Italy copies of the Briefs for those countries, and it is our hope that the Missions will be able to inform you of any last minute developments which might necessitate revision or amendment of any parts of the Brief prepared here.

As you so well know, one of the most delicate problems of French foreign policy at the moment is the question of ratification of the European Defence Community Treaty. At the recent meeting of the North Atlantic Council, in a subsequent press conference, and in the discussion of external affairs which took place in the House of Commons on January 29, the Minister states quite clearly Canadian support for the EDC while at the same time he expressed understanding for the concern felt by France regarding the new strength of Germany. As you know, the French have reacted sensitively to statements of Sir Winston Churchill and Mr. Dulles which were interpreted as threats directed towards France, in order to prod that country into ratification of the EDC Treaty. Mr. Pearson, however, has been commended in the French press and by political leaders in France because of his understanding attitude and his moderate language. If the question of EDC ratification arises during discussions in France, I should think that the line already laid down with such success by the Minister might well form the basis for the expression of any views on this subject which might be called for during your visit.

In Germany, there is likely to be considerable pre-occupation with developments arising out of the Four-Power Conference now taking place in Berlin. It is obviously not possible for us to provide much guidance either in the Prime Minister's Brief or in this letter for discussions in Germany concerning the Conference. However, the Embassy in Bonn has arranged for regular attendance in Berlin of officers from Bonn and Mr. Davis himself will spend some time in Berlin so long as the Conference is in session. You will have no difficulty, therefore, in learning in detail from the Embassy what happened at the Berlin Conference.

We would hope that during your visit to Rome, your Italian hosts will refrain from putting before you their case on Trieste. We have included a note on Trieste in the Prime Minister's Brief, but, of course, we have not been directly concerned with the delicate negotiations on this subject, and, as you will realize, we wish to avoid any statement which, if it were made public, might prejudice negotiations which are still proceeding. It may be that the Italians will still be pre-occupied with a political crisis when you arrive in that country; the Embassy will be able to report to you on the political situation at that time.

I do not consider that we need to include in this letter any further points of detail regarding France, Germany or Italy. But of course, if it occurs to you that we have omitted in all the material assembled for the tour reference to other matters which you believe to be of importance, do not hesitate to let us know and we shall endeavour by telegram to repair our omissions.

Pakistan, India and Ceylon

In Pakistan, India and Ceylon we hope that the Prime Minister's visit will strengthen a feeling of friendliness toward Canada among leaders and on the part of the people. We also expect that his visit will reinforce the disposition of leaders to keep their countries within the Commonwealth. It should forcibly remind them that the Commonwealth benefits them as well as us, especially as it gives them an opportunity to make their views understood in several important western countries.

As you know, we feel it would do more harm than good to attempt to "sell" any of these leaders on the Commonwealth, or to suggest to the Pakistanis or the Ceylonese that they should retain the link with the Crown. Also, any discussion of ways in which the Commonwealth countries might improve their methods of cooperation is bound to raise a number of contentious issues which might better be left to the leaders of the other countries to raise, if they are raised at all. We nevertheless hope that a somewhat fuller impression of the attitude of these countries toward the Commonwealth may emerge from the tour.

We also hope that Mr. St. Laurent may find an opportunity to allay some of the more extreme fears of Western policy, and in particular of United States policy, which prey on the minds of Indian leaders, and to a lesser extent on the minds of the Ceylonese. This is very delicate ground, since anti-American feeling is strong in India now, at least among the public. The good effect of Mr. St. Laurent's visit could be substantially vitiated by too deliberate an effort to justify United States policy. The wisdom of trying to maintain consistency in what is said in Pakistan and India on Kashmir will be evident. While we fully supported the United Nations approach when we were on the Security Council, we have expressed no views to either side since we ceased to be directly concerned. It might be best to adopt the attitude of one who wishes to understand rather than of one who wishes to advise.

On broad questions of United States policy care is even more desirable, since we cannot, of course, speak for the United States. We can, however, try to help the Indians to understand that the United States' basic aims are essentially peaceful, that the American people are a fine and generous people, and that in any case the United States is only one member, if the leading member, of a group of states which believe in collective defence. Points of this kind can be made in the course of conversation as the general question of United States policy arises, without in any way suggesting that we feel India should alter her policy and, I think, without giving the Indians the impression that we blindly follow the United States line or are attempting to persuade them to agree with it.

We also hope that the Prime Minister's conversations will lead to a fuller understanding here of the policies of the Indians, Pakistanis and the Ceylonese, as well as to a fuller understanding of our policies on their part. The Prime Minister has no desire to attempt any sort of mediation on such contentious issues as Kashmir or

United States military aid to Pakistan. Naturally, we would be glad if his private influence in the two capitals were such as to promote a constructive and reasonable attitude towards Indo-Pakistan problems, and we have no doubt that his general effort will be not only to understand the Pakistan and Indian points of view but also to encourage their leaders in an attitude of mutual trust and conciliation.

Initiative, from the Pakistan side will likely be mainly over Kashmir, and perhaps canal waters, and the Indian attitude on the question of United States aid to Pakistan. We do not yet know what lies behind the rather extraordinary Pakistan suggestion that Lieutenant General Simonds and Major-General MacQueen, of Canadian Arsenals Limited, should accompany the Prime Minister in Pakistan. We intend to do nothing about this unless we are approached officially by Pakistan, which now seems most unlikely.

Mr. Nehru will no doubt explain the Indian point of view on the question of United States aid to Pakistan. He will also, I am sure, put before the Prime Minister the Indian point of view on current Korean problems. A recent telegram from New Delhi suggests that the Berlin Conference and the "New Look" in United States Defence policy might be the subject of questions at the Press Conference. Mr. Nehru may also wish to discuss these questions. Indeed he is almost certain to roam over the broad field of Foreign Affairs.

In Ceylon Sir John Kotelawala may explain the Ceylon attitude toward the question of Ceylonese citizens of Indian origin.

In all three countries the question of Colombo Plan assistance will probably come up in a broad context.

Indonesia

Your visit to Indonesia will be brief and we do not expect significant policy questions to be raised there. As you know, southeast Asia is at the farthest corner of the broad Pacific Ocean from Canada and has not been an area of much direct Canadian interest. It is for us today a sort of transitional zone between the Commonwealth countries of South Asia and the nearer Far East countries of the North-west Pacific. Southeast Asia assumes importance because of the wobbly legs on which the new born states there try to stand, the natural resources of the area, the threat of Chinese Communist imperialism, and the intimate concern of the majority of Commonwealth countries in the area.

As the Indonesian Government looks at many of the broad international questions from a point of view substantially similar to India — and, indeed, looks to Mr. Nehru for leadership — many of the observations made above concerning discussions with Indian leaders will be applicable to discussions in Indonesia. You will be aware of the special Australian interest in Indonesia because the archipelago lies across the route of any invasion from Asia. You will also know that the Australians have made common cause with the Dutch in resisting Indonesian efforts to take over Western New Guinea which was formerly a part of the Netherlands East Indies. These are local issues in which we need not become involved.

Netherlands-Indonesian relations are strained. You will recall that during all our efforts in the Security Council in 1948-49 to resolve the Netherlands-Indonesian dispute we sought to balance our recognition of the legitimate aspirations of the Indonesians for self-government with our recognition that the Netherlands could continue to make an important contribution to the development of Indonesia if a satisfactory partnership could be worked out. We regret that the Netherlands-Indonesian Union has not worked out.

The Canadian interest in Indonesia is to see the development of a democratic nation capable of maintaining its military and economic independence and desirous of cooperating with us and our friends in the international community. To this end we are prepared to extend technical assistance to Indonesia under the Colombo Plan and, of course, welcome all forms of cooperation under the aegis of the United Nations. We think that other nearer neighbours have a more direct interest in defence coordination and for that reason turned down an Indonesian request for a Canadian military training mission. We are, of course, keen on the promotion of commercial relations.

Korea

It is difficult to give you advice at this stage regarding the discussion of Korean questions. Events in the coming weeks may outdate current advice. We have tried to bring the brief up to date to the end of January and I think that you will find in it an adequate summary of the positions we have taken on the various issues. We will try to keep Escott Reid in New Delhi up to date on developments likely to come up for discussion in India. Morley Scott will be joining the party in Korea and we will try to ensure that he is brought up to date before he goes over.

Japan

We do not anticipate that any difficult policy questions will be brought up for discussion by the Japanese. We now expect that the Commercial Agreement will be signed before the end of February and we hope that the present misunderstanding concerning the sale of 500,000 tons of U.S. surplus wheat to Japan under Section 550 of the MSA Act will be dealt with before your arrival in Japan.⁷² The only other possible difficult questions that might be raised concern Japanese emigration to Canada⁷³ and clemency for major Japanese war criminals. Both of these matters are adequately covered in the brief.

General Considerations

You are no doubt au fait with current developments as they are known in London, and you will be able to keep abreast of further developments in certain fields by consulting with Heads of Missions as the tour proceeds. We will make suitable arrangements to inform you of other developments on important fields in the course of the tour. We will ask Heads of Missions to inform us particularly of any developments of particular significance to the tour, which occur before you arrive at their posts.

The Minister may wish further instructions sent to you from time to time to supplement this letter. To assist us in keeping our finger on the pulse of the tour, we would be glad if you would send us a summary telegraphic report on leaving each capital and we hope you will not hesitate to raise with us any questions on which you would like our advice.

There are a number of points which you will have to play somewhat by ear. For example, the present draft of the Prime Minister's speech in New Delhi contains two paragraphs referring to the United States. If anti-American feeling is high in India when you arrive, it might be advisable to omit these paragraphs.

Notes for the Prime Minister's guidance on meeting the press on arrival and at press conferences have been prepared, but these can only be informed guesses this far in advance, and you, with the assistance of Heads of Missions, should modify or amplify these as necessary.

You will be supplied with a "political" brief in two copies, with some background material compiled separately. You will also have sets of the programmes by countries with as much detail as we now have regarding arrangements. A copy of the brief and of the programme should be available to the Prime Minister at all times when you are in flight. A copy of the Minister's Handbook will be on the plane, along with some suitable books. The Department of National Defence are providing a separate brief. You will also have, for your own use, a brief on administrative questions which missions might raise with you.

We will suggest to Heads of Missions that they endeavour to arrange conversations with officials whenever your time will allow and the Head of Mission feels this would be appropriate and useful. As you know, however, your first duty is to be available to the Prime Minister and to see that, so far as is humanly possible a continuous record of the substance of his conversations is kept in some way. When the Prime Minister is not inclined to dictate to his secretary we hope that he might, when time allows, chat with you after an interview. You will simply have to use your own judgment in deciding how far you yourself can go in arranging matters this way.

You might wish to keep in mind that when he returns, the Prime Minister will report to Parliament and will probably meet the press. It would assist him and us if material for these purposes were progressively prepared.⁷⁴

In spite of the many responsibilities which this letter suggests you are to carry we hope that the interest of the trip will have its compensations for you.⁷⁵

Yours sincerely,

R.A. MACKAY

⁷⁴ Très peu de documents substantiels sur les entretiens du premier ministre ont été renvoyés à Ottawa. Les hauts fonctionnaires et les ministres ont dû se fier aux comptes rendus des médias pour savoir où en était la tournée de M. Saint-Laurent.

Very few substantial reports on the Prime Minister's discussions were sent back to Ottawa. Officials and ministers relied on public reports for news of St. Laurent's tour.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following from Ritchie, Begins: You will have now received the High Commissioner's telegram No. 87 of February 25th† giving the text of excerpts from the Prime Minister's press conference in particular the excerpts in which Mr. St. Laurent, in answer to a question, expressed in general terms his endorsement of Mr. Nehru's appeal for cease-fire in Indo-China. Mr. St. Laurent was much impressed during our stay in Paris by the fact that continued French involvement in Indo-China was crippling the possibility of French participation in E.D.C. M. Laniel in his expose of Indo-China problem to the Prime Minister spoke in almost despairing tones of the difficulty which the situation there was creating for France and of the impossibility of seeing any way out. In the Prime Minister's talks with Mr. Nehru the subject of Indo-China has only been broached in very general terms and Mr. Nehru made no, repeat no, request for any endorsement of the position he had taken with regard to a cease-fire. The Prime Minister's statement to the press in response to a question therefore was not, repeat not, in any way pre-arranged with the Indians but represented Mr. St. Laurent's conviction that any move which might in the interval between now and the Geneva meeting lead to a cessation of bloodshed and produce a better atmosphere for fruitful negotiation was worthy of support.

2. The French Ambassador here came to see me this afternoon and I explained the Prime Minister's position to him along the above lines. Count Ostorog said he had already cabled his government that in his view the Prime Minister could have made no, repeat no, other reply when this matter was raised at the press conference. He added that he foresaw certain difficulties in the way of Mr. Nehru's proposal. In the first place there was no, repeat no, fixed battle line in Indo-China but a fluid and fluctuating situation in which small scale guerilla initiative played a great part. It was difficult to know whether any central authority controlled these guerilla bands effectively and it would be difficult to organize a cease-fire without a cease-fire line. There was, therefore, plenty of opportunity for bad faith on the part of Ho-Chi-Minh. In the circumstances it would be essential to have firm preliminary guarantee before a cease-fire could be contemplated. Secondly, it was important that there should be no, repeat no, appearance on the part of the French of weakening at this stage lest it should undermine their position at subsequent conference. Thirdly, it had to be remembered that Nehru was not, repeat not, only opposed to the continued presence of the French in Indo-China but also to the Bao-Dai régime and that he would prefer to see Ho-Chi-Minh in power in Indo-China rather than the establishment of the associated state. The Ambassador said that his government was studying the situation but did not, repeat not, propose at this time to make any public statement. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL AND PERSONAL. IMPORTANT.

PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT

Following for Pearson from Reid (in Madras), Begins: The visit to India was an immense success and a personal triumph for Mr. St. Laurent. The mutual affection and respect between the two Prime Ministers deepened. To begin with there was a certain reluctance on both sides to speak openly to each other but as the conversation went on the ice was broken and Mr. Nehru arranged for two unscheduled private talks on the last two days of the visit.

2. Mr. St. Laurent's press conference in New Delhi will long be remembered by press correspondents who were present. It was an extraordinary achievement. He did not, repeat not, ask for notice of questions. He spoke without notes and as fully and frankly as the press correspondents could have desired.

3. Mr. St. Laurent is enjoying his trip. He has told me he has received more "impressions" in the past week than in the whole of his previous life. He is well and is meeting his first taste of warm weather with equanimity. Please tell Madame St. Laurent this and that Mrs. O'Donnell and Dr. Davey are taking the greatest possible care of him. Ends.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN THE TWO PRIME MINISTERS

Mr. St. Laurent had five meetings with Mr. Nehru, dinner at Mr. Nehru's house on February 21st; call on Mr. Nehru at his office in the morning of February 22nd; family dinner with Mr. Nehru February 22nd; discussion before and after lunch

February 24th; one hour's talk before dinner February 25th. At the last two meetings discussions were tête-à-tête.

2. At the first three meetings Mr. Nehru was cordial but he was not, repeat not, willing to speak directly about important issues on foreign policies. He warmed up as the visit proceeded and was forthcoming at the last two meetings.

3. Mr. St. Laurent got the feeling that Mr. Nehru welcomed the opportunity to talk frankly to someone who was sympathetic and willing to try to understand his point of view. Mr. Nehru said that in his opinion so many Americans, such as Mr. Nixon, are so intolerant of the differences of opinion that discussion on such differences is not fruitful. Indeed at one point Mr. Nehru remarked that he could talk to Mr. St. Laurent and other Canadians on an intimate basis which would not be possible with an American.

4. Mr. Nehru spent a good deal of time pointing out his approach to the problem of nationalism in Asia and Africa. In discussing this he said he was not referring to South Africa. Mr. St. Laurent believes he left South Africa out because of a certain delicacy of approach, he considers it improper to try to take advantage of Mr. St. Laurent's presence to argue his case against a fellow member of the Commonwealth. Mr. St. Laurent added, in speaking to me about this, that in any event Mr. Nehru knew his own personal views.

5. Mr. Nehru was extremely critical of French policy in North Africa.

6. So far as Indian minorities in Africa are concerned, he said he asked no more for them than equality of treatment with Africans.

7. Mr. St. Laurent told him that outside India Mr. Nehru's conduct of policy over Kashmir was quite widely regarded as incompatible with the idealistic and pacific principles of which he was spokesman (Mr. St. Laurent had also put this point to Dr. Radhakrishnan). Mr. Nehru said he knew he was accused of being intransigent on Kashmir because he himself was a Kashmiri. This was not true. The idea that the Vale of Kashmir should go to Pakistan merely because it was Muslim was contrary to his whole policy of secular states in India.

8. Some Hindus in India believed Pakistan wanted Kashmir as part of a plan to restore Muslim supremacy over the whole of the subcontinent. Mr. Nehru said that personally he thought this view "preposterous" but it had its root in the history of the sub-continent. If many Indians came to hold this view, communal passions would be aroused in India and efforts would be made to reduce the 40,000,000 Muslims in India to the role of second-class citizens.

9. On the question of military aid to Pakistan, Mr. Nehru said that he was quite sure the Americans were acting in good faith but he was also sure they were making a mistake. The assurances given him that the United States would intervene if Pakistan used arms in aggression against India was like promising to scoop up spilt milk.

10. A separate message has been sent to you on sponsoring the cease-fire in Indo-China⁷⁶ and my immediately following telegram deals with Mr. Nehru's views on ⁷⁶ Non retrouvé./Not located.

French possessions in India. The telegram on Indo-China was written by Ritchie. The Prime Minister has approved this present telegram and telegram on French possessions.

TELEGRAM 97

New Delhi, March 3, 1954

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

DISCUSSION BETWEEN THE TWO PRIME MINISTERS ON FRENCH POSSESSIONS IN INDIA

1. Mr. Nehru told Mr. St. Laurent that the Indians felt strongly about retention of colonial pockets in the sub-continent. The Indians could see no justification for retention of these pockets which was offensive to Indian opinion. Mr. Nehru did not think that the French position in India was of any economic importance to France. Nor was the continuance of French sovereignty necessary to serve the purpose of French culture in India. He was himself anxious to continue and even increase the value of these territories as the center of French culture in India to which the Indians could resort in order to learn more about French culture.

2. Mr. Nehru conveyed the impression that he was prepared, in negotiations with the French on the future of French position in India, to go almost any length in the direction of autonomy for these areas provided Indian sovereignty was recognized. Mr. St. Laurent derived the impression that Mr. Nehru's critical attitude towards French policy in North Africa was in some measure consequential on French insistence on retaining their territory in India.

3. Count Ostrorog, the French Ambassador has asked me to give him information on questions relating to France which came up in conversation between the two Prime Ministers. Mr. St. Laurent has requested that on my return to New Delhi I should see the French Ambassador and open my conversation by referring to his request. I should then make it quite clear that Mr. St. Laurent was not passing on any message to the French Government from Mr. Nehru nor in any way associating himself with the views expressed by Mr. Nehru. I would give the French Ambassador the information set forth above simply as a record of a conversation passed on to the French at their own request. It would obviously be very tricky for us to get involved as a go-between in this matter.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

New Delhi, March 8, 1954

Dear Mike [Pearson],

I got back to Delhi this morning, Monday, March 8, after a very pleasant and interesting five-day stay in Madras. I stayed on after the Prime Minister left on Sunday, February 28. I shall be reporting on my visit to Madras separately in a despatch.

This present letter will supplement my personal telegram to you about the Prime Minister's visit (telegram no. 95 of March 3) and my official telegrams and despatches† on the subject.

As I said in my personal telegram, the Prime Minister's visit to India was an immense success and a personal triumph for him. His dignity, sincerity and obvious pleasure at being in India were all factors in making his visit memorable.

I was naturally worried when I learned his visit to India would coincide with the final moves in the United States negotiations with Pakistan — the public statement in Karachi, the personal message from Mr. Eisenhower to Mr. Nehru,⁷⁷ and the public statement in Washington. This coincidence of course made Mr. St. Laurent's task more difficult. However, it also gave it an immediate value which it might not otherwise have possessed. I think that Mr. St. Laurent's presence tended to distract Mr. Nehru from his worries over the Pakistan agreement. It may have had a sort of sedative effect on him.

It is indeed possible that Mr. Nehru's references to the United States in his public statement on March 1⁷⁸ might have been more bitter if it had not been for Mr. St. Laurent's visit the week before.

The visit has certainly deepened the understanding and friendship between the two Prime Ministers. It has also, I think, strengthened Mr. Nehru's friendly feelings towards Canada and Canadians generally. I am sure you will find that it has had a reciprocal effect on Mr. St. Laurent.

The publicity about the visit and about what Mr. St. Laurent said in India has increased the understanding in India of Canada. I was a bit apprehensive for a while that we had laid on a bit too thick the friendly references to the United States in the Prime Minister's speech to Parliament.⁷⁹ Perhaps I should have recommended to the Prime Minister that while the substance of this part of the speech remained unchanged the length be reduced by about a third. There was, I think, a feeling among many who heard the speech that the references to the United States were too effusive but the Prime Minister's press conference more than counteracted this feeling, in particular the independent line which he took on Chinese representation in the United Nations,⁸⁰ on Indo-China, on Goa, and on colonialism generally.

The Prime Minister's speeches and statements in India taken as a whole have, I think, given a clear picture to the Indian public of the general line of our foreign policy — that while we in general support the same policies that the United States supports, we also are prepared to advocate policies which the United States does not necessarily favour.

For the first two days of the visit I feared that while on the surface things would go well between the two Prime Ministers, they would not get down to the heart to heart talk which I am sure both of them wanted.

At the first meeting between them there was an atmosphere of constraint on both sides. Madeleine O'Donnell, who strikes me as being a shrewd observer, told me that her feeling was that Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Nehru were both counting so much on their private talks that each was shy when they first met. You will recall that we had deliberately arranged two meetings in the first two days at which it was understood that the two Prime Ministers would be alone and that we had also arranged that there should be a family dinner party at Mr. Nehru's house on the second day. The first meeting turned into a dinner party which included Lady Mountbatten who was a guest at the Prime Minister's house. The second had to be called off because Mr. Nehru had to give a speech in the House, and at the third — a family dinner — Mr. Nehru seemed almost to avoid talking to Mr. St. Laurent.

The atmosphere at the family dinner at the Prime Minister's house was not too relaxed. I therefore suggested to Mr. Nehru after dinner that since he had dressed up in your honour he might also do so for Mr. St. Laurent. Mr. Nehru did not need much persuasion and the yellow Ladakh costume with the sort of Tibetan hat which

In response to a reporter's question about Western policy on the recognition of the People's Republic of China, St. Laurent observed that "at the present time it is not the Nationalist Government in Formosa that represents that great mass of humanity . . . I think that we have to be realistic . . . if the people of China are to be represented, they will some day have to be represented by those that they consider the government that represents them in fact." This ambiguous statement, which was interpreted by some observers as foreshadowing a shift in Canadian policy, sparked considerable controversy in Canada. See Canada in World Affairs, 1953-1955, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1959, pp. 114-116 and Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1953-54, Volume III, pp. 2748, 2848-2849.

he put on when you were here and a number of other colourful costumes were brought in for Mr. Nehru to dress in. He became, as he does on such occasions, very gay and boyish. Mr. St. Laurent added to the gaiety by helping Mr. Nehru don his costumes.

Mr. St. Laurent was, by this time, however, feeling disappointed that the projected heart to heart talks showed no sign of taking place. He had had of course interesting brief chats with Mr. Nehru on a host of questions, particularly the problem of nationalism in Asia and Africa. Mr. Chopra, the Chief of Protocol, tells me that Mrs. O'Donnell indicated Mr. St. Laurent's disappointment to him and that as a result Mr. Nehru cancelled two appointments for the next day and proposed to Mr. St. Laurent that instead of the brief tête-à-tête lunch scheduled for Wednesday, Mr. St. Laurent have an hour's private talk with him before lunch and an hour's private talk after and that Mr. St. Laurent's son and daughter come only for lunch. This was done and on this occasion Mr. St. Laurent felt that the talks were really worthwhile. An indication that Mr. Nehru felt the same way was that at dinner at my house that night he urged that we cut short the trip to Agra the next day so that he and Mr. St. Laurent could have another hour's talk before dinner. We of course did this.

In this country, perhaps a little more than in most countries, people with ability and power tend to become arrogant or vain. Mr. St. Laurent is humble and modest and simple. It is, I think, this contrast between Mr. St. Laurent and so many of the people who surround Mr. Nehru that particularly attracts Mr. Nehru to Mr. St. Laurent.

What essential quality it is in Mr. Nehru that so attracts Mr. St. Laurent to him I am not certain. I am fairly certain that one of the facets of Mr. Nehru's character which fascinates Mr. St. Laurent is the way in which Mr. Nehru feels himself as an agent or actor in the great drama of Indian history, the first acts of which were played thousands of years ago. Mr. St. Laurent is probably also as fascinated as other observers by the enigma of Mr. Nehru's mercurial temperament, the boyish enthusiasms, the restless energy, his genuine love and respect for the Indian peasant, his aristocratic temper, the touch of what Charles Ritchie calls the "higher Bloomsbury", and behind it all, a sad, lonely face.

Madeleine O'Donnell's views on Mr. Nehru are interesting. She told me that sometimes she loved him and sometimes she hated him. She hated him during her father's speech to the members of Parliament because he fell asleep during part of his speech. She said that she was sensitive about this since she knew her father was never at his best when he read a speech. I explained to her that Mr. Nehru often, if not indeed usually, looked half-asleep or entirely asleep when other people were giving speeches. I agreed it was rude but the charitable explanation was that he worked about eighteen hours a day and he therefore had to seize every minute he could during the day to relax in. He wasn't actually half-asleep. He was relaxed but alert. She also disliked the way he talked to his servants and to his daughter. Like every woman she believes Mr. Nehru is in dire need of feminine influence.

I hope that when I am seventy-two I shall have one-half of Mr. St. Laurent's ability to receive new impressions. In speaking separately the day before he left India to his daughter, to Charles Ritchie and to myself, he used the same words: "I have received more impressions in the past week than in the whole of my previous life."

He has also said that he is looking forward to his reading about India from now on since his reading will mean so much more to him now that he has seen the country.

As you know better than I, the Prime Minister is usually much more effective when he speaks extempore than when he reads a prepared text. The two prepared speeches, the one to Parliament and the one at the University, he read extremely well, so well that some of the radio listeners thought that the first speech was extempore. The immediate audiences were not, however, much impressed except by Mr. St. Laurent's obvious sincerity, which, I am told, impressed even the Communist members of Parliament. The Indians are so accustomed to their orators speaking extempore, or at least pretending to speak extempore, that they find it strange to have a distinguished visitor reading a speech to them. The speeches by both Prime Ministers at the banquet were too long, and neither was at his best. Mr. St. Laurent had hoped that Mr. Nehru would give him some leads in his speech but they were not forthcoming.

The first really good speech the Prime Minister gave in Delhi was to a group of about seventy Canadians assembled in the patio at the residence. It touched the hearts of everyone and many had to bring out their handkerchiefs. The second good one was to a group of villagers at the end of our morning's tour of villages. Both speeches were given without almost any notice. I had a stenographer present each time to take them down and I used them as the basis for the statement issued at the airport in Madras just before the Prime Minister left India. Indeed this statement consists of little more than extracts from the two extempore speeches. Because of this I think something of the real man got through this statement to the Indian people. I enclose a copy.†

The high point of the visit was the press conference in Delhi. It was a tour de force.

The Prime Minister was good enough to agree to a ten-minute press conference in the lounge at the airport at Madras on his arrival there. This conference also went off extremely well. It was, however, not a question and answer press conference but consisted almost entirely of a statement which Mr. St. Laurent had been thinking over on the plane and about which he talked to Charles Ritchie and myself.

I congratulated Ross Martin at the end of the visit on the ability of all the members of the Prime Minister's party to get on so well with each other. I also said that I had been impressed that none of them, from the Prime Minister down, had ever shown during the visit to India any irritability, even when we were hit by the first real heat in Bombay and Madras.

It was certainly an extremely good group. Ruth [Reid] and I enjoyed meeting them. Charles Ritchie unfortunately had to spend one day in bed — the day of the village tour and the press conference — but he was fascinated with most of what he saw in India. Ross Martin was as ever most helpful and self-effacing. I had some good talks with Dr. Davey about the health problems of the mission and he is reporting fully to Evan Gill on the subject.

Ruth and I were enchanted with Madeleine O'Donnell. She has everything that a Prime Minister's hostess on a trip around the world should have — intelligence, vitality, friendliness, dignity, tact and a sense of responsibility.

For us the visit was a memorable and in many ways a moving experience. Ruth and I are glad it was our good fortune to be in New Delhi when the Prime Minister came.

Yours sincerely,
ESCOTT [REID]

Ottawa, April 12, 1954

Dear Escott [Reid],

I have for some time been anxious to answer your personal and confidential letter of March 8, which provided an interesting footnote to the official reports we had received on the Prime Minister's visit.

As you say, the Indian part of it was outstandingly successful; indeed the whole visit was, and it is sad that a few press statements about recognition of Communist China should have been used here to obscure the really great service that the Prime Minister performed in visiting Asia. You have no doubt read the discussion in the House on this and related matters.⁸¹ It was not a very happy one, but the outcome was reasonably satisfactory. There is no possibility of diplomatic recognition of the Peking régime pending the Geneva Conference, and if the Chinese at that conference behave in an unreasonable and intransigent fashion, the question will be further postponed. However, as you will have gathered, we are not committed to any firm decision in the matter and have, as a Government, far greater freedom of action concerning it than is unfortunately the case in Washington.

I hope that Ruth and you are being able to relax a little from the crowded and busy weeks you have had. I hear nothing but praise from all sides at the way you both handled the visit, and we in the Department are grateful for what you did on this occasion, and, indeed, have been doing ever since you reached New Delhi.

Kindest personal regards.

LETTER NO. K-262

Ottawa, April 12, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT

Mr. and Mrs. Saksena recently had Mr. and Mrs. C.S.A. Ritchie to tea. They talked about the Prime Minister's visit to India. As usual the Saksenas were very friendly but Mr. Saksena made a point of mentioning the Prime Minister's "accolade" to the Americans in his speech to the Indian Members of Parliament. He said that this tribute to the United States, coming at that particular moment in India had produced an unfortunate impression. In his opinion the timing was partly responsible for this. He said that the impression was left in the popular mind that the Prime Minister was in some fashion acting as an emissary for the United States in making these remarks.

2. Mr. Ritchie of course took exception to this interpretation and pointed out to Mr. Saksena that there had been no prior arrangement between the Prime Minister and the United States authorities regarding this passage in his speech. Mr. Ritchie said that the Prime Minister had not been asked to pay such a tribute and that he had spoken from sincere conviction because he had encountered a certain amount of anti-American feeling and felt that, in the interests of friendship, he should try to put before Indian legislators his own view based on long experience of the real character of the American people and of United States foreign policy. Mr. Ritchie hoped that some, at least, of the Prime Minister's hearers had been impressed by what he had said. Mr. Saksena replied that, while the Prime Minister's motives would be understood in official circles, he could only repeat that this passage in the Prime Minister's speech had had an unfortunate effect on public opinion.

3. Mr. Ritchie has remarked to us that, in dealing with Mr. Saksena, it is not always easy to guess whether or not he is acting on instructions, but that he had the impression that someone in New Delhi had suggested to Mr. Saksena that he should raise this question.

4. The manner in which Mr. Saksena raised the question suggests that, if there was such a suggestion from New Delhi, it was of an informal nature. It is also possible that Mr. Saksena raised the point on his own initiative. However this may be, it seems probable that he has exaggerated the extent to which the Prime Minister's remarks about the United States, in the context of his whole speech and of the whole impression which he left in India, have had "an unfortunate effect" on public opinion. You will recall the extreme manner in which Mr. Saksena put forward Indian views on United States military aid to Pakistan. Not long ago we had another example of his capacity for pessimism on this general subject when he told Mr. Ronning at a dinner party he had given in his honour, that relations between the United States and India have reached a pass where, if feelings between the two countries were to get worse, the breaking off of diplomatic relations might be a logical consequence.

5. Undoubtedly the Prime Minister would have had a smoother passage through India if the Indians had not been pre-occupied with the question of United States military aid to Pakistan at the very time for which his visit to India had been planned. The nicety of his position was certainly accentuated by the coincidence of the formal announcement of the aid taking place when he reached New Delhi. We did not expect, however, that either you or Mr. Ritchie would feel that this was sufficient reason for suggesting that the complimentary references to the United States be omitted from his speech. We have gathered, from reading the press clippings you have sent us, that, even before the Prime Minister arrived, there was some talk in New Delhi that he was the latest in a series of emissaries on behalf of the United States. We have also noted that suggestions of this general kind have not been absent from editorial comment on his visit. Such comment, however, seems to have been more than balanced by comment of an appreciative and distinctly friendly character.

6. We did not expect the Prime Minister's visit to generate goodwill by the simple expedient of playing on nothing but what we have in common with India. We anticipated that honest and balanced expressions of the Canadian point of view in general terms combined with clear indications of sympathy with and respect for Indian views, would increase mutual understanding and goodwill between our two countries. We are confident, after reading what you have written about the visit, that the Prime Minister, with his great capacity for inspiring confidence and affection, did accomplish this. Unless we hear from you to the contrary, we do not propose to revise this estimate of the effect of the visit in the light of Mr. Saksena's remarks.

Washington, January 22, 1954

UNITED STATES DEFENCE POLICY

It is safe to assume that whatever Administration took office last January in the United States would have found international and domestic conditions sufficiently changed to warrant a re-examination of the basic premises on which U.S. defence policy had been built since June of 1950. The fact that the re-examination was made by the representatives of a party long unaccustomed to the responsibilities of control of the United States Government, bound by campaign promises to reduce Government expenditure and made up in large part of "hard-money" men, probably made the re-examination more searching and gave greater priority to economic factors that would have been the case had Democratic tenure of office continued. The Republican party which must bear the political consequence of any modifications in the United States defence establishment, is fortunate in having a highly respected soldier in the White House. The voter is less likely to be disturbed at the prospect of changes in the defence establishment carried out under the leadership of President Eisenhower with his long and distinguished military background than might otherwise be the case.

2. The many aspects of United States defence policy which are of interest to the free world make it essential to limit the objective of any single report. I have thought it wise, therefore, to direct our main efforts in this despatch to an attempt to answer one question. Does the "new look" at defence, taken by the Eisenhower Administration and the recently appointed Chiefs of Staff, involve any radical change in United States defence policy and United States grand strategy?

3. We offer the immediate opinion that no radical change in United States defence policy (insofar as United States policy means United States commitments within the structure of collective security) is under consideration, but that there have been and will continue to be over the next few years gradual changes in United States strategy (in the sense of the dictionary definition "the science and art of employing the armed strength of a belligerent . . . to meet the enemy in combat under advantageous conditions"). The case in support of these opinions follows and, while we believe it is a good case, we recognize that it is not incontestable.

4. The circumstances and opinions which are shaping the defence policy of the Eisenhower Administration are numerous, and implicit in the choosing of any number of "governing factors" is the danger of over-simplification of a highly complex subject. Nevertheless I think four such factors among many which can be adduced are of first-rate importance:

(a) the attitude taken by the Administration, not unrelated to the Republican campaign promises for reductions in Government expenditures, that the United States economy cannot maintain in peacetime the levels of defence built up after the outbreak of the Korean war,

(b) the appreciation of the Administration that there has been some slight reduction in world tensions and that the threat of Soviet aggression is not as immediate as it was considered to be for planning purposes during the Truman Administration,

(c) the reports presented to the Chiefs of Staff on the capabilities and availability of nuclear weapons taken together with the decision on the part of the Administration to seek Congressional approval to share with friendly allies certain knowledge concerning the tactical use of nuclear weapons,

(d) the decision taken by the Administration with the concurrence of its highest military advisers to rely on the "deterrent of massive retaliatory power" to a greater degree than on "local defences", i.e. the meeting of aggression on the ground where it occurs.

These factors are all interrelated and it would seem unwise and unnecessary to assign priority to any one of them. They do, however, provide a convenient framework on which to base our general comment.

Defence and the United States Economy

5. The balanced budget became a Republican party slogan in the election campaign. It was good politics and was adopted, we think, for that reason rather than because it was good economics. It was argued that Government expenditures under a Republican Administration would be cut and when, as a result of these cuts, an approximate balance of the budget was achieved it would be possible to reduce taxes. When the Administration took office its campaign promise made sense economically as a means by which inflationary pressures in the nation's economy could be lessened. (With the down-turn of business this argument is less cogent at the moment.) The prospect of tax reduction was attractive to the voter at the time the Administration took office and remains so. Reduction of defence expenditures, the single largest set of expenditures of the United States Government, was the obvious goal. These economic considerations were in the minds of Administration appointees who took over responsibility for United States defence planning. It is reasonable to assume that their view of the world situation as it affected the United States defence programme was to some extent a rationalization of their desire for economy in Government. The same is probably true of their thinking as to what defence load the United States economy could bear. In any event the President and his Cabinet colleagues most concerned with United States defence policy and its cost have from the first days of their tenure of office stressed two ideas. One is that the national defence effort can only be as strong as the nation's economy and the other that the defences of the United States must be geared to the "long pull" rather than to any particular year of crisis.

6. It is tempting to take issue with the statements of responsible Administration officials that the current load of United States defence spending may lead to "practical bankruptcy", for it seems to us that the United States economy could stand much higher defence expenditures than those of the past three years if the world situation demanded them. It must be recognized, however, that whatever the economic facts may be the Administration has chosen its ground and for the purposes of this despatch that is the important fact. It must be admitted, in addition, that no matter what view one takes on the capabilities of the United States economy in time of crisis, there is some justification for the argument that the health of the economy will be affected adversely by excessive defence expenditures over a long period of watchful waiting when no foreseeable crisis is imminent.

7. It is a fact that the armed forces of the United States are to receive reduced appropriations and are to sustain a reduction in personnel. The Army is committed to a reduction by June 1954 of 10 percent from its March 1953 strength of approximately 1.5 million personnel. The Army has been asked to "see what it can do" to achieve a further 10 percent reduction by June 1955 to a personnel complement of approximately 1.2 million. It has also been suggested that the manpower of the Navy and the Marine Corps should be further reduced by June 1955 by approximately 100,000 personnel to levels of 670,000 personnel for the Navy and 207,000 for the Marine Corps. The Air Force on the other hand is to be increased in personnel strength to approximately 970,000 personnel during fiscal year 1955 from a strength currently below the authorized level of 942,000 personnel. The Administration will request of Congress $31 billion of new obligational authority for the military functions of the Defence Department in fiscal 1955 as compared to obligational authority for the current fiscal year of $34.4 billion. The Administration estimates defence spending in fiscal 1955 at $37.6 billion as compared with estimated expenditures in the current fiscal year of $41.5 billion. The Secretary of Defence maintains, and we think with some degree of reason, that these reductions will not cut into the total effective combat strength of the United States armed forces. My own military advisers are of the preliminary opinion that the effects of these reductions, if they are carried out as presently planned, will mean no reduction in the combat effectiveness of the Navy, some possible reduction in the Army's active force (in the neighbourhood of two divisions) and an actual increase in the hitting power of the Air Force. (A brief note on the military implications of the budgetary decisions of the Administration prepared by my service attachés is enclosed.†)

8. Together with these reductions we must consider Mr. Wilson's repeated promise to bring more effective and more economic organization to the Defence Department. He argues, it seems to us soundly, that the inefficiencies of what was a crash defence programme after June 1950, can be removed in a period in which no immediate emergency is being met without damage to United States defence muscle. There have already been cut-backs in procurement contracts and according to Mr. Wilson there has already been applied to continuing contracts more rational and economic planning which will result in the saving of considerable sums of money. A good deal of attention has also been devoted to the need for strengthening the mobilization base. President Eisenhower, in his State of the Union message listed the attainment of a realistic mobilization base with all it involves in stockpiling requirements, industrial capabilities, manpower resources, etc., as one of the most important considerations affecting United States defence planning.¹ The Secretary of Defence has on a number of occasions stressed the importance of maintaining a mobilization base which will be adequate within the economic capabilities of the nation to stand the initial shock of crisis, which will be capable of rapid expansion in the event of the outbreak of a major war and which the nation is capable of sustaining over an indefinite period.

9. I do not believe that the numerous actions taken by the new Administration to reduce defence expenditures represent an attempt by the Administration to get bargain basement defence but rather a decision to ensure the careful shoppers attitude that the most effective use must be made of every defence dollar. The press describes the Administration's objective in the colourful if inelegant phrase, "a bigger bang for a buck". Cost alone is not to my mind the only factor which will guide United States defence planners but on the other hand they will not, under the new Administration, be able to consider a new defence project with the attitude of mind that cost is no object.

Reduction in World Tension

10. It seems to us that the current re-appraisal of United States defence policy has been affected by broad political considerations with almost the same force as it has been by economic considerations. There is evidence that the United States Government does not consider the threat of Soviet aggression to be as immediate as it was taken to be for planning purposes over the last three years. In addition the past year has brought an end to the fighting in Korea and we think it reasonable to assume that United States planners do not believe, barring some unforeseen circumstance, that the war there will be renewed. The presentation of United States views at the last NATO Ministerial meetings on the long-pull concept rather than the year-of-crisis concept of NATO defence planning seems to support our estimate of United States thinking in this respect. There has already been some comment in the United States press that the United States Government is in the process of working out a satisfactory policy to deal with a period of "cold peace". The argument goes something like this: just as the cold war involved warlike moves in various parts of the world without the actual outbreak of a major war, so the cold peace may involve peaceful gestures in various parts of the world without complete removal of the tensions which exist between the free and the Communist worlds. If there is any substance to this argument it stands to reason that modified defence machinery is required. It must be efficient, it must be modern and it must be economic.

11. A further factor in this same context is the recognition that the Soviet Union now has an atomic arsenal. At first glance this might seem to be in direct contrast to what has been said above about United States thinking on the threat of Soviet aggression. However we think that this is not necessarily so. Soviet possession of atomic weapons is simply a new fact which must enter into United States military planning. It does not in itself seem to us to make more imminent or less imminent the possibility of Soviet aggression. It would add to Soviet strength if committed against the West but will not necessarily unleash that strength. However it does impose new conditions on United States planning for the use of its defensive strength which lead to much the same conclusions as those noted above, namely the development of the most efficient and effective defence mechanisms.

Development of New Weapons

12. While the certain knowledge that the Soviet Union possesses the secrets of thermonuclear weapons has shattered many of the theories basic to United States military planning in recent years, the important supposition remains that the United States is well ahead of its potential enemy in its knowledge of and capability to use a variety of atomic weapons of more manageable order than the bomb. In the last analysis, of course, the bombs, atomic and hydrogen, are the backbone of the deterrent power of the United States of which more is to be said below. However, weapons such as the atomic cannon, which, according to President Eisenhower and his senior defence aides, "have assumed almost conventional status", may prove to be an element of United States military strength of almost equal significance to the bombs.

13. We have good reason to believe that it was reports on the capabilities and availability of these new weapons which came to the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff at about the same time as they received instructions to carry out reductions in the service establishments, which enabled them to accept those reductions without serious objection and without pointing out any need to reduce United States commitments throughout the world. They were aware, in addition, that the President himself would be urging Congress to alter restrictive legislation in force in order that some knowledge concerning the tactical use of nuclear weapons could be shared with the United States' allies. It is only logical to assume that a gradual change in basic strategy will result. An opportunity, it seems, has been offered the United States to maintain or even increase its effective fighting strength with more advanced weapons and comparatively fewer personnel. Since manpower is one of the costliest elements in United States defence overhead, significant savings may be possible without any reduction in effective military strength. These two objectives have been given equal prominence by the Administration.

14. It must be remembered, in addition, that these decisions are being taken just as the only shooting war involving United States personnel has ended even though the punctuation mark of peace has not yet been inscribed. It may be a time of peril but it is not a time of emergency in any sense comparable to the crisis period 1950 and 1951. All responsible United States defence officials have made it clear that every available resource of the nation in manpower and commodity will be mobilized to meet the demands of total war if that eventuality occurs. In the present circumstances, however, new weapons in the hands of slightly reduced forces would seem to satisfy those responsible for the nation's security.

15. The inevitable logic of this set of circumstances, it seems to us, will demand decisions sooner or later as to how liberally atomic weapons of "almost conventional status" are to be used. Has a decision been taken to use such weapons in local wars of aggression on the Korean model? We do not believe that such a decision has been taken. On the other hand we tend to the view that no restriction now remains on consideration by the military planners of the possible use of atomic weapons in any critical situation involving the commitment of United States military strength. It is a fact that potential aggressors have been warned of new United States capabilities and should be in no doubt of the peril to themselves in any undue provocation of the United States. Moral considerations (e.g. the public conscience) completely divorced from military necessities will, we think, have an important bearing on any decisions leading to the use of these weapons. For the moment we cannot carry this argument further. Speculation on such a significant development in United States military thinking may be tempting but it cannot be informed without access to the innermost views of the President himself.

United States Retaliatory Power

16. Consideration of the effect of new weapons on United States strategy leads us to the last of the four general factors set out in paragraph 4 above, United States reliance on the deterrent of retaliatory power. This in itself is not new. In the period of United States monopoly of the atomic bomb it represented the only significant strength in the free world counterbalancing the preponderant strength of Soviet land armies. The breaking of that monopoly does not automatically dispose of the United States capability to retaliate against any Soviet attack with devastating power. It does, however, bring the need to add to United States capabilities in this field with a view to off-setting insofar as that is possible the atomic accretions to Soviet power. It is significant, we think, that in spite of the general effort to pare down the size of the United States defence establishment there is to be an actual increase in United States air power. Much of the increase will be in the power of the strategic air arm. At the same time, in the words of President Eisenhower to Congress on January 7, "Military and non-military measures for continental defence must be and are being strengthened". Because of active Canadian participation in joint efforts with the United States to strengthen the defences of the continent, we have detailed knowledge of United States thinking on this score and particularly of the concern felt by responsible United States officials that the greatest strength actual and deterrent, available to the free world may itself be exposed to sneak attack.

17. While it would seem that increasing reliance is to be placed by the United States on nuclear weapons, we cannot ignore the recent emphasis placed by the President and his senior Cabinet members on the need for a mobile strategic reserve of armed strength. In his State of the Union message the President, in dealing with important considerations in U.S. defence planning, said, "Our armed forces must regain maximum mobility of action. Our strategic reserves must be centrally placed and readily deployable to meet sudden aggression against ourselves and our allies". When questioned on the subject at a press conference on January 8, Mr. Wilson replied, "We are thinking more of the United States as the proper location for our strategic reserve". The evident weaknesses in the state of readiness and organization of United States reserve forces has been noted with concern by almost every prominent defence official. Attempts to correct these weaknesses we think should be regarded as actions taken out of normal military prudence and not as indications of a United States intention to withdraw to fortress America. With the majority of its combat forces tied down in Korea and with all that commitment meant in re-enforcement, supply and expenditures, United States strength lost almost any element of flexibility. The enemy knew where United States fighting strength was and what difficulties United States defence chiefs would face in moving it. The object of the Administration now is to change that situation as soon as possible and to create a strategic reserve under the immediate control of national commanders thereby allowing them some lee-way in the choice of methods with which they can meet any new security threats which may arise. Mr. Dulles has described this objective recently as "A selection of military means . . . ready to meet the enemy's many choices" and a break with "the traditional policy of meeting aggression by direct and local opposition". The decision to withdraw two divisions from Korea, we believe, stems from this broader objective and we have Mr. Wilson's words to back us up in this belief. (On the other hand we have no indication that there is to be any similar withdrawal of effective combat forces from the NATO theatre.) We have it on good authority that the United States defence Chiefs do not regard the withdrawal of troops from Korea as in any way reducing the authority of the United Nations forces there since increasing numbers of ROK divisions are to be left with the backing of United States support in the form of naval and air strength. The actions taken in Korea as opposed to what we know of likely United States intentions in Europe give some evidence, we believe, that the United States does not intend to fight a major war in the Far East.

Conclusions

18. We have already stated that the considerations outlined in this despatch lead us to the view that there has been no important change in United States defence policy but that there probably will be gradual changes in United States strategy. We must be somewhat more reserved in our predictions of what these changes will be but it is possible to cite briefly some of the more obvious shifts of emphasis which will affect the planning of United States strategy in the foreseeable future. These seem to us to be the following:

(a) A general tightening up on United States defence expenditures which will mainly affect personnel strengths and administrative overhead.

(b) A greater reliance on new weapons including nuclear weapons shared with friendly allies to compensate for reductions in United States manpower and to offset additions to the Soviet arsenal.

(c) Further strengthening of United States air power and especially of its ability to deliver the atomic goods.

(d) Increased attention to continental defence in co-operation with Canada to protect the main base of the striking power of the free world.

(e) The build-up in the United States of a strategic reserve of trained soldiery and weapons which will be committed to action where the service Chiefs think they will do the most good, not necessarily at the point of actual aggression.

(f) A highly cautious approach to involvement in any further incidents of the Korea type which would result in the commitment to battle of United States ground troops.

19. These changes or shifts of emphasis do not, in our opinion, we repeat, involve any significant change in United States defence commitments. In fact there is some evidence that the United States is willing to assume additional commitments in the Middle East and in South East Asia. All the evidence points to continued support of the NATO collective security effort and it does not appear that combat personnel presently assigned to that area will be reduced. On the other hand United States land forces are unlikely again to be committed in Asia and there may in fact be withdrawals from Asia in addition to those already planned. United States commitments in the Far East, however, will be honoured, according to President Eisenhower, with the help of "highly mobile naval, air and amphibious units with even greater effect than heretofore". Finally United States defence plans assume the early addition to the forces of the free world of German military strength within some federated European Army and if the European Defense Community founders on French opposition we believe that the United States will press for some alternative which will permit formation of German units.

20. The views contained in this despatch have taken shape gradually as a result of discussions within the Embassy and the Joint Staff and with United States officials. They are not related directly either to the President's recent State of the Union message to Congress or to Mr. Dulles' address before the Council on Foreign Relations in New York City on January 12.² However, we believe our analysis is consistent with the views outlined in these two statements, both of which we regard as being especially significant in their indication of the direction which we may assume United States defence planning is to take. We hope to have an opportunity in the near future to have further and more detailed discussion on defence policy with senior United States officials and we shall make every effort to keep you

There is little doubt that far-reaching decisions have been made in Washington in respect of defence policy and strategy. Mr. Dulles' speech on January 12 in New York greatly strengthens this view. It is too soon to come to any conclusion as to the exact nature of these decisions, but it is safe to say that their consequences will be of the greatest importance, not only for the United States but for other countries as well, including Canada.

The implementation of any decisions taken will, of course, be gradual and every effort will be made to act in a way to cause the least possible anxiety among friends and allies. As Mr. Dulles put it in New York:

"It was imperative that change should be accompanied by understanding of our true purposes, sudden and spectacular change had to be avoided. Otherwise there might have been a panic among our friends and miscalculated aggression by our enemies."

There are a good many straws which show the way the defence wind is now blowing in Washington.

One is the fact — clearly demonstrated at the last NATO Council meeting — that NATO countries are no longer subject to American pressure to increase defence expenditures. Indeed, Mr. Dulles now talks about “readjustments in the NATO collective security effort”, and he probably means readjustment downwards, at least in terms of cost for both the United States and its NATO allies.

NATO defence forces in Europe are now to be stabilized at about fifty Divisions, plus whatever Germany can produce. There is no longer any Pentagon talk, at least in public, about ninety or ninety-five or one hundred Divisions as being essential to the defence of peace in Europe. On the other hand, there is much talk of the “new look” and the “long haul”, and economic stability as the foundation for defence effort. All these concepts, the validity of which is unquestioned, are now put forward by Mr. Dulles, specifically at Paris in December and in his New York speech, as a new American discovery and a new NATO policy. The fact is, of course, that they had previously been advocated at NATO meetings by British and other delegates, and opposed by the Americans.

The United States delegates in those earlier days strongly deprecated talk of more defence for less cost by relying on quality and “new weapons”. But all this has now changed. No attempt is now apparently to be made to build up NATO forces in Europe to a point which the American military, at least, considered necessary a year or so ago if Western Europe was to be successfully defended against aggression.

It is true that the Lisbon force goals were recognized generally as being unrealistically high long before the December NATO meeting. Mr. Dulles now confirms the validity of this position. It involves a calculated risk but one perhaps not much greater than was always involved in NATO planning.

This is said, not in criticism of the NATO defence concept of the “long haul”, but merely to support the view that there is now a new approach in Washington to the problems of United States defence policy. Our Embassy in Washington has given its view that no radical change in defence policy (in so far as it means United States commitments within the structure of collective security) is under consideration. I hope they are right, but I feel myself that this conclusion may be too optimistic. Even, however, if there is no fundamental change, the new approach and the new principles of strategy have important implications for not only the United States itself, but for its friends.

These shifts in United States defence policy may be due to a genuine belief in the efficacy of new methods and weapons and of defence by retaliation; also, in part, to a feeling that the crisis has eased. But they may also be due to a new American policy of “disengagement”, inspired by budgetary as well as by strategic considerations. This, at least, is a possibility that cannot be dismissed.

The present position of the European Defence Community may have a bearing on this new American approach. Indeed, it may be that frustration and disappointment over the delay in bringing the E.D.C. into effect is one reason for the shift in policy that is taking place. Alternatively, focusing attention on this delay may be a rationalization of, or even an excuse for, this shift. The Americans may now argue that as Europe will not unite to defend itself, they are relieved of certain responsibilities for that defence which can, in any event, now be left predominantly to the Germans! This being the case, United States strategy should now become peripheral, holding a sea and air line running roughly from Norway to the United Kingdom through Spain and the Mediterranean to Greece and Turkey — and Pakistan? From this line, in case of war, victory by atomic retaliation can be achieved.

More and more stress is being placed on this new doctrine of the prevention of war or, if it comes, the achievement of victory, by developing, to use the words of Mr. Dulles, "massive retaliatory power". As the Secretary of State put it in New York,

"The basic decision was to depend primarily upon a great capacity to retaliate, instantly, by means and at places of our choosing."

This new concept of defence by the threat of swift and effective retaliation is meant to give United States military strength more flexibility. But it also makes flexibility in diplomacy even more necessary. In a sense, it will keep the potential aggressor guessing. But it may also keep the allies of the United States guessing.

Furthermore, it is important to know what Mr. Dulles means by "our" in this context; especially when the "means" would appear to be largely atomic. Certainly this new strategy makes full consultation — being asked rather than being told — more important than ever. The Korean situation in 1950 illustrates this. If the United States had chosen at that time not to work through the United Nations — after they had made up their own minds — but to retaliate instantly by overwhelming air action; or if later they had made the same decision to retaliate against Peking, would they have had time to consult us? Or would we have been involved automatically in action which, at least in the case of Peking, might have led to general war.

It is clear that the new strategy is going to make diplomacy, both in its inter-allied aspect and in relations with the communists, more important than before.

It is also clear that the weapon of overwhelming retaliation, or the threat of it, is one which can only be exercised when the issue is clear-cut and decisive. There will, however, be many blurred and unclear situations constituting aggressive action when it could not be used. Indeed, it can be argued, as a practical proposition, that local aggressions cannot be answered by atomic bombs on Moscow. If so, the threat of massive retaliation "by means and at places of our choosing" may become a somewhat hollow one. The new strategy may result, therefore, in greater rigidity, rather than greater flexibility of policy. If it becomes a question of the atom bomb and all-out war, or nothing, it may be, too often, nothing.

How is this policy of "massive retaliation" to be carried into action? By building up a strategic reserve, featuring atomic weapons and "highly mobile air and amphibious units"?

It is true that there is a large stockpile of atomic bombs and that other atomic weapons are increasing in volume and effectiveness. Indeed this must have made easier the decision to adopt the new strategy. On the other hand, there is to be a reduction of $4 billions in defence expenditure, and 10% in manpower. It is stated that this can be brought about without any weakening of defence strength, or withdrawing from any commitments undertaken in Europe. That remains to be seen.

The announced withdrawal of two Divisions from Korea will also, presumably, assist in forming the strategic reserve.

Furthermore this strategy, of course, may permit a "thinning out" of American forces in Europe; (this has begun but has not yet affected combat strength); and "bringing the boys home", which will be popular in the United States.

Naturally, every effort will be made by the United States to remove fears that commitments for collective defence are going to be weakened, or that there will be extensive or immediate withdrawals from European soil. Indeed, adherence to NATO policies will be re-affirmed. President Eisenhower did, in fact, give such a re-affirmation in his State of the Union speech. There is no reason to believe that this was not genuine, nor is there any evidence that the United States Administration has lost interest in and is withdrawing its support from NATO.

But the implications of the new doctrine do, I believe, make this result possible; and may easily bring about "operation disengagement".

If these changes in American strategy are to be made without abandoning or even weakening the North Atlantic collective arrangements, this will require skill and care in Washington. It will also require an appreciation by Congress of the collective issues involved and the feelings and fears of allies.

If this appreciation is now shown, the new policy may be carried out in such a way that the whole NATO system will be weakened and even disappear. It may be taken for granted that the communists, for whom NATO remains the chief enemy, will interpret and exploit new American defence and strategic developments so as to facilitate this disappearance. They will undoubtedly try to show that the Americans are abandoning NATO and leaving the Europeans to their fate, while themselves taking refuge in atom bombs and continental defence.

Mr. Dulles himself has given some ammunition for this attack when he admitted in New York that one consequence of the new strategy would be less emphasis on "local defensive power". While he added that such local defensive power would always be important, he felt that it alone would never be enough to contain the mighty land army of the communist world.

This is certainly true and has always been accepted by NATO political and military planners. But bringing it out into the open, in the context of the new American strategy, is going to create uneasiness among Europeans and increase fears that the United States may consider that Europe, if not expendable, will have to be defended by its own forces, assisted by overseas weapons, rather than by overseas men. Europeans, in short, will fight in the old-fashioned, bloody, man-to-man way, while victory will come from the skies by atomic retaliation. If such victory comes only after occupation and destruction and liberation, it will have little appeal for Europeans. To this the Americans may well reply that European countries are now strong enough themselves, with some British and American help — but not too much — to hold the Russians off; especially if they will only unite!

Commenting on these European fears, aroused by the new United States strategy, Mr. Wilgress writes from Paris:

"The French and a number of European countries will not accept an arrangement whereby they will be expected to contribute largely manpower while the United States will concentrate on a small highly mobile reserve supplemented by intricate scientific weapons of mass destruction. They will wish to be supplied themselves with these weapons, they will also try to effect such economies as may be compatible with the agreed requirements of effective defence and they will press to have a voice in the shaping of the strategy which will determine the use of such weapons."

While it is too soon to be dogmatic about what the final effect will be of decisions taken in Washington, we shall have to watch their development carefully, especially as they concern our own commitments abroad, and our own defence policies.

Canadian defence policy has been firmly, and rightly, founded on NATO, and we should do everything we can to keep this foundation strong. On the other hand, it is not going to be easy, politically, to maintain at full and unimpaired strength our forces overseas, if our neighbours begin to reduce their commitments through "new decisions" and new strategic concepts.

It may be that the American Administration will not be the only ones who will, before long, have to make an "agonizing reappraisal" of foreign policy.³

*Memorandum of a Conversation with Mr. John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State of United States,
Tuesday, March 16, 1954, Washington D.C.⁴*

Washington, March 18, 1954

I dined alone with Mr. Dulles at his home on Tuesday evening, and had a very friendly and useful discussion with him afterwards for a couple of hours. He was in a very relaxed and confidential mood, and spoke very frankly. He showed no signs of weariness or staleness.

³ Au début de mars, le Canada a exprimé des réserves en privé aux autorités américaines au sujet du "Nouveau Regard". Voir le document 491. Quelques semaines plus tard, M. Pearson a posé des questions en public sur la nouvelle stratégie de Washington. Voir "A Look at the 'New Look'," Text of an Address by Lester B. Pearson, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to the National Press Club, Washington, D.C., March 15, 1954, Statements and Speeches, No. 54/16.

Canadian reservations about the "New Look" were expressed privately to American officials in early March. See Document 491. A few weeks later, Pearson raised some questions about Washington's new strategy in public. See "A Look at the 'New Look'," Text of an Address by Lester B. Pearson, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to the National Press Club, Washington, D.C., March 15, 1954, Statements and Speeches, No. 54/16.

United States Defence Policy

The subject of my Press Club speech came up at once, and he told me that he had read it very carefully and had no quarrel with it. In fact, he felt it was a "helpful effort" to clarify some vitally important issues. He made, however, one reservation. He thought that in the sentence from his January 12 speech which I quoted, I should have singled out also the word "capacity" as the most important of all. He was talking not about retaliation as such, but the "capacity" to retaliate, and he felt that this made a difference. He agreed, however, that "capacity" included not merely military or atomic capacity, but diplomatic and political capacity; that meant consultation and agreement with allies, especially those whose territory and co-operation would be essential for maximum retaliatory effort. In this sense, he agreed that consultation is now more important than ever before.

He also pointed out that the spreading of this "capacity" among various members of the coalition should reassure both the friends of the United States and the potential aggressor, that the "capacity" would never be used for aggressive purposes. Both President Eisenhower and he had already pointed this out at the United Nations. I mentioned that the Prime Minister and I had also emphasized this aspect of coalition policy; namely, that the allies of the United States could certainly act as an effective check on rashness or unwise actions.

Mr. Dulles then went on to point out that his "new doctrine" did not mean instant and overwhelming retaliation in every instance, either by atomic or conventional weapons. It merely meant keeping the enemy guessing as to when, where and how you would strike back once you had convinced him of your ability to do so with overwhelming force. It also embodied a determination not to retaliate by a method of the enemy's choosing, namely, by sending land armies against the overwhelming masses of Asia, where manpower losses meant little.

Mr. Dulles cited Korea as an example. He recalled that at the time of the aggression he thought that United States intervention by land forces was wrong, and he recalled also that General MacArthur had told him at that time that anyone who thought that American troops should be sent to the continent of Asia "should have his head examined." He had since changed his mind on the value and, indeed, the necessity of land intervention in Korea, but thought that we should not forget the lessons of that type of intervention. For this reason, he felt that if the aggression in Korea were renewed, other forms of retaliation, by sea and air, should be used. This did not mean dropping atom bombs on large cities of China; something which would be wrong, morally, politically and strategically, but it did mean air attack, if necessary with atomic weapons, along the Yalu and against Manchurian industries. Similarly, if Chinese troops moved into Indo-China, the best form of retaliation would probably be such things as mining rivers, destroying factories, and sea blockade. What we should be careful to do is to make sure that the Russians know we are determined to react quickly and effectively along the above lines. He did not agree that this would mean converting small wars into world wars.

In Europe he admitted that the situation — strategic and political — was different; the temptation to aggression was greater as the prize was clearer and more important. Therefore, land forces and local defence with Atlantic participation were more important as a deterrent. For this reason, the United States had no intention of weakening its NATO commitments. Furthermore, retaliation against an aggression in this area would probably mean immediate attack by air on Moscow, etc. Of course, if the aggression were a surprise attack on North American territory itself, then there was no political or military problem in so far as this kind of instant retaliation was concerned.

Mr. Dulles agreed that the language of his January 12 speech had been somewhat vague, but as this had precipitated a discussion, he argued that it was not a bad thing. He mentioned that the President, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Defence Council as well as the State Department had participated in its drafting. When he realized that his speech was causing so much attention, some uneasiness and varying interpretations, he wrote a supplementary statement in the form of an article for Foreign Affairs, which came out Tuesday, and a copy of which he gave me.⁵

He ended by assuring me again that they would wish to consult as much as possible with their friends, and they had no intention of weakening on NATO. He added, however, that if EDC failed, he would be gloomy about the future of NATO.

He also mentioned that he had been having difficulties with the army over the "new strategy", as exemplified by General Ridgway's statement of Tuesday to Congress.⁶ The army still were very suspicious that the "new strategy" would weaken them to a point where they would not be able to do what they considered to be still the essential defence job.

In addition to our discussion of the "new strategy", Mr. Dulles brought up other subjects, some of them in response to questions from me.⁷

Berlin Conference

At the Berlin Conference he was impressed by the more conciliatory Russian tone, but also by the fact that this did not mean any change of policy.⁸

He had had one long private conversation with Molotov at dinner, when they talked very frankly together. He had tried to convince the Soviet Foreign Minister that if the Eastern European border states were only given the right to choose their own form of government, the United States not only hopes, but prefers that their resulting relationship to the U.S.S.R. would be that of Finland rather than pre-war Poland. He feared, however, that it was too late now for this because of the fierce hatred of Soviet Russia among the peoples in question, and the deep fear in the Kremlin that any freedom would mean excessive hostility and, therefore, could not be countenanced. Molotov, in fact, had told Dulles that Germany could only be kept disarmed and harmless by rigid control of those in charge of her government. He said that the U.S.S.R. could do this without difficulty by their form of election, etc., and, therefore, there was no danger to them from Germany. The Western approach to the problem, however, would, in Molotov's view, be fatal to security, for Germany would recover and become aggressive again.

Geneva Conference

Dulles said that the United States had agreed to the Geneva Conference on Indo-China reluctantly, on French insistence.⁹ It was certainly the lesser of two evils, because if they had refused Bidault his conference, the French Government would have collapsed, while it is just possible that if it is held, it may do some good work and could, he hoped, be prevented from doing harm.

They had given a good deal of thought to the organization of the Conference, and felt that the Chinese attitude would be the key to what would happen. He was sure that the Chinese were angry with the Russians because they had not brought about a Five Power conference, and that they would insist on some recognition at Geneva of their association with the Big Four, and their differentiation from other members.

Mr. Dulles was very interesting on his views of Russian-Chinese relations — views which were far removed from those which he finds it possible to express in public. He felt that the division between the two countries and their governments was increasing, and that this was natural and, indeed, inevitable. I asked him that if this is true, and I thought it was, how we could best exploit this. He admitted that such exploitation should be our policy, but it was not as easy for him to carry it out as it might be for some others! He quoted, and on seeing my expression of incredulity, repeated that it was entirely accurate, a remark of Molotov to him the evening they had had dinner together, when he told Dulles that he could not for the world understand American Chinese policy, which seemed to be driving the Peking Government "right into our arms".

Dulles was very worried about the position in France, and almost equally worried about that in Italy. In fact, he was discouraged about the whole Western European picture except that from Germany. The French seemed to have no policy and no determination about Indo-China. They had put forward last year to the Americans a military plan (the Navarre plan) which appeared to Washington to be an effective one, and to warrant financial and economic assistance.¹⁰ Then they weakened on its implementation, while in Paris there was no political stability or firmness.

DESPATCH D-830

Ottawa, July 2, 1954

TOP SECRET (FOR CANADIAN EYES ONLY)

Reference: Your Despatches Nos. 142 of Jan. 22, No. 528 of Mar. 22,† No. 610 of April 1, 1954.†

UNITED STATES DEFENCE POLICY AND POSSIBLE IMPLICATIONS
FOR CANADIAN DEFENCE POLICY

Your despatches under reference have been very helpful to us and to the Department of National Defence as well; the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff and the military planners found them especially useful.

2. At the request of the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff the Joint Planning Committee has prepared a synthesis of these despatches and of other speeches and statements such as Admiral Radford's interview with United States News and World Report. The J.P.C. paper, copy of which is attached, was recently approved by the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff.

3. In the first Joint Planning Committee draft which was submitted to the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, para 21 contained, as one separate project which the United States was expected to request, "the establishment of a United States fighter (and possibly strategic bomber) bases in Canada." The Chairman requested that this section be omitted.

4. In reviewing this and other amendments recommended by the Chairman, the Joint Planning Committee did not agree to the deletion. The Air Force member of the Joint Planning Committee informed the committee "that as a result of briefings and conversations at United States Air Defence Command it is evident that future plans in this Command called for the establishment of bases in Canada and that requests for these bases will probably be presented to higher U.S. authorities and eventually to Canada at an appropriate time. The bases in question include Goose Bay, Torbay, Churchill, and possibly, Edmonton." It was for this reason that the J.P.C. felt that the point should not be omitted from the paper, and it was agreed, therefore, to add it as part of section B of para 21.

5. The other changes recommended by the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff and accepted by the Joint Planning Committee were only minor points.

6. It is expected that this paper will be given to the Minister of National Defence prior to the forthcoming visit of Mr. Wilson, the United States Secretary of Defence.

UNITED STATES DEFENCE POLICY AND THE POSSIBLE IMPLICATIONS FOR CANADIAN DEFENCE POLICY

Introduction

The United States has entered two World Wars unprepared. In the face of the threat of Russian aggression which has developed since World War II, the United States is determined that this will not happen again. The purpose of this paper is to attempt to define the direction which U.S. defence policy has taken since the advent of the Republican administration, and to indicate what implications the "New Look" may have on Canadian defence policy.

2. Broadly speaking, U.S. defence policy under the Truman Administration was one of containment of Communist power based on the development of local and U.S. defence forces on the Soviet perimeter. It was a policy based on a principle of collective security through regional alliances and through its membership in the United Nations. Military assistance was sent to Greece and Turkey; mutual defence alliances with nations of South America and the North Atlantic area were established; U.S. forces were committed to the U.N. action in Korea and the defence of Formosa; limited aid was given to Indo-China. In addition to these commitments of U.S. forces and material, the United States embarked on a programme to strengthen its own defence forces, which would not only serve to defend North America, but would also provide a source of reserve power to be used when and where it was considered necessary. In this programme, particular emphasis was given to the expansion of strategic air power, the development of atomic weapons, and the provision of forces for the Korean campaign.

3. When the Eisenhower Administration took office, it was committed to undertake a searching reappraisal of U.S. defence policy, of defence planning and of defence spending. It was assumed that in contrast to the programme of the Truman-Acheson regime a "New Look" would inevitably emerge.

4. Before attempting to describe the defence policy of the Eisenhower Government, it might be helpful to discuss briefly several factors which have helped to shape this "New Look".

The Reason for the "New Look"

5. The Republican campaign for the 1952 election committed the Eisenhower Administration and the Congress to a programme which included promises to reduce Government spending, to cut taxes, and to balance the budget. Reduction of defence expenditures, the largest single item in the budget, was the obvious, and for other reasons such as reducing foreign commitments, the most politically expedient means of carrying out this programme. It was also argued that the U.S. economy could not continue to carry the heavy defence load which had been required for the "crash action" build up, and therefore the defence effort must be spread over a longer period of time and geared to the "long haul".

6. The decision to reduce defence spending was made possible to a large extent by the cessation of hostilities in Korea. In addition, while the United States may not have believed that the potential threat and international tension had lessened, nevertheless it is probable that the administration considered that by 1954 the power of the Communist world had been counter-balanced, at least in some measure, by the increase in the strength of NATO and the willingness of the U.N. to meet aggression with force.

7. Another factor which was used to explain the reduction in defence commitments and defence spending, was the development by the U.S. of tactical and strategic atomic and thermonuclear weapons. These weapons together with effective airpower constituted the real strength of the power to deter aggression, and provided the strategic force required for retaliation by means and at places which the U.S. (and its allies) choose. With this increased capacity to retaliate, the Eisenhower Administration could further justify reduction in defence expenditures.

8. Finally the realization that the Soviet Union had developed thermonuclear weapons and the potential capacity to strike any target in North America, gave the Eisenhower Administration the basis on which to justify their decision to divert more resources to the strengthening of U.S. air power and of continental air defence.

9. It seems clear that the need for a "new" defence policy was dictated largely by the commitment of the Republican Party to rescue the U.S. from the alleged failures and wastefulness of the Truman-Acheson Administration and to cut Government spending by reducing its commitments. It rationalized its new defence policy with the arguments that the U.S., and its allies, must convert to the "long haul" to avert economic exhaustion, that the strength of the allied world now counter-balanced the Soviet threat, thereby reducing the need to continue the crash-action build up. New weapons and air power provided a deterrent threat which would somehow reduce the requirement to commit U.S. forces to meet aggression at any point on the perimeter of the U.S.S.R., and Soviet capabilities now called for the development of increased retaliatory power and stronger continental defences.

10. It would appear that in reality there has been no fundamental change in U.S. defence policy. As President Eisenhower stated, the "New Look" was not new, and, as Mr. Dulles added, the slogan was not a happy one. The Republican Government has assumed all the international obligations which it and previous Administrations have undertaken; it has continued to provide forces, military equipment and economic assistance to its allies on the perimeter of the Communist world; and it has continued to strengthen its own forces, relying heavily on the increasing effectiveness of U.S. air power and the development and availability of weapons of mass destruction.

11. It may be possible at this point to outline more clearly what the "New Look" actually means in practice, and then to define what it may mean for Canada's defence planning.

The Principles of U.S. Defence Policy

12. Within the framework of these general policy considerations, it might be helpful at this point to define more concretely the objectives of U.S. defence planning. In general the U.S. Government must develop and maintain a programme which, without assigning priorities, provides for:

- (a) the defence of the North American continent;
- (b) the reinforcement of the defences of its allies, especially those in NATO;
- (c) the capability of contributing effectively to "local" actions such as in Korea;
- (d) the capacity to retaliate decisively against targets in the homeland of the U.S.S.R.;
- (e) the capability of controlling the high seas.

On the basis of these principles, U.S. defence policy is designed in very general terms to provide substantial offensive forces — air, land, and naval, and effective continental defences. These are the basic elements of the United States' concept of deterrent power. The "crash action" build up of military power over the past several years has produced what Admiral Radford described as "a very high degree of readiness". The U.S. Government has now revised its defence programme with the aim of "providing a sturdy military posture which can be maintained over an extended period"; this is the "long haul" concept.

U.S. Military Programme

13. The principal role of the United States in the strengthening of Allied defence forces is, according to Admiral Radford, "the creation, maintenance and exploitation of modern air power that will be superior to that of any other". This air power will provide defensive, offensive and support requirements for the forces of the alliance. Although reducing numerically its other services, their present striking power will, in fact, be increased through the introduction of new weapons, better equipment and more effective utilization of manpower.

The Role of Atomic and Thermonuclear Weapons

14. In the development of U.S. military power, the use of atomic and thermonuclear weapons which are available for strategic and tactical operations, is of fundamental importance. U.S. strategy is based on the assumption that it has the capacity to retaliate instantly by means and at places of its own choosing. Atomic and thermonuclear weapons may not necessarily be used, but they are now considered a part of the United States' conventional military strength.

U.S. Force Commitments Abroad

15. As implied earlier, the United States' primary commitment of forces abroad is to NATO. In this regard the United States has agreed "to maintain substantial forces of its own in Europe".

16. U.S. policy with regard to committing U.S. forces to the Far East is much less clearly defined. As a general principle "it is not militarily sound", according to Admiral Radford, echoing the views of the President, "to commit indefinitely U.S. land forces to Asia". It will be recalled, however, that the United States very quickly committed troops to the Korean war, and that it has declared its intention of maintaining certain military bases, for example, Okinawa in the Far East. Mr. Dulles has also declared that if the Chinese Communist Army invades Indo-China, it would have "grave consequences which might not be confined to Indo-China". At the present time the United States has announced its intention of reducing its forces in Korea while continuing on the other hand to provide Japan, Korea, and Indo-China and Pakistan with economic and military aid.

Continental Defences

17. It was noted earlier that the U.S. programme was designed to provide forces capable of launching decisive retaliation, to give assistance to its allies, and thirdly, to prepare effective defences on the North American Continent. This third aspect is unquestionably the most important in terms of implications for the Canadian defence programme. Before turning to the specific details of the U.S. defence programme, therefore, it might be well to review the general considerations on which U.S. continental defence policy is based. With this background in mind, it may then be easier to see the implications for Canadian defence policy.

The Principles of Continental Defence

18. The most important aspect of the defence of North America — effective retaliation against the war-making potential of the USSR — has already been considered. Apart from this aspect, the defence of North America requires, in general terms, adequate warning to civil and military authorities and the establishment in depth of early warning systems and defensive weapons — interceptor aircraft, guided missiles and anti-aircraft guns — in positions to destroy invading aircraft. There is also a requirement for a defence against submarine launched guided missiles and against possible enemy lodgements.

The Continental Defence Programme

19. In addition to combined planning through the CUSRPG, PJBD and other agencies, the two countries have cooperated in establishing fully manned radar systems, installations for interceptor aircraft and sites for anti-aircraft weapons. Surveys are now being carried out for a new early warning system, the mid-Canada line, and a third more northerly system is under consideration. The United States is also undertaking certain seaward extensions of the early warning system in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

20. In addition to these projects which are either in operation or in the planning or construction stages, it is probable that the United States may request authority to:

- (a) construct additional early warning radar stations;
- (b) make suitable arrangements for the anti-aircraft cover of certain border points such as Windsor-Detroit, Sault Ste. Marie and Niagara Falls. It is also conceivable that the U.S. may request authority to establish U.S. fighter bases in Canada.

Effect on Canadian Defence Programme

21. The effect of U.S. defence policy on the Canadian defence programme may be:

- (a) the further integration of the air defences of Canada and the United States;
- (b) an increase in the air defence forces of Canada, including fighter aircraft, anti-aircraft and guided missile forces;
- (c) the increase in Canada's participation in continental defence.

Civil Defence

22. One indirect but very important result of the increasing demand for more effective continental defences is, and will continue to be, a demand for more adequate and coordinated civil defence.

Conclusions

23. It was concluded earlier that although there has been no fundamental change in U.S. defence policy, the "New Look" has marked a shift in emphasis in the defence programme. While continuing to fulfil its international commitments, and to strengthen its own forces and capabilities, the Eisenhower Administration has placed added stress on the development of air power, the provision of more adequate continental defences, and preparations for the use of strategic and tactical atomic and thermonuclear weapons. As these policies take shape in concrete programmes, the requirements of continental defence will undoubtedly have a direct effect on Canadian defence policy. As noted above, the Canadian Government may be faced with requirements for additional radar systems, interceptor forces, anti-aircraft and guided missile installations, further integration of air defences in one command, and generally closer measures of cooperation in planning and in defence commands. In general it may be concluded that the demands on Canadian resources — financial, physical and manpower — are likely to be substantially heavier.

Dear Mr. Pearson,

During the last meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence which was held at U.S. Air Force Air Defence Command Headquarters, Colorado Springs, Colorado, the Board was able to acquire a very clear picture of the plans and policies of the USAF Air Defence Command by means of briefings from ADC staff officers and by informal discussions with them.

In the opinion of the Canadian Section, the information thus acquired is of importance to the Canadian Government. We have therefore prepared the attached report. I am also sending copies of this report to Mr. Claxton, the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, the Secretary to the Cabinet, the Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Chairman, Defence Research Board.¹¹

Yours sincerely,

A.G.L. McNAUGHTON

SOME ASPECTS OF UNITED STATES AIR DEFENCE POLICY
AS ENUNCIATED TO THE PJBD BY THE STAFF OF THE USAF
AIR DEFENCE COMMAND, COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO

Introduction

1. The Permanent Joint Board on Defence held its January, 1954 meeting at the Headquarters of the United States Air Force Air Defence Command, Colorado Springs, Colorado. In the course of the visit the Canadian Section of the Board was given a series of presentations by USAF Air Defence Command Staff Officers which together constituted a comprehensive exposition of the views of these officers on the threat to North America, what must be done to meet that threat, and the progress of the technological developments which will affect both air offence and defence during the next few years. The statements made were objective and very frank.

The Threat

2. The Board was given an account in some detail, not only of the USAF Air Defence Command estimate of Soviet capabilities to launch air attacks and the areas of North America which could be reached by such attacks, but also of the methods used in appraising the intelligence information upon which the estimate was based. The briefing on intelligence included a visit to the "Indications Room" and a general discussion of the indicators used and their relative significance. The estimates of Soviet capabilities were essentially the same as given in Canadian-United States agreed intelligence papers, but as one would expect, when making use of these estimates in the development of United States plans, an "insurance factor" was included.

3. In order to demonstrate the destructive capability possessed by an enemy who has the hydrogen bomb, the Board was shown a TOP SECRET film on "OPERATION IVY", the thermonuclear test carried out at Eniwetok in November, 1952. Great emphasis was placed on the fact that this was the first occasion that the film had been shown to persons other than United States citizens. The pictures of the explosion showed clearly the awesome power of the weapon and helped to explain why the United States is so concerned about the problem of air defence.

4. The most important conclusion to be drawn from all the discussions on the threat is that responsible United States officials are firmly of the opinion that the Soviet Union has now, or will have shortly, the capability of launching an atomic attack on North America on a scale sufficient to eliminate this continent as an effective source of resistance to the achievement of Soviet objectives. For this reason, the United States officials assert that even to provide a margin of protection sufficient only to keep our losses to the point where we would have the ability to recuperate and retaliate, the North American air defence system must be greatly expanded and that it is necessary that this be done rapidly.

Meeting the Threat

A. Early Warning

5. The USAF Air Defence Command has associated with it a Joint Air Defence Board which is responsible for carrying out long-range planning studies. The Joint Air Defence Board's concept of early warning covers the whole of the northern hemisphere. Studies now being carried out embrace measures which might be taken to improve the radar systems of friendly countries bordering the Soviet Union and its satellites; the use of airborne early warning in areas adjacent to Russia; the installation of alarm-type radars on merchant ships and civil aircraft which operate in suitable areas; the construction of the far-northern Canadian line and the 55th parallel line; the establishment of the seaward extensions of the early warning system in Canada from Newfoundland to the Azores and from Alaska to Hawaii; and the improvement of the existing heavy radar installations in Canada and the United States by the installation of gap-filling equipment and data transmission and analysis equipment. Some of the above measures, particular those concerned with the North American warning system, are already included in the implementing programmes of the USAF Air Defence Command. Others are at this stage only preliminary proposals for possible implementation at a later date if studies now in progress bear out their value.

6. The U.S. Members of the PJBD have expressed interest in the Observer Corps organization in Northern Canada, and in the provision of effective means for the transmission of reports; also in the possibility of putting alarm-type radar equipment at the northern weather stations and other places where the few suitably qualified personnel required would be available.

B. Engaging the Enemy

7. In addition to the fighter forces in Alaska and Northeast Command (which are not under control of Air Defence Command), there are at present 51 squadrons of interceptor aircraft in the continental United States under Air Defence Command, 41 of which are equipped with all-weather aircraft. The defence programme now accepted by the U.S. Defence Department provides for the expansion of this force to 69 all-weather squadrons by 1955, and ADC planning is now being carried out on the basis of a further increase to 85 - 100 squadrons by 1960. In addition to the forces directly under ADC Command, further support in event of emergency can be provided on a few hours' notice by Tactical and Strategic Air Commands and the U.S. Navy. Ground defences are also being expanded. There are now 61 anti-aircraft battalions, 20 of which will be equipped with the Nike ground-to-air guided missile by the end of 1954. Planning is being carried out by the Anti Aircraft Artillery Command on the basis of 160 - 190 Nike battalions by 1960.

8. An account in some detail was given of the arrangements for co-ordination with the Alaskan and Northeast Air Commands of the United States Air Force, and with the Royal Canadian Air Force Air Defence Command. It was made clear, however, that although these arrangements had been developed to a high standard, they could never, in the view of the United States, be as effective as would a true integration, and the hope was expressed that the day might come when this would be possible. (Presumably if integration were carried out it would mean the establishment of a North American Air Defence Command which would control all air defence forces in both Canada and the United States).

9. On several occasions reference was made to the desirability of increasing the depth of the combat area when the existence of more distant early warning would make this useful. Members of the Canadian Section tried to find out what was meant by this thought and to learn whether there were any plans involving the stationing of fighter forces or the establishment of bases in Canada, but the U.S. officers were not prepared to comment on this.

The Impact of New Weapons

10. The United States Air Force has now under development a supersonic all-weather fighter (the F-102) which will be armed with an air-to-air guided missile. By 1960 the USAF Air Defence Command anticipates that there will be available a ground-to-air missile known as BOMARC, with a range of 250 miles and armed with an atomic warhead. Planning is being carried out on the basis of 3000 BOMARC missiles, to be used initially primarily for defence of the seaward approaches. General Chidlaw, the Commanding General of Air Defence Command told the Canadian Chairman that rapid progress was being made in the development of missiles of this type, and of intercontinental missiles, and he expressed the opinion that there might well be only one more manned fighter developed by the United States after the F-102.

Conclusions

11. The Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence concluded that the combination of formal briefings and informal conversations was definitely planned to convey to the Canadian Section of the PJBD the importance attached by the United States Air Defence Command to the necessity of raising the level of North American air defence to a point which will insure that no Soviet attack will be able to reduce United States and Canadian warmaking capacity below that required to recuperate and retaliate effectively.

12. The features of the presentation which the Canadian Section of the PJBD considers were of most immediate importance to Canada were the expression of U.S. Air Defence Command belief

(a) in the necessity for an early warning line along the Arctic coast from Alaska to Baffin Island in addition to the line along the 55th parallel;

(b) that integration of the North American air defence system is desirable;

(c) that the depth of the "combat area" should be increased. Presumably this would mean fighter or guided missile bases in Canada.

13. In bringing these matters to the attention of those concerned, the Canadian Section of the PJBD is merely reporting the views placed before it by the Commanding General and senior staff officers of the USAF Air Defence Command.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

I have been trying without success for the last two or three weeks to get some information from the RCAF on the progress being made on the fifty-fifth parallel early warning line. However, Dr. Abrams of the Defence Research Board, who is the Head of the Canadian Section of the Scientific Advisory Team, has just come back from a visit to Washington, so I discussed the matter with him.

2. Abrams said that because of A/V/M Miller's view that the RCAF should move very cautiously on this project, and because of the antipathy and distrust in the RCAF Telecommunications Organization of the work of the D.R.B., the RCAF is apparently planning to duplicate a good deal of the work done by the D.R.B. on the experimental link of the McGill Fence Line which has been operating for the past eighteen months between Arnprior and North Bay. Apart from any question of whether this duplication is justified or not, it is clear that it will seriously delay the commencement of the construction of the fifty-fifth parallel line.

3. At the same time as this test programme will be going on, a joint RCAF-USAF team will be working out the operational requirement for the fifty-fifth parallel line. From all indications, the RCAF members of the team will be approaching this task with an "open" mind and without any particular feeling of allegiance to the concept developed in the Military Study Group that the line should be no more than a warning fence and should be very simple. According to Abrams, the United States members of the team will be approaching the problem in the light of the concept that as soon as possible the main interception line should be moved north to the fifty-fifth parallel. To this end, they will be supporting the view that the fifty-fifth parallel line should be based on the "Lincoln" concept, utilizing manned scanning radar. They will argue that this could be done for approximately the same amount as the McGill Fence can be built. Abrams does not believe that this could in fact be done, but the cost of either system is sufficiently uncertain that it would be difficult to refute.

4. Abrams informed me that the oblique hints given to the PJBD at Colorado Springs that the USAF was thinking of increasing the depth of the combat zone were developed in much greater detail at a subsequent meeting between A/V/M James, General Chidlaw, General Myers and General Aitcheson from Alaska. The U.S. plan would involve the replacement in three or four years of the fifty-fifth parallel line by a new type of G.C.I. radar known as Muldar. It is much smaller than existing G.C.I. installations and would incorporate automatic data transmission equipment. While this was being installed, a complex of fighter bases, Bomarc installations, etc., would be built up in the area between the fifty-fifth and forty-ninth parallels to take advantage of the G.C.I. installation. This whole concept is, of course, dependent upon the existence of a more distant early warning line, i.e., Corrode Line. Abrams felt that the Americans would start pushing for the Corrode Line within the next couple of months, probably in the first instance through the M.S.G. He thought that the whole "master plan" would, as usual, be unveiled step by step, but that the period of grace before we were confronted with the problem would be short. To support his beliefs, he told me that he had been given to understand that in calculating requirements for new type radars and for data transmission equipment, the Americans had included estimates of what would be needed for installation in Canada to make the "master plan" possible.

5. Abrams himself was not at the meeting of Air Defence Commanders mentioned above, so the information he gave me on what took place there is second-hand. However, he is arranging to have Dr. Lindsey, who is now stationed at St. Hubert, come to Ottawa on Monday and give me a direct account of the discussions.

6. It is difficult to see just what External Affairs can do to bring these issues into the open. I suggest that as a first step I should attempt to confirm and supplement the information given above by further discussions with officers in the Department of National Defence. If it appears that the story is substantially correct, you might consider suggesting to General Foulkes that you suspect that the "defence in depth" concept referred to in the PJBD Colorado Springs paper is much further advanced than the discussions at Colorado Springs would indicate, and that it might be worthwhile for General Foulkes to ask for the views of the C.A.S. and A/V/M James on this matter.¹²

Dr. Solandt raised the main points here in Chiefs of Staff Committee today. The Chairman said that General Twining and Mr. Douglas when here last week stated categorically that no further requests on Canada were pending. He felt that any such proposals as were mentioned in this memo emanated from enthusiasts and not from the Joint Chiefs. It was mentioned however that our ADC appeared to have heard something along these lines from the U.S. ADC. The C.A.S. was accordingly requested to look into the matter & report. R.A. TELEGRAM WA-397

TOP SECRET

MEETING OF CONSULTATION, MARCH 4, — PUBLIC STATEMENT ON CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Following for the Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: You will remember the discussion at the meeting of consultation with United States authorities on March 4 concerning the desirability of the issuance of a public statement or a press release on the progress of joint Canadian-United States efforts to strengthen the defences of the continent.¹³

2. Our record of the meeting of consultation, which we should be able to send you in the next few days, contains two references to the discussion on this point. The first reads, "The Chairman suggested that the possible issuance of a press release (on continental defence) might be considered by the Canadian and United States authorities." The second reference reads, "The meeting ended with agreement on both sides that no mention of these meetings of consultation should be made in any public statement but that responsible authorities in both countries might be asked to cooperate in the preparation of a draft press release or public statement concerning the progress of installations for continental defence."

3. While a comparison of the Canadian and United States records of the meeting was being made at the State Department on March 9, Raynor informed us of a development which suggests that early attention should be given to the release of some information on the work being done with respect to continental defence. He said that the State Department had received a letter from representative Cole, Chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, asking why more was not being done to improve continental defences.¹⁴ The State Department had been unsuccessful in attempting to convince representative Cole to delay the sending of his letter. Some reply would have to be sent to him in the very near future.

4. No final decision has been reached in the State Department as to what reply should be sent to representative Cole. It is possible, however, that within a day or two a draft of the State Department reply will be shown to us. It is not clear whether the State Department will seek Canadian concurrence to their reply. If that should be the case, we shall consult you before offering any Canadian comments on the letter.

5. Raynor was of the opinion, with which I agree, that the sooner some agreed public announcement is made by the Canadian and United States Governments concerning improvements in continental defence the less difficulties will be caused our governments. No matter what security classification is given to the State Department's reply, the danger always exists of a congressional leak. You may also have some draft statement in mind which you could send us for discussion with United States authorities. Ends.

PUBLIC STATEMENT ON CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Raynor, Director of the State Department's office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs, gave us, late on March 10 a draft of a possible State Department reply to representative Cole's letter mentioned in our telegram under reference. The text of the draft reply is included in a following telegram. In addition, Raynor let us take notes on representative Cole's letter itself and these are contained in a separate following telegram.

2. Raynor emphasized that the draft reply has been cleared only to his level in the State Department. He has reason to believe that it will be satisfactory to the joint chiefs. It has not, however, been seen yet by more senior officers in the State Department or the Department of Defence. The draft, therefore, must be regarded as a preliminary one even though Raynor did not anticipate any serious objection to it by his superiors.

3. Raynor said that because our two governments were cooperating so closely in the joint effort to improve the defences of the continent, and since representative Cole's letter dealt primarily with that joint effort, the State Department thought it was only reasonable and courteous that Canadian comments on the reply be sought. The State Department would like to know whether the Canadian authorities would have any serious objections, either to the substance of the draft reply or to the method of answering representative Cole's query.

4. We said that, of course, the draft would have to be seen in Ottawa before any Canadian comment could be offered on it. We told Raynor that we thought it would be possible to get informal Canadian comments on the draft at the official level but we did not think it likely that the formal concurrence of the Canadian Government would be forthcoming. We expressed the view that you would probably wish to have every precaution taken that the letter sent to representative Cole could not be regarded in any sense as the product of joint authorship. The letter was after all a request by a United States Congressional Representative for information, as to what the United States was doing to advance the cause of better continental defence and concerned the Canadian Government only indirectly. Raynor seemed to appreciate these points.

5. You may be interested in a few of our preliminary comments on the draft reply. In general terms it strikes us that the draft reply is so vaguely phrased as not to constitute too great a problem so far as Canadian interests are concerned. This vagueness leads us to wonder whether representative Cole will be satisfied with a reply along these lines. Even with this general view in mind, we believe certain improvements in the text, from our point of view, could be made. The reference in the last sentence of the fourth paragraph to the attention being given to the more distant early warning line may cause some concern. It may be possible, in addition, to improve on the drafting of the two preceding sentences which deal with the difficulties "in arranging a co-operative project of such magnitude". These sentences suggest problems of principles between governments. Some balance might be added if reference were made to difficulties and delays caused by the purely technical problems which must be solved before any early warning line can be established. In the fifth paragraph reference is made to the possible issuance of a joint public statement by the two governments on the progress in establishing an early warning line. I believe that the references made to this matter in the recent meeting of consultation were in more general terms and not related to any particular warning line. I am not certain, in addition, that in the thought which you have given to this matter you have considered the issuance of a joint statement. You may simply have had in mind an agreed statement.

6. As we suggested in our telegram under reference representative Cole's query seems to us to increase the urgency of some public announcement being made by the Canadian and United States Governments concerning improvements in continental defence. It would obviously be much more desirable that a progress report on Canadian activities be made public by Canadian authorities than through congressional leaks of information. Raynor told us he is certain that Bedell Smith holds the same view.

7. The State Department is under compulsion to reply promptly to congressional enquiries and have, therefore, expressed the hope that we will be able to offer Canadian comment by Monday, March 15, at the latest. I would be grateful, therefore, if you could let us have your instructions as to:

(a) Whether views should be expressed to the State Department on the draft reply to Cole;

(b) If so, what those views should be;

(c) Whether they should be made under conditions, e.g. that no reference be made to any Canadian consultation;

(d) Whether these views should be defined, e.g. as informal and official (without ministerial sanction?).

PUBLIC STATEMENT ON CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

The following is the text of the State Department draft reply to representative Cole, Chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, which is mentioned in our telegram under reference. It bears the State Department security classification "secret". Text begins:

My dear Mr. Cole:

Reference is made to your letter dated March 5, 1954, the receipt of which has been acknowledged by telephone, regarding our negotiations with Canada concerning the establishment of an early warning line for continental defence.

This matter is one which, as you know, has been receiving the constant attention of all the interested departments within the United States Government, with a view to determining what actions may be necessary to improve our continental defense against air attack. The United States is in close and continuous consultation with the Canadian Government on this and on all phases of defense. When the Canadian Prime Minister visited the United States in May of 1953, he explored various proposals with the President.¹⁵ Again when President Eisenhower visited Ottawa in November of 1953 continental defense was foremost amongst the subjects discussed, and complete agreement was reached between the two governments on the need for effective measures against air attack.¹⁶ Since that time I have been giving this matter my close personal attention in various stages of discussion with the Canadians.

The Permanent Joint Board of Defense, United States-Canada, which is the primary organization for the consideration and recommendation of joint measures for the defense of the two countries keeps the progress on this important matter under continuous and searching review.

The cooperation received from the Canadian Government has been prompt and effective. Action has already been initiated by the RCAF and by the USAF which are the agencies of the two governments charged with the responsibility of carrying out the necessary construction and operation of a sub-Arctic early warning line. Preliminary surveys are going forward on the ground and studies are proceeding with all priority with a view to selecting the necessary types of equipment and communications. I may say that all aspects of this important project are going forward with the sense of urgency which they merit, and with all practicable dispatch consistent with orderly planning and sound administration. There are, of course, many problems in arranging a cooperative project of such magnitude where many agencies of two governments are involved. I assure you that these problems are being solved in a spirit of the utmost frankness and harmony, and I am confident that arrangements will be made which are completely satisfactory to both governments. In addition, studies are being pressed forward with respect to a more distant early warning line in the Canadian Arctic. These investigations, designed to determine the feasibility, have not yet been completed.

¹⁶ Voir/See Volume 19, Documents 664-665.

I shall appreciate it if you will maintain the above-mentioned information in confidence for the present in view of the need for security and in the light of our continuing discussions with the Canadians. It is expected that the two governments will in the near future be able to issue a joint public statement, outlining the progress which has been made towards the establishment of an early warning line. I am sure you are already familiar with the extensive radar installations in Canada which have been completed or are in the process of construction under previous agreements with the Canadian Government.

Your interest in writing is much appreciated. I can assure you that this department is fully aware of the necessity and the vital importance of taking necessary measures for continental defense.

Sincerely yours,
Acting Secretary

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Following from Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

1. We agree with your views that the letter sent by the State Department to Representative Cole should not be regarded in any sense as a product of joint authorship.

With the clear understanding that whatever is sent is the responsibility of the State Department, we would offer the following comments.

2. We are concerned about the tone of Representative Cole's letter with respect to the delays which he attributes to negotiations between the two countries. While the State Department's reply attempts to refute this accusation of delay, it still contains the following sentence — "There are, of course, many problems in arranging co-operative matters of such magnitude where many agencies of two Governments are involved". We suggest that the State Department reply might draw attention to the fact that the military recommendation for a Sub-Arctic early warning line was first put forward on October 22, 1953 and that the Canadian Government had agreed and ordered the RCAF to start preliminary work on November 6, 1953. The mention of these dates should completely remove any suggestion that inter-governmental negotiation had delayed the project.

3. The attention of the State Department might also be drawn to the fact that its draft reply to Representative Cole makes no mention of the seaward extensions to the Sub-Arctic line in the Atlantic and the Pacific, and the Airborne radar back-up which greatly strengthens the scope of the seaward extensions to the early warning line. This portion of the project is purely American and could be expedited without any consultation with Canada. Reference might also be made to the fact that in order for the early warning line to meet the air defence requirements of the two countries, it is necessary for the Canadian Sub-Arctic line to be constructed in most difficult terrain where the weather in winter is as extreme as anywhere in the North American continent. It is these difficulties of terrain and weather which are tending to set the pace in the rapid construction of the line. There are no roads and the sites are accessible only by caterpillar tractor trains and by helicopters. The temperatures are such that the reconnaissance parties must be limited to men who have had experience in operating in this kind of climate. Since November 6, 1953, when the project was accepted and commenced by Canada, the aerial photography has been completed, and by June 1, 1954 most of the line will have been reconnoitred and the sites selected. Actual construction and installation will commence later this year.

4. If the reply is to refer to the distant early warning line, we think that it should be made clear that it is a purely United States project (not a joint one), that it is experimental, and that the cooperation which the Canadian Government was asked to give was in fact given without delay. End of comments.

5. You may recall that I made a statement on continental defence in the House of Commons beginning on page 363 of Hansard, on November 26, 1953. The more important parts of this begin at the bottom of the right-hand column on page 364 and continues on the left-hand column on page 365. This had been cleared with the State Department. It should be added that on several other occasions here, it had been made plain that in deciding to commence work and in actually commencing work, our Government took the initiative.

6. We shall inform you in a separate telegram of the situation with respect to the possibility of issuing a joint or agreed public statement on the subject of continental defence.

7. Please express to the officials of the State Department our appreciation for being taken into their confidence.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Following from Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

1. The understandable desire of the State Department to reply to Mr. Cole at an early date must inevitably be related to the consideration of the proposed joint or agreed statement on the subject of Continental Defence. The understanding between General Foulkes and Admiral Radford at their meeting on March 4 was that Foulkes would prepare a draft and forward this to Radford for consideration. It seems to us here that there is a great deal to be said in favour of issuing a public statement at about the time of the reply to Cole. In any event I would think that any reply to Cole would take into account the terms of a draft public statement if they were available at the time of the final preparation of the reply to Cole.

2. There is another aspect to be considered in settling the timing. If the letter to Cole should leak to the press, it might do considerable harm by confusing public understanding in both countries. This eventuality would be safeguarded if an official public statement had been issued at the same time by the two governments.

3. Consequently I think there is much to be said for presenting the draft of an agreed public statement to the State Department and Radford before the reply to Cole is sent. If this is done, the State Department and the Pentagon might feel that there is a good deal to be said for agreeing on the public statement and issuing it either before or at the time of the reply to Cole.

4. Accordingly we have prepared a preliminary draft of a possible public statement and this is contained in the immediately following telegram. The draft, as originally prepared by Foulkes, has been revised by me and discussed with MacKay and General McNaughton. The draft as finally worked out would be subject to final approval by the Ministers concerned if not the Cabinet.

5. I suggest that you do the following as quickly as possible:

(a) Give the draft to the State Department and ask DeWolf to give it to Radford, making it clear that the draft (or indeed the question of whether there is to be any public statement) has not (not) yet been decided by the Canadian Government.

(b) Without delaying action on (a), please discuss the draft with Mr. Pearson who will perhaps wish to discuss it with Mr. Howe.

6. If it should be decided, as I hope, to have an agreed public statement next week by both Governments, it would of course take the form in Ottawa of a statement in Parliament. Ends.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Following is text of draft public statement, begins:

North American Air Defences

1. The Canadian and United States Governments have for some time now been appraising our air defence system to define the steps required to strengthen our defences in the light of recent advances in the destructive capabilities of atomic weapons against targets in our two countries.

2. Long before the existing radar control and warning chain in Canada (known as the PINETREE chain) was approaching completion, the two countries were engaged in the intensive study of what further steps might be desirable and practicable. In 1953, a team of Service and scientific advisers representing both countries recommended that additional early warning be provided by the establishment of a new radar system generally to the north of the settled territory in Canada.

3. The report of this team was considered by the Chiefs of Staff of each country during the month of October 1953. At a meeting in Washington early in November, the Canadian representatives informed the United States authorities that the Canadian Government was prepared to proceed immediately with the necessary surveys and siting for the proposed new early-warning radar system.¹⁷ This work is already well advanced and the reconnaissance and siting will in the main be completed in June 1954. Construction will commence later this year.

4. There are many difficult problems to be solved in establishing this early warning system in the Canadian North. The system will extend over more than 5,000 miles and its survey will involve the examination of a great number of possible sites. Much of the ground is inaccessible except by tractor train and helicopter. In many areas extreme temperatures are confronted for several months of the year. Many technical problems, including the interference of the auroral belt with electronic devices, have had to be overcome. To avoid stationing large numbers of men in this difficult country the system is being designed to operate with as few men as possible. In overcoming these problems the U.S. Air Force is working closely with the RCAF.

5. At the same time the United States Government is working on the extension of the warning system to the seaward approaches in the northeastern and northwestern sectors of the system. The Alaska and Greenland radar systems are coordinated with those in Canada and the continental United States, and the development of radar-equipped picket ships and airborne radar is well advanced.

6. In these matters the two governments are working in the closest cooperation so that the resulting system will best serve the needs of both countries in their common defence. End of draft.

7. Following for Glazebrook. This draft has not yet been checked finally by Mr. Claxton, but we are putting it on the wire now as Mr. Claxton will not be available until this evening. MacKay will telephone you not later than noon Sunday if any changes are required.

PUBLIC STATEMENT ON CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Following for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, Begins: Mr. Pearson has had an opportunity to study the draft statement concerning continental defence which was dealt with in your telegrams under reference and has suggested that action might be delayed on those telegrams until he has had an opportunity to have a word with you. In general he believes that a somewhat more comprehensive statement than that contained in EX-404 of March 13 might be desirable.

2. Mr. Pearson has suggested in addition that we might indicate to the State Department our view that no reference to a possible joint Canada-U.S. statement be made in the reply to Representative Cole (WA-413 of March 11). If the State Department's letter to Representative Cole becomes public knowledge, as it may very well do, Mr. Pearson believes it would be unfortunate if the impression were created that a joint statement by the two governments was occasioned by a Congressional letter on one aspect alone of our joint efforts to improve the defences of the continent.

Following for Pearson from Claxton, Begins: What we here thought was important was that we should get into U.S. hands a draft of the proposed statement before they sent a reply to Mr. Cole so that they could see our view of what should be said. Even if this was not followed closely it would probably be taken into account in their reply. This seemed to me to be the best way to get across to them just how inadequate their reply was without putting ourselves in the position of expressly commenting on it.

Here this seemed to us to be a matter of great importance and extreme urgency as it would be most unfortunate if a reply was sent to Mr. Cole along the lines of the draft and this subsequently leaked out. This would certainly lead to our being asked questions here. I would think it would be a good thing to warn the Americans of this possibility and to indicate to them that if we were asked we would make a reply along the lines of our draft, subject to such modifications as they might suggest and we might accept.

It was not my thought that the reply to Mr. Cole would refer to the statement. I don't see that it would matter very much if people did link up the two. The fact that Mr. Cole had made an inquiry had indicated to us the desirability of making immediately a statement which had been under consideration for some time. Ends.

PUBLIC STATEMENT ON CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Copies of the most recent exchange of telegrams with Ottawa concerning our comments on a State Department reply to Representative Cole are attached for your information (WA-440 of March 15, EX-413 of March 13 and WA-447 of March 15). We are satisfied that in speaking to Raynor yesterday, March 15, about the Cole letter we made the point dealt with in Mr. Claxton's message to you (EX-413). You will remember that it was your suggestion that we might use the material in Ottawa's draft of a possible public statement as a basis for our comments on the Cole letter.

2. In the course of the discussion with Raynor the parallel question of a public statement on continental defence came up. One of the first points discussed was how comprehensive such a public statement should be. Raynor said that it was clear to him from studying the record of the recent meeting of consultation that both Bedell Smith and Admiral Radford were in favour of some public statement on continental defence, the objective of which would be to off-set criticisms (especially those inspired by civil defence authorities seeking increased appropriation) that not enough was being done in this vital field. Raynor was certain, therefore, that at a high level in both the State Department and the services there was support for issuance of some public statement on continental defence, but he was not certain that much detailed thought had been given to how comprehensive it should be. Horsey from the Canadian Desk, who was also present said that he thought what was normally an unimportant problem of semantics might assume greater importance if a joint or agreed statement were to be issued by the two Governments. When United States authorities speak of "continental defence" they mean literally defence of the continental United States and all that that involves and not merely the early warning systems to be installed in Canada. "Continental defence" for them, in other words, covers almost all aspects of United States defence policy except United States overseas commitments. A United States public announcement, therefore, covering continental defence might include reference to projects which were purely American. After some discussion of this point we did agree, however, that there were a good many projects in addition to the mid-Canada early warning line which were of joint Canadian-United States concern in the defence of the continent. I suggested that even a purely American project such as the seaward extensions of the early warning line was so closely related to the mid-Canada line that reference to it might properly be included in any agreed release of information by the two countries. Raynor said that consultations between various agencies of the Administration including reference to the White House would be necessary if anything like the kind of statement we were discussing was to be prepared and he indicated that this kind of consultation could not be completed in a few days. Until he had explored thinking in his own Department a little more fully he could offer no definite opinion as to what the United States Government's attitude would be. He promised to follow the matter up, however, since it was his impression from the recent meeting of consultation that United States interest in a statement of some kind as expressed by Smith and Radford was probably as great as was the Canadian interest. In answer to his question as to which we preferred, a joint or an agreed statement, I said that there were indications that we would prefer an agreed statement and that in all likelihood we would wish to make any such release in the form of a statement by the responsible Minister in the House.

3. Raynor said that he was certain that in view of the opinions expressed at the recent meeting of consultation the desire of both Governments was to supply as much information as possible to the public on the progress of the build-up of continental defences. If this was the case it seemed only reasonable that the agreed release should be as detailed as military security would allow and should fit the particular early warning projects into the perspective of the total defence efforts of the two countries. It should, among other things, be one contribution to the United States effort to convince its European allies that a prudent build-up of the defences of the continent did not signify a return to isolationism by the United States Government. Both State Department representatives referred to the relevant passages of your speech at the Press Club in this context.

4. While it may take some time to clear a comprehensive statement through the labyrinth of interested United States agencies, the end result would, in our opinion, be much more useful than a restricted statement along the line of the draft contained in Ottawa's telegram EX-404 of March 13.¹⁸ If it would have the support of Smith and Radford, as we think it would from the views expressed at the recent meeting of consultation, the time required for clearance might well be reduced. Mr. Glazebrook has seen this memorandum.

LETTER NO. 550

Washington, March 25, 1954

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE — REPLY TO LETTER FROM REPRESENTATIVE COLE

Raynor gave us on March 24 a copy of the State Department's reply to the letter of March 5 from the Chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy in which Representative Cole asked for a report on the status of United States negotiations with Canada on the establishment of an early warning line for continental defence. Raynor also gave us a copy of Cole's letter, excerpts from which were included in our telegram WA-414 of March 11.† Copies of the two letters are attached.¹⁹ You will note that the State Department letter is classified "secret".

2. The State Department reply is, we believe, much better than the draft reply which was shown to us earlier, the text of which was included in our telegram WA-413 of March 11. Most of the suggestions which we made have been taken into account. The technical difficulties which stand in the way of the establishment of an early warning line have been stressed. The unfortunate phrasing of the first draft which gave the impression that problems of principle existed between the United States and Canadian Governments has been excised. The Canadian Government's co-operation in joint continental defence efforts is labelled "prompt and effective". (Cole's letter gave the impression that what was probably needed was some arm twisting by the United States to speed up Canadian co-operation.) The reply puts the proposed more distant early warning line in proper perspective, emphasizing the experimental nature of the project and indicating clearly that further negotiations with Canada will be necessary if a United States decision is taken to establish the line. We had suggested that some more detailed attention might be given in the reply to the radar installations in Canada which have already been completed under previous agreements. The State Department, however, was content to cover this in a single sentence. Mr. Pearson's suggestion that it might be wise to make no mention in the reply of the possibility of the issuance of an agreed public statement by the two Governments on continental defence was accepted by the State Department. Finally and possibly of most importance there is no suggestion in the letter that it was drafted with the assistance of the Canadian Government. In no sense could we be held responsible for any of the views set out in the reply.

3. There is still some question in our minds as to whether the State Department reply will satisfy Representative Cole since it remains a pretty vague answer to his inquiry. However there is not much point in anticipating difficulties before they arise and, from our experience in this instance, I believe we may feel fairly confident, that if any further substantive exchange with Representative Cole becomes necessary the State Department will give us an opportunity to comment.

PUBLIC STATEMENT ON CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

The draft statement sent you previously has been revised and is now approved by the Minister. In view of the announcement that the United States authorities intend to release the film showing an atomic explosion, it is now felt that we should proceed with issuing a joint statement. Although the Minister felt previously that the statement was rather limited in that it covered only radar defence, he now agrees that this is the phase which should be emphasized since the release of the film is likely to give rise to enquiries about progress on radar defence in the North.

2. Since the proposal to issue a statement was discussed between General Foulkes and Admiral Radford, General Foulkes requests that Admiral DeWolf clear the statement with Admiral Radford if possible. Please make clear to the State Department and Admiral Radford that although the draft has been seen by our Minister and the Minister of National Defence it would probably require full Cabinet approval here. We would not propose to proceed further at this end until we receive comments or redraft from Washington.

3. Would you also discuss with the American authorities the timing of the release. We would prefer that it be released before the film is released to the public. Presumably the release of the statement here would take the form of a statement in Parliament.

PUBLIC STATEMENT ON CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

My immediately preceding telegram.

Following is our draft text of the proposed public statement.

Text begins.

Because of the possibility of aggressive air attacks against North America, the Canadian and United States Governments after the second World War continued the cooperative arrangements for the defence of North America which had been brought into effect during the war. Since that time, there have been established in both countries fully manned radar screens for the detection of a potential enemy, and installations for interceptor aircraft and anti-aircraft weapons. At all stages, planning has been carried on between the two countries on a joint basis.

2. For some time now, the Canadian and United States Governments have been appraising the air defence system to define the steps required to strengthen our defences in the light of recent advances in the destructive capabilities of atomic weapons against targets in our two countries.

3. For the past four years, work has been going on at high priority on the construction of a large and costly radar chain which is required not only to detect enemy bombers but also to control fighter aircraft engaged in the task of interception. This radar chain is known as the Pinetree Chain.

4. Long before the Pinetree project was approaching completion, the military planners of the two countries were engaged in an intensive study of what further steps might be desirable and practicable. In October 1953, a team of military and scientific advisers representing both countries recommended that additional early warning should be provided by the establishment of a further radar system generally to the north of the settled territory in Canada. The report of this team was considered by the Chiefs of Staff of each country later that same month. At a meeting in Washington in November 1953, the Canadian representatives informed the United States authorities that the Canadian Government was prepared to proceed immediately with the necessary surveys and siting for the proposed new early warning radar system. This work is already well advanced and the reconnaissance and siting will, in the main, be completed in June 1954. Construction will commence later this year.

5. There are many difficult problems to be solved in establishing this additional early warning system in the Canadian north. The system will extend over 5,000 miles and its survey will involve the examination of a great number of possible sites. Much of the ground is inaccessible except by tractor train and helicopter. In many areas, extreme temperatures are confronted for several months of the year. Many technical problems, including the interference of the auroral belt with electronic devices, have had to be overcome. To avoid stationing large numbers of men in this difficult country, the system is being designed to operate with as few men as possible. In overcoming the various technical problems involved the United States Air Force is working closely with the Royal Canadian Air Force.

6. It is obviously just as important to have early warning of aircraft approaching target areas in North America from over the sea as from over Northern Canada. For this reason, the United States Government is working on the formidable task of extending the early warning barrier across the north-eastern and north-western seaward approaches to North America. The Alaska and Greenland radar systems are coordinated with those in Canada and the continental United States, and the development of airborne radar is well advanced.

7. In addition to these measures of common concern, both countries are working continuously to improve the air defence installations in the vicinity of the major target areas. Here too, cooperation between the United States and Canadian air defence commanders is close, and unidentified aircraft are investigated by the most immediately available interceptor force, whether Canadian or American.

8. The defence of North America is part of the defence of the North Atlantic region to which both Canada and the United States are pledged as signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty. Thus, the cooperative arrangements for the defence of this continent and for the participation of Canadian and United States forces in the defence of Europe are simply two sides of the same coin, two parts of a world-wide objective, to preserve peace and to defend freedom.

PROPOSED JOINT STATEMENT ON CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

This morning I saw Bedell Smith and he expressed his whole-hearted agreement with the proposal to issue in the immediate future a joint statement. He had not previously gone over our draft, but after glancing at it said he thought it was admirable; it occurred to him that the addition of a reference to "constant" and "satisfactory" consultation on this subject "at all levels" would be useful.

2. Bedell Smith will speak to the secretary and to Radford this morning and will try to let me have clearance on Monday morning so that if you wish, the statement may be made in the House of Commons on Monday afternoon, April 5th. Knowing the usual delays which attend such matters, I would not count on an agreed text being cleared by that time. On the other hand, it is just possible that we will be ready because of Bedell Smith's own personal interest in this subject.²⁰

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE — RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE MILITARY STUDY GROUP (MSG)

The MSG has just concluded an important meeting and is submitting new recommendations to the Chiefs of Staff of the United States and Canada.

2. Annexed is the report prepared by Mr. Barton, our observer on the MSG. In order to put the new recommendations in perspective, he has in this report summarized the earlier recommendations and decisions.

3. It is apparent that many important decisions will soon be sought from Cabinet by the Chiefs of Staff. Would you consider it desirable to have the report discussed at a meeting in your office with appropriate officers of this Department?²¹

4. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources will be one of the Departments vitally concerned with the new recommendations. However, it would not be appropriate for the Department of External Affairs, at this stage, to inform Northern Affairs or any other Department of the MSG recommendations because the MSG reports to Chiefs of Staff, who in turn report to their Minister and the Government.

[Ottawa], June 4, 1954

REPORT BY THE EXTERNAL AFFAIRS OBSERVER
ON THE CANADA-UNITED STATES MILITARY STUDY GROUP

It will be recalled that when the Canadian Government, in February 1953, authorized the United States Government to carry out the Arctic radar experimental project then known as COUNTERCHANGE (later known as CORRODE, and currently called Project 572), it stipulated that there should be established a Canada-United States Military Study Group (MSG) which was to "study those aspects of the North American Air Defence system in general, and the early warning system in particular, which are of mutual concern to the two countries".²² The MSG is assisted by a Canada-United States Scientific Advisory Team, which is usually referred to with aptness as CUSSAT.

2. The MSG commenced its studies during the summer of 1953 and in October of that year produced an interim report recommending that there be established at the earliest practicable date an early warning line located generally along the 55th parallel between Alaska and Newfoundland.²³ The purpose of this line, which is generally referred to as the "Mid-Canada Line", is to provide tactical early warning for the deployment of active air defence forces. Both the RCAF and the USAF Air Defence Commands consider this line to be essential to the effective utilization of their main radar installations and interceptor forces.

3. After considering the MSG report of October, 1953, the Canadian Government, in November, 1953 agreed that the Mid-Canada Line should be established, that the RCAF, in consultation with the USAF, should carry out a detailed survey of the line, and that Canada should undertake the planning and construction of the line without prejudice to a later decision on the division of costs.²⁴

4. Immediately thereafter an RCAF-USAF team was set up to carry out the necessary surveys and engineering studies and to make a more precise estimate of the costs. This team was to have completed its work by June 1, 1954, but it is understood that it has submitted an interim report indicating that it will not be finished until September 1954. It is also understood that the interim report indicates that contrary to expectations that the line might be built by the end of 1956, an additional year will be required. The provisional cost estimates range from $100 million to $200 million, depending upon a number of factors which have yet to be resolved. We have learned unofficially that the would-be users of the line, both Canadian and American, are very concerned at this development, and that the U.S. Government may make representations at a high level to see if anything can be done to speed the project. (The Air Defence Commands feel that the high cost estimates indicate that the engineers are designing a system which is too "sophisticated", and that this is one of the principal causes for the undesirable time lag.)

5. In the meantime the MSG has continued its study of the general problem of early warning, and in particular the necessity for and value of a distant early warning line across the Canadian Arctic. The concept upon which both U.S. and Canadian air defence plans are based is that the settled part of the continent, and particularly the major target areas, are blanketed with the heavy radar necessary to control active interceptor forces. On the periphery of this main defence area is a tactical early warning line at a distance scientifically calculated to enable fighters to get airborne and intercept an unknown aircraft at the forward edge of the main radar zone. The Mid-Canada Line forms part of this tactical early warning system. The United States, for its part, has already started on the establishment of a ship and airborne radar line down both coasts of the United States, about 150 miles off shore.

6. The warning system described above, essential though it be for active air defence measures, is quite inadequate to meet the needs of the Strategic Air Command, the other military services, and civil defence. For this purpose, a distant early warning line to give the maximum possible notice of attack is required. The United States has already embarked on a plan to provide the seaward elements of this distant early warning line by establishing at enormous cost combined ship and airborne radar lines from Argentia to the Azores and from Kodiak to Hawaii. As an indication of the scale of this project, the number of Super-Constellation aircraft required for the Argentia-Azores line will be forty. Eleven of these will be in the air at all times. Eighty of these aircraft will be used on the Kodiak-Hawaii line.

7. From Argentia, up the Newfoundland and Labrador coasts to Frobisher, the distant early warning line is provided by the radars already built under the Pinetree Agreement. On the West coast, the Alaska Radar system will cover the Arctic approaches from Kodiak to Barter Island. It is the gap between Barter Island to Frobisher that the United States is anxious to close as quickly as possible.

8. The Military Study Group, after consideration of agreed intelligence estimates, the preliminary reports on Project 572, and studies carried out by CUSSAT, could not escape the conclusion that there was a need for the establishment of the Canadian Arctic segment of the distant early warning line, and that in view of the time which would be required to overcome the many problems involved, a start should be made at once. The Group was dissatisfied with the Frobisher-Argentia-Azores element of the line and directed CUSSAT to study the pros and cons of a line from Frobisher to Greenland and Iceland instead. It was agreed, however, that this did not affect the need to get on with the work in the Canadian Arctic.

9. The MSG, at a meeting held on June 2 and 3, 1954, therefore recommended to the Chiefs of Staff of the two countries that:

(a) The two Governments agree in principle to the need for the establishment of a distant early warning line across the most northerly practicable part of North America;

(b) mutually acceptable military characteristics be developed for such a line;

(c) appropriate system studies be initiated for the purpose of developing detailed recommendations on the specifications, types of equipment, overall system composition, cost estimates, manpower requirements and the exact location of such a line. (A guess-estimate of the cost is between $100 and $200 million.)

10. It can be expected that the United States Government will at once press for the adoption by the two governments of these recommendations. In fact the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Research and Development (Mr. Donald Quarles) is to be in Ottawa on June 11, and it is understood that he intends to discuss the matter with Dr. Solandt.

11. Assuming that the Canadian Government is prepared to approve in principle the MSG recommendation, it will be necessary to resolve a number of questions before reaching a decision as to the form of agreement with the United States. If it were decided that Canada should build the Mid-Canada Line and the United States should build the Distant Early Warning Line, then Canadian participation in the studies proposed in the MSG recommendation would be minimal. Such a policy would have the merit of being simple and no doubt would appeal to the RCAF, which is concerned about the rapid increase in the size of its continental defence commitments. It is understood that the Minister of Defence Production also favours this solution.

12. An alternative proposal which may commend itself would be to consider both lines as part of a single system, the costs of which would be shared on an agreed basis. The surveys and construction could be carried out under the supervision of a joint Canada-United States "task force" under command of a Canadian officer. Canada would be responsible for accounting and both countries would advance funds for construction in accordance with the agreed cost-sharing formula. In due course similar arrangements could be made for manning and operation of the two lines. Such a proposal has obvious political attractions and would strengthen Canadian operational control over the system. At the same time, it would ensure that the participation of the United States Government was on a scale sufficient to avoid recriminations as to the adequacy of the system in the event of penetration by an enemy force.

13. It is probable that unless the Department of External Affairs makes immediate efforts to interest the other departments concerned in the proposal outlined in paragraph 12, the end result will be that Canada will build and operate the Mid-Canada Line and the United States will build and operate the DEW line.²⁵

I refer to my memorandum to you dated June 4, 1954, forwarding the report of the External Affairs Observer on the Canada-United States Military Study Group concerning the recommendations of the MSG that:

(a) The two Governments agree in principle to the need for the establishment of a distant early warning line across the most northerly practicable part of North America;

(b) Mutually acceptable military characteristics be developed for such a line;

(c) Appropriate system studies be initiated for the purpose of developing detailed recommendations on the specifications, types of equipment, overall system composition, cost estimates, manpower requirements and the exact location of the line.

2. You will recall that in his report the External Affairs Observer suggested two obvious alternative courses of action. The first was that Canada should continue to adhere to its plan to build the Mid-Canada (55th parallel) line and leave it to the United States to build the Distant Early Warning Line. The second was to evolve some form of joint enterprise to build both lines. Presumably it would also be possible to evolve other plans containing elements of both of these schemes. The one sure fact is that it will take some time to consider all the factors involved and to reach a decision on what the Canadian policy should be. It would seem essential therefore that pending such consideration we should maintain freedom of action to move in whatever direction is ultimately desirable.

3. There is to be a meeting of the Chiefs of Staff Committee on Monday (June 14) to discuss the MSG recommendation. If you agree I propose to take a position as follows:

(a) That in order to maintain freedom of action with respect to later decisions with respect to construction of the DEW line, Canada should participate actively in the studies recommended by the MSG.

(b) That although the RCAF may be named as the responsible Canadian agency for carrying out the studies, other Departments including Northern Affairs and National Resources, Defence Production and Transport, should participate when appropriate. Also, these Departments, and especially the first two, should now be informed of the MSG Report.

(c) That it would be desirable for the Chiefs of Staff to make a study of the probable development of Continental air defence requirements during the next few years in order to assist in determining the extent of Canadian commitments which might arise therefrom.

(d) That an ad hoc working group be set up with representatives from National Defence, Defence Production and External Affairs to consider the various ways in which Canada might participate in the development of the overall early warning system (including both the Mid-Canada line and the DEW line) and to report to the Chiefs of Staff Committee.²⁶

It is my understanding that the Chiefs of Staff have reached the following decisions with respect to continental defence:

(a) That a briefing on the problem of early warning will be given to the Cabinet Defence Committee by the Vice Chief of the Air Staff describing the progress made to date on the engineering studies for the mid-Canada line (Project Mongoose) and outlining the substance of the recent MSG recommendation that the two Governments should agree on the construction of a distant early warning line across the Canadian Arctic.

(b) That Chiefs of Staff will now recommend to Cabinet Defence Committee that Canada should build, pay for and operate the mid-Canada line. The cost of this line has been estimated to be about $150 million.

(c) That the MSG recommendation concerning the distant early warning line will NOT at this time be submitted by Chiefs of Staff to Cabinet Defence Committee on the ground that it is still under study by the Chiefs of Staff.

2. I am concerned that, if the above programme is followed, the freedom of the Government to reach a decision at a later date on the extent to which Canada should participate in the construction and operation of the distant early warning line will be circumscribed. All the evidence which this Division has seen indicates clearly that if Canada undertakes sole responsibility for the construction of the mid-Canada line, all the available logistic resources, engineering skills, etc., will be fully absorbed in meeting this commitment and Canadian participation in the distant early warning line could therefore be no more than nominal. It may be that this is the best way of dividing the responsibilities of the two Governments, but it is suggested that the Canadian Government should consider the question in this form rather than in the way that the Chiefs of Staff are presenting it. Incidentally, this Division has been informed (off the record) by two officials who participated in the discussions of the Chiefs of Staff Committee that the only reason the MSG recommendation is not being presented to Cabinet Defence Committee at the meeting next Friday is that the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff considers that it would be bad tactics. It is suggested, however, that the tactics now being followed by the Chiefs of Staff are bad in that they may prejudice Cabinet's opportunity to view the whole picture before taking important decisions.

Pearson indicated his approval of these recommendations with a checkmark at the beginning of this memorandum. The Chiefs of Staff Committee meeting was held on June 17. The Chiefs of Staff Committee did not discuss the Military Study Group report formally until June 28, 1954.

3. Another point which merits consideration is that we must expect that the United States will approach Canada in the near future to implement the recommendations of the Military Study Group. A reliable United States source has stated that Dr. Hannah is "carrying the ball" and will likely bring the matter up at the next PJBD meeting. (Of course, the MSG report is addressed to the Chiefs of Staff of both countries and not to the PJBD. However, if the United States Chiefs have approved the report before the PJBD meets on July 12, it would be natural for Dr. Hannah to use the PJBD forum to press the matter.) It seems to be generally agreed that Canada will eventually decide to approve the latest MSG recommendation. If that is the case, it is respectfully submitted that no good can come from procrastination in settling this point and from delay in making arrangements with the United States for the implementation of the recommendation.

BENJAMIN ROGERS

P.S. We have just learned from Colonel Graling that the MSG Recommendation is now before the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, and that the U.S. Section, PJBD, will likely wish to raise the matter at the July meeting.

100TH MEETING OF CABINET DEFENCE COMMITTEE
TO BE HELD ON FRIDAY, JUNE 25, 1954

ITEM I. CONTINENTAL DEFENCE: MID-CANADA EARLY WARNING LINE

The attached memorandum from the Minister of National Defence to the Cabinet Defence Committee, dated June 18, 1954, reports on the progress of the engineering studies which have been carried out on the mid-Canada early warning line and gives an estimate of the cost — $120 million from Hopedale, Labrador to the Alberta-British Columbia border and an additional $20 million across British Columbia.

2. The memorandum points out that when the subject was last considered by Cabinet Defence Committee on November 3, 1953, it was agreed that Canada should undertake the planning and construction of the line without prejudice to a later division of costs between Canada and the United States. The memorandum concludes with a statement of the advantages which would accrue if Canada undertook sole responsibility for building, paying for and operating the line.

3. The memorandum makes no mention of the recommendation by the Canada-United States Military Study Group, which was submitted on June 3, 1954 to the Chiefs of Staff of the two countries, proposing that the two Governments agree in principle to the need for the establishment of a distant early warning line across the most northerly practicable part of North America, and recommending the initiation of the necessary systems studies prior to the construction of such a line. A copy of this MSG recommendation is annexed.

4. There are two aspects of the general early warning problem about which this Department has been concerned at the official level. These are as follows:

(a) If a definite decision were now reached by the Canadian Government that Canada should undertake sole responsibility for building of, meeting the cost of, and operating the mid-Canada line, this decision might circumscribe the freedom of the Government to reach a decision at a later date on the extent to which Canada should participate in the construction and operation of the distant early warning line.

(b) The Chiefs of Staff have not yet completed their examination of the MSG recommendation on the distant early warning line and, therefore do not propose to submit it for consideration of Cabinet Defence Committee at this meeting. We anticipate that the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff will, for their part, be approving the recommendation almost immediately, and that it may be raised at the PJBD meeting in July. It seemed desirable to us, if at all possible, that a Canadian decision should be reached and the PJBD given instructions as to the position they should take if the U.S. Section raised the question at the July meeting of the Board.

5. Because of our concern with respect to these matters, a meeting was arranged today by the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, which was attended by the Secretary to the Cabinet, the Secretary to the Treasury Board, the Deputy Minister of National Defence, the Assistant Deputy Minister of Northern Affairs, the Vice Chief of the Air Staff and myself. In the course of the discussion, General Foulkes and Mr. Drury made it clear that, in their judgment, if the mid-Canada line was to be constructed expeditiously and in accordance with Canadian ideas as to what was required, then it was necessary that Canada should undertake to build, pay for and operate it. However, General Foulkes went on to state that the Chiefs of Staff clearly recognized that when the time came to build the northern line, it would have to be done as a joint project with active Canadian participation and that the Chiefs of Staff would make their proposals at that time in the light of this situation. It seems to me, therefore, that there is no point in pressing our doubts any further, and that it would be sufficient if the Minutes of Cabinet Defence Committee contained a statement of the views of the Department of External Affairs regarding the importance of active participation by Canada in the construction of the northern line when the time comes to commence work on that project.

6. In discussing the MSG recommendation regarding the northern line, there was general agreement that in due course it would probably have to be concurred in. However, the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, felt that, before doing so, it should be further studied by the Chiefs and possibly some discussions held with the United States Chiefs of Staff. It was, therefore, agreed that, if the matter came up in the PJBD meeting, the Canadian Section should merely state that the MSG report was under study by the Canadian Chiefs of Staff who would communicate with the United States Chiefs of Staff in due course.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE — MID-CANADA WARNING LINE

1. At its 96th Meeting, Cabinet Defence Committee considered the recommendations of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff that an aircraft warning line be established in northern Canada. The Committee decided that the line should be established in the vicinity of the 55th parallel of latitude and further, that Canada should undertake the planning and construction of the line without prejudice to a later decision on the division of costs between Canada and the United States. This decision was advised to the United States and was concurred in by the United States Chiefs of Staff. As a result of this decision, the two Air Forces were instructed to undertake a study to develop the military characteristics, specifications for types of equipment to be used, costs estimates and manpower requirements for this line and report not later than 1 June, 1954.

2. While this study has not been completed in all details, enough work has been done to determine the order of cost, the manpower requirements and the timing for the construction of this line. The detailed planning is continuing but enough information is now available to enable the Canadian Government to consider the cost-sharing aspect of this project.

3. Cost: The portion of the line that has been costed runs from Hopedale on the Labrador Coast, to the Rocky Mountains West of Edmonton. There are still uncertainties as to the location of the line in British Columbia to the Pacific Coast and this matter is being studied further both by the Military Study Group and the Systems Engineering Group. The cost estimate on the line from Hopedale to British Columbia is submitted as being of the order of $120 million dollars. This has been broken down into expenditures by fiscal year as indicated below:

1955-56	40,000,000
1956-57	50,000,000
1957-58	25,000,000
Total	$ 120,000,000

The cost of the B.C. Section might be of the order of $20,000,000.00.

4. Manpower: The manpower requirements are estimated to be of the order of 600 men on the line itself with a further increment of three to six hundred necessary for support behind the line.

5. Timing: Assuming that authority is given now for the construction of the line, it should be possible to build and install an advanced test section of the line in the Flin Flon area during the summer of 1955. Based on the experience of this test section electronic equipments could be contracted for, and allowing approximately 20 months for delivery, be available about January, 1957. During the summer of 1955-56, construction materials would be delivered to the sites so that construction work could be commenced in the spring of 1956. Most of the construction would be completed during the summer of 1956, leaving electronic installation and testing to be done during 1957. Allowing for normal delays, especially during the testing period when it would be necessary to man all stations for a shake-down period, the line could be in operation by the end of 1957.

6. It is considered that there are many advantages to undertaking this project as a Canadian undertaking:

- (a) There will only be one authority to make decisions;
- (b) There will be a better opportunity to minimize delays.
- (c) There will be a better possibility of controlling costs.
- (d) There will be a better chance of avoiding any suggestion that Canada take part in the provision of the sea wings.

I. CONTINENTAL DEFENCE — MID-CANADA WARNING LINE

1. The Minister of National Defence said that at its 96th meeting the Cabinet Defence Committee had authorized the planning and construction by Canada of an aircraft early warning line in the vicinity of the 55th parallel without prejudice to a later decision on the division of costs between Canada and the United States. The decision had been communicated to the United States and concurred in by the U.S.

Chiefs of Staff. As a result, the R.C.A.F. and the U.S.A.F. had been instructed to undertake a study to develop the military characteristics, specifications for types of equipment to be used, cost estimates and manpower requirements for this line, and to report not later than June 1, 1954. The study had not yet been completed in all details and planning was continuing, but enough work had been done to determine the general order of cost, manpower requirements and timing for construction of the line. The cost of that portion running from Hopedale on the Labrador Coast to the mountains west of Edmonton would be of the order of $120 million. Broken down by fiscal years the expenditure might amount to: 1954-55, $5 million; 1955-56, $40 million; 1956-57, $50 million; 1957-58, $25 million. There were uncertainties as to the location of the remainder of the system in British Columbia to the Pacific Coast, but its cost might be about $20 million. Manpower requirements were estimated to be 600 men on the line with a further 300 - 600 necessary for support. If authority were given now for the building, excluding the part in British Columbia, the line could be in operation by the end of 1957. Its construction as a Canadian project would mean that there would be only one authority making decisions, there would be fewer delays, a better possibility of controlling costs and a better chance of avoiding suggestions that Canada should take part in the provision of sea wings for the possible North American overall warning system which was now being given serious consideration in the United States.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Minister of National Defence, June 18, 1954 — Document D9-54).

2. The Acting Chief of the Air Staff briefed the Committee on the existing warning system and on probable future requirements. He indicated where the radars of the "Pinetree" line were situated, where the warning devices in Greenland were located, and where the proposed mid-continent line would be. The line at present under consideration would consist mainly of equipment of the McGill Fence type, supplemented by scanning radars. It would provide high and low cover; that is, as low as 300 feet and up to 60,000 feet. It would detect inbound and outbound aircraft but could not identify them. Through further developments in the future, it might be possible to improve the type of equipment contemplated to help meet the identification difficulties. The approximate distance between the mid-Canada line and the "Pinetree" line ran from 300 to 400 miles. The primary purpose of the mid-Canada line was to provide a warning to enable fighters to get into the air in sufficient time to meet attacking bombers. It was assumed that the primary targets of Soviet bombers would be the U.S. Strategic Air Command bases. The existence of a line along the 55th parallel would therefore provide an additional hour's warning for take off and dispersal of this Command's aircraft.

It would be recalled that as a result of reports emanating from the Lincoln Laboratories, Canada had also been asked to agree to the establishment of a test line further north straddling the Alaska-Yukon boundary. Canada had signified its agreement to this request and the experiment, known as Operation "Corrode", was taking place. As part of the operation, a joint Canada-U.S. reconnaissance had been made of a possible distant early warning system stretching generally along the line Aklavik-Cambridge Bay-Frobisher Bay.

With the new developments in Russian long-range aircraft, the U.S. authorities were becoming increasingly anxious to have a full continental warning system in operation as soon as possible. Part of the system would include a distant early warning line, and it appeared likely that the United States would soon press for its establishment on the northern coast of the continent. The line by itself would, however, be of little value because attacking aircraft could fly around the ends, mainly towards targets on the U.S. seaboard. The U.S. Chiefs of Staff had therefore agreed in principle to the establishment of sea wings, stretching from Kodiak Island to Hawaii in the Pacific, and from Cape Race to the Azores in the Atlantic. There would, however, still be a gap south of Greenland and the matter was being studied further to see whether or not it would be advisable to have a line running from Cape Race to Bluie West in Greenland. The most desirable wing in the Atlantic would run from a suitable location on the East Coast to the United Kingdom via Greenland and Iceland. The present estimate of cost for the sea wings as contemplated was of the order of $5 to $6 billion. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff considered it advisable to proceed first with the mid-continent line because the Aklavik-Cambridge Bay-Frobisher Bay line was too far forward, and did not work outwards from existing defences. On the other hand, the shortest distances from Soviet bases to the important targets in North America were across Canada, and for civil defence purposes and for safety of SAC aircraft and bases, sea wings were considered essential.

3. In the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The third interim report of the Canada-U.S. Military Study Group, which had been set up to examine the general requirements for early warning, recommended that Canada and the United States agree in principle to the need for establishing a distant early warning line across the most northerly part of North America. This line had become known as the DEW line. The report had just been received and the Canadian Chiefs of Staff had not yet had an opportunity to study the recommendation fully, but they would do so soon. The U.S. Chiefs of Staff had likewise not studied the proposal, but they had indicated that they did not propose to be stampeded into building such a line without a thorough examination of its implications. It could be assumed, however, that a proposal to establish it would soon be forthcoming from the United States. Canadian service authorities had not in the past been put under great pressure by the United States to do anything which they had not been prepared to do or which they had thought inadvisable. As far as the DEW line was concerned, it could be inferred that we would be asked to participate in its establishment jointly with the United States.

(b) The northern line would be of little value without the sea wings. If these were not found to be practical, the request to construct it would not likely be made. The mid-continent line, however, stood on its own feet because it made air defence more effective, and gave an earlier warning to SAC and to civil defence authorities than "Pinetree" did.

(c) There was increasing pressure in the United States, particularly from certain Congressional quarters, to speed up the preparations for continental defence. If Canada indicated now that it would construct the line running along the 55th parallel, accusations could not be made that we were not doing our share in protecting the continent. If we held up on the mid-continent line, we might find ourselves engaged eventually in a joint operation with the United States at a greater cost and with less control than we otherwise would have had. There would also be the added delays involved in consultation over the type of equipment to be used, plans, specifications, and the like. On the other hand, if it were to be a Canadian project, the U.S. authorities should be kept fully informed of the technical details and of the construction processes, in order to ensure that the early warning line met the operational requirements of both U.S. and Canadian Air Forces.

(d) It would be desirable to put the responsibility for construction on one prime contractor. This might be done through the Trans-Canada Telephone Association, an organization of telephone companies with the Bell Telephone Company in the dominant position. Civilian engineers and technicians had already been brought in on the surveys and on the planning.

(e) It would be possible to construct the line on a crash programme basis in a much shorter time, but it was considered essential to ensure that the equipment to be used worked properly and that experience be gained before attempting to build the whole line. For this reason, it was proposed to establish in 1955 a test section in the Flin Flon area, to permit machinery and apparatus to be checked and difficulties to be ironed out. The remaining sections of the line could then be built in later seasons. If the whole project were attempted at once, serious problems might be encountered, involving higher expenditures than presently envisaged. The major elements in the cost of the project as presently planned would be those for construction and power facilities; the detecting devices themselves would be relatively inexpensive. While it appeared likely that improvements would be added over the years, these too would be relatively inexpensive, since their installation would not require additional construction or power facilities.

(f) Experience gained in Operation "Corrode" indicated that there would probably be disagreement in American quarters over the type of equipment which should be used on the DEW line. There was in fact no one technical view there on this point. However, this would be sorted out by the U.S. Air Force in due course. The views of the civilian contractor on the project were almost identical with those of the Canadian Defence Research Board in support of the McGill fence as against the scheme proposed by the Lincoln Laboratories. The latter, if accepted, would be more expensive and involve more manpower.

(g) No satisfactory system of identification of aircraft existed at the present time. In the United States, the number of passing aircraft was taken from scanning radars. If this particular number went above a certain arbitrary figure, a warning was given. The scientists were still confronted with the problem of evaluating the McGill fence as against the scanning radar. The mid-continent line involved stations of the McGill fence type about every 35 miles, with every tenth station being a reporting centre to which the signals from the unmanned equipment came in, at which evaluations were made, and from which repair and maintenance crews went out to check the other stations.

(h) The mid-continent line was programmed over a four-year period and its financing could be carried out through a re-arrangement of priorities in the Department of National Defence, if necessary, but within the existing defence appropriations which were now contemplated for the next few years.

(i) If Canada accepted full responsibility for the construction and the cost of the mid-continent line, it might be found that all available resources were committed, with nothing left over for use on the far northern line if it were to be built. At that point, pressure from the United States might be so great that we could not resist allowing them to construct it alone. The political consequences, if this were the case, would be most undesirable.

(j) Even if Canada built the mid-continent line alone, efforts should be made to agree on division of costs and work on the DEW line as was done in the "Pinetree" operation. Present American thinking envisaged it being constructed in one season as a task force operation and, regardless of how the cost might ultimately be shared, it seemed quite likely that the United States would have to play a major part in the transportation of the necessary equipment, simply because Canada did not have enough ships or aircraft. For the same reason, the United States would have a significant role to play in the supply and maintenance of the line. Some estimates of cost had been given for the project but these appeared to be quite inaccurate and it was not possible at this stage to say what amount of money would be involved.

(k) The U.S. Chiefs of Staff had been informed that the Canadian Chiefs of Staff would let them know by the end of June whether Canada would construct the mid-continent line alone, or whether other arrangements should be made.

4. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) agreed to recommend that an aircraft warning line in the vicinity of the 55th parallel of latitude from Hopedale in Labrador to the mountains on the B.C.-Alberta border be constructed by Canada at a cost estimated to be of the order of $120 million, the money to be provided from current appropriations for the Department of National Defence and the appropriations now contemplated for the next few years; it being understood that the construction of the section of the line from the B.C.-Alberta border to the Pacific Ocean would be considered at a later meeting following further studies;

(b) noted that a proposal to construct a distant early warning line running along the northern coast of the continent would likely be made in the near future and that it would be desirable that this line be built as a joint Canada-United States project;

(c) agreed that once the final decision had been taken by the Cabinet with respect to (a) above, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence should be so informed.²⁷

Dear General Foulkes,

DISTANT EARLY WARNING LINE

I thought I should inform you of certain information, for what it's worth, which we have just received from Washington through PJBD channels. This information is to the effect that the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Department of Defence in Washington have approved the recommendation made by the Military Study Group in its Third Interim Report. Following this, the matter was referred to the President who has directed that the United States authorities should press for an immediate inter-governmental agreement, in principle, to the need for the establishment of the line. We understand that it is being considered again by the Joint Chiefs of Staff today in the light of the President's directive, and that the United States Section of the PJBD will press the matter at next week's meeting.

I understand that the Canadian Section of the PJBD will be guided by the views of the Cabinet Defence Committee and the Chiefs of Staff, as described in your letter to General McNaughton of July 8, 1954.†

Yours sincerely,

R.A. MACKAY

DISTANT EARLY WARNING (DEW) — 3RD INTERIM REPORT OF MILITARY STUDY GROUP — DISCUSSION AT PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE

Annexed is an advance extract from the Journal of the PJBD, which met this week on the Pacific Coast. General McNaughton will be advising General Foulkes of this discussion and proposes to report personally to you and Mr. Campney.

2. You will recall that Cabinet Defence Committee was informed of the 3rd Interim Report on June 30, prior to Defence Committee taking the decision that Canada will undertake the mid-Canada line as a Canadian project at Canadian expense. Before June 30, officials of External Affairs had expressed to you (and to General Foulkes and Mr. Bryce) misgivings on two points:

(1) We would not see any advantage in the Canadian Government delaying approval of para. (a) of the MSG Report, which asked the two governments to "agree in principle to the need for the establishment of a distant early warning line across the most northerly practicable part of North America".

(2) We feared that an immediate decision by the Canadian Government to bear the whole cost of the mid-Canada line might prejudice the freedom of the Canadian Government later this summer to decide to what extent Canada would share in the DEW line.

3. Our misgivings were not shared by National Defence and Bryce, and therefore I did not advise you to press them in this form at Defence Committee.

4. Now, as we in External expected, the United States Government is pressing for immediate official approval by the Canadian Government of para. (a) of the MSG recommendation.

5. My view is that the Canadian Government should now approve recommendation (a), with the reservation that the Canadian Government is leaving entirely open for the present the degree of Canadian participation in the DEW line.²⁸

4. (SECRET) Distant Early Warning System — Land Segment

The Canadian Air Force Member referred to the Third Interim Report approved by the Canada/U.S. Military Study Group on June 3, 1954, which had been transmitted for approval to the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff and to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff. That Report recommended that:

(a) The two Governments agree in principle to the need for the establishment of a distant early warning line across the most northerly practicable part of North America;

(b) Mutually acceptable military characteristics for such a line be developed;

(c) Appropriate systems studies be initiated for the purpose of developing detailed recommendations on the specifications, types of equipment, overall system composition, cost estimates, manpower requirements and the exact location of such a line.

²⁸ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I agree. L.B. P[earson]

The Canadian Air Force Member reported that the Canadian Chiefs of Staff had considered the recommendations of the Third Interim Report of the M.S.G. The Chiefs of Staff felt that, before approaching the Canadian Government for approval of the line in principle, the studies referred to in paragraphs (b) and (c) should be undertaken. They felt that the M.S.G. already had the authority to undertake these studies and that further information was desirable in order that a more concrete proposal might be placed before the highest authorities of the Canadian Government. The Canadian Air Force Member said that the Canadian Government was aware of the proposal, and although it had not considered it, no disagreement had been expressed. The Canadian Chairman said that he also considered that the most practical step which could be taken at this time regarding the DEW line would be to carry out the studies recommended by the M.S.G. These studies would have to be made in any event and he did not feel that any delays would be caused by proceeding on the M.S.G. recommendations (b) and (c).

The U.S. Chairman stated that the proposed far northern early warning line was receiving great emphasis within the U.S. Government. He presented the view of the U.S. Government that continental defence was highly important and that all measures should be taken as soon as possible to strengthen the joint defences of the two countries against air attack. The proposed DEW line had been considered at all levels within the U.S. Government; it had been approved by the President of the United States, the National Security Council, and the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff. It was the opinion of the U.S. Government that this matter was urgent and the U.S. Section wished to ensure that everything was being done to avoid any delays. The U.S. Chairman said that the U.S. Section felt strongly that there should be agreement in principle between the two Governments on the need for the establishment of the far north early warning line, as recommended by M.S.G. The U.S. Chairman said he felt that the details regarding construction and other matters could be taken up between the proper agencies of the two countries, but from the point of view of the U.S. authorities it was important that there should first be agreement in principle between the two Governments on the need for such a line. He read to the Board a paragraph of a letter from the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff which stated that:

"Subsequent to agreement in principle between the two Governments on the need for this warning line, the U.S. Air Force will be responsible for carrying out the U.S. part of the remaining recommendations in the Third Interim Report of the M.S.G."

The Canadian Chairman stated that the Canadian Government was acquainted with the proposal to construct the DEW line, and that it was equally interested with the U.S. Government in making effective the defences of this continent. He felt sure that the Canadian Government shared the anxiety of the U.S. Government that these defences should be brought as rapidly as possible to the state of readiness which was necessary. The Canadian Chairman noted that the situation had been changed by new intelligence regarding the Soviet long range Air Force and the Soviet development of the hydrogen bomb which had come about since the DEW line was first proposed. The line therefore now had become more strongly tied to the requirements of the U.S. Strategic Air Command and the Air Defence Commands of both countries for early warning. He said that the Canadian Section would take careful note of the views of the U.S. Section and report them fully to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and to the Defence Committee of the Cabinet.

The U.S. Chairman stated that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff had approved Recommendation (a) of the M.S.G. and had specifically requested the U.S. Section to seek the cooperation of the Canadian Section in obtaining the agreement of the Canadian Government on the need for the far northern early warning line. He considered that this was a first step, which would enable the two Governments to proceed on the further steps which were necessary to implement the line. He mentioned that this project was considered of the highest priority by the U.S. Government, and that it was recognized that this would involve large expenditures. He said that approval in principle by the two Governments would assist the U.S. authorities in seeking the required appropriations which was necessarily a process requiring some time. He felt that any delays in agreement between the two countries would undoubtedly cause delays in implementation.

The Canadian Chairman stated that the Canadian Chiefs of Staff desired further information regarding what is involved in the proposed project, and in particular, an understanding of the proportions of the commitment resulting from a decision to proceed. The U.S. Chairman replied that an important factor in the situation was the decision which had been announced by the Canadian Government to assume full responsibility for the mid-Canada warning line and to proceed with this entirely at the expense of the Canadian Government. This decision was most gratifying to the United States. In the light of this heavy responsibility which had been assumed by the Canadian Government, the U.S. Chairman said that the United States was willing to carry all or any part of the burden involved in constructing and operating the far northern DEW line, depending upon the wishes of the Canadian Government as to the extent of Canadian participation.

The U.S. Air Force Member said that as the Canadian Chiefs of Staff had proposed, it was possible to commence the studies enumerated in paragraphs (b) and (c) of the M.S.G. recommendation. However, the United States Government considered that the deferment of such an agreement would have an adverse effect on the development of United States plans, organization and fiscal arrangements for the construction of the line. The fundamental decision was very important in enlisting the full support of the many agencies which in the way or another would be concerned with the project.

The Canadian Chairman said that he appreciated the force of the reasons which led the U.S. Government to the conclusion that it was desirable for the two Governments to agree in principle to the establishment of a distant early warning line, and he reiterated his undertaking to put forward to the Canadian Government the views of the U.S. Government as expressed by the Chairman of the U.S. Section. The Board noted that the R.C.A.F. and the U.S.A.F. would launch the necessary studies so that progress could be made pending consideration by the Canadian Government.

COMMAND OF CONTINENTAL DEFENCE FORCES

There has been, as you know, an increasing interest in the United States regarding the need for more effective arrangements for planning in peacetime, and command and control in wartime of the Armed Forces of North America. This interest has been highlighted by Representative Cole's speech on the subject and his introduction into the United States Congress of a Bill to provide for the appointment of an Assistant Secretary of Defence for Continental Defence. In order to be ready if necessary for discussions with the United States military on this matter, the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, requested the Joint Planning Committee to prepare a study on the question of the appointment of a Commander-in-Chief for the forces of the Canada-U.S. region provided for the defence of North America.

2. In view of the importance of this subject, I thought you might wish to consider in advance of the next Chiefs of Staff Committee meeting, the JPC's paper dated July 14, 1954, which is attached.

3. The first paper prepared by the Joint Planning Staff was thoroughly inadequate. We have made substantial contributions to the paper in its final form.

4. Briefly the paper examined:

- (1) the threat to North America.
- (2) defence tasks.
- (3) the desirability of closer co-operation in peacetime and in wartime.
- (4) the branches of the service which might be more closely integrated and,
- (5) the main types of command organizations which might be established.

5. The J.P.C. concluded that closer cooperation in peacetime, and, of course, in wartime, is desirable, but that it was required only in connection with the planning and control of air defence. With regard to command organization the paper discusses four possible arrangements:

(a) The appointment of a Supreme Allied Commander Canada-US (SACCUS) responsible to the Standing Group.

(b) The appointment of a CinC Canada-US (CINCCUS) responsible to the Canada-US Regional Planning Group, Chiefs of Staff Committee.

(c) The appointment of a Commander-in-Chief Air Defence Canada-US (CINCADCUS) responsible to the Canada-US Regional Planning Group, Chiefs of Staff Committee.

(d) The appointment of a CinC Air Defence (CINCADCUS) for the Canada-US region, responsible jointly to the Canadian and United States Chiefs of Staff Committees.

6. The analysis concludes that the Command Organization noted in (c) would be the most desirable from the Canadian point of view. "However, because of United States disclosure policy and the reluctance of the United States to allow NATO to become too deeply involved in North American defence, it is likely that the United States would prefer (d) to (c). (d) would offer comparable military advantages and should therefore be supported if (c) proved unacceptable to the United States."

7. The paper concludes with the recommendation "that consideration be given to having Canada take the initiative now to discuss with the United States authorities the appointment of a Commander-in-Chief Air Defence."

8. We are giving consideration to the advantages and disadvantages, from a political point of view, of the proposal that there should be a Commander-in-Chief Air Defence for the Canada-US Region, and shall try to let you have a memorandum on the subject before the next meeting of Chiefs of Staff Committee, (this will be a difficult memorandum to prepare, and it is possible that it will not be ready next week.) We are also considering the pros and cons of the proposal that the matter be discussed with the U.S. authorities now — i.e., in the near future. Obviously, the matter should not be discussed with the U.S. authorities before the political implications have been thoroughly considered. I would think that, if and when a recommendation goes up to Cabinet Defence Committee, it should set forth clearly both military and political considerations, and should be submitted jointly by the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.²⁹

INTRODUCTION

1. A bill has recently been introduced into the US Congress for the appointment of an Assistant Secretary of Defence for Continental Defence. Even if this bill is not seriously considered, there are indications that attention will be focussed on present arrangements for planning in peacetime and command and control in war-time with respect to the armed forces of the Canada-US region provided for the defence of North America. This might result in pressure to change present arrangements and might involve the question of the appointment of a Commander-in-Chief for these forces.

²⁹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Agreed R.A. M[acKay]

2. In view of the above, it is considered that a study of the Canadian position relative to possible changes in arrangements for planning, command and control of the forces allocated to the defence of the Canada-US region (Note: When the term "Canada-US region" is used in this paper, it refers to Canada, the United States and Alaska.) is necessary. Moreover, should war break out unexpectedly, events might force a decision on these arrangements in a very short time under great pressure. It would appear to be to Canada's advantage to have such arrangements made now when a solution more acceptable to Canada is more likely to be obtained. There are a number of political factors involved, and while they will not be discussed in detail in this paper, it will be necessary to indicate the basic political implications inherent in the various alternative courses of action.

PURPOSE

3. The purpose of this paper is to consider the military implications of certain possible proposals for changes in the arrangements for command and control of the US-Canadian military forces allocated to the defence of the Canada-US region.

DISCUSSION

The Threat

4. Agreed intelligence indicates the main threat to the Canada-United States region is from air attack, with the shortest lines of approach from Soviet Russia lying across Canadian territory. In addition, there are the threats of enemy lodgements, disruption of sea communications and possible launching of guided missiles from enemy submarines. However, for the foreseeable future, it is considered that these latter possibilities are less serious than the air threat.

Geographical Considerations

5. The Canada-United States region is a vast land mass consisting of extensive relatively uninhabited sections, and sections of high industrial and population density. The defence of the whole region is of mutual concern to the two nations. Because the region is so vast, however, attention must be concentrated on the defence of the vital areas two of which, the Montreal-Boston-Norfolk-Chicago-Duluth-Sault Ste. Marie-Ottawa area and the Vancouver-Spokane-Portland area, lie astride the border between Canada and the United States.

6. The size of the region and the dispersed location of vital areas within it, have necessitated wide geographical distribution of the defence forces, thus introducing peculiar problems with respect to planning and control of the forces.

Defence Tasks

7. In the face of the enemy threat to the Canada-US region the main tasks assigned the forces allocated to the defence of the area are:

- (a) the reduction of enemy lodgements;
- (b) coast defence and the protection of sea communications;
- (c) defence against air attack.

8. With regard to 7(a) above, current intelligence estimates indicate that enemy lodgements in CANADA and the UNITED STATES would be small-scale operations. Each individual operation would be confined to a small area and probably would involve national forces only. With regard to 7(b) above, submarine activity and other actions involving forces assigned to protection of sea communications and coastal defence would be local in nature and could be dealt with effectively under existing arrangements. In both these instances provision is made in MCC 300/5 for mutual reinforcing if necessary. The present system of command, control and planning is not complex, and is satisfactorily discharged by those national authorities who now have responsibility for these tasks within the terms of MCC 300/5.

9. With regard to 7(c) above, the coordination of the air defence effort constitutes a major problem due to the division of control which now exists between the various commands. For example, the Montreal-Boston-Norfolk-Chicago-Duluth-Sault Ste. Marie-Ottawa area, which is considered vital to the defence of North America, is split by a winding international border along the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence river, and the air defence forces within this area are controlled by two different commands; US Air Defence Command south of the border, and the RCAF Air Defence Command north of the border. This arrangement is subject to delays, possible disagreements, and possible misunderstandings between commands which might impose serious limitations on our ability to deal effectively with air raids.

Organizational Status of Canada-United States Region

10. Originally, five Regional Planning Groups were set up in NATO. Of these, three were absorbed into Allied Command Europe under SACEUR, one into Allied Command Atlantic under SACLANT, and the fifth, the Canada-United States Regional Planning Group still remains as a planning group, no Supreme Commander having been appointed. Under this latter organization, command arrangements for the reduction of enemy lodgements and for coastal defence and the protection of sea communications are adequate, and it is not considered that centralized control of the forces involved in these tasks is necessary or desirable. Control of air defence forces, which presents a more complex problem, is considered below.

Control of Air Defence Forces

11. The responsibility for air defence within the Canada-US region devolves upon four separate commands:

- US Air Defence Command
- US North East Command
- Alaska Command
- Canadian Air Defence Command.

None of these Commands is subordinate to any of the others, the first reporting to the Chief of Staff, United States Air Force, the second and third to the US Joint Chiefs of Staff and the last reporting to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff through the Chief of the Air Staff. However, the Commander, US Air Defence Command has the primary responsibility for the coordination of the Canadian and US Air Defence systems. The air defence forces, fighters and AA, in the US North East Command are under the operational control of the AOC Canadian Air Defence Command when operating in Canada. Some form of centralized control of air defence is considered necessary for the following reasons:

(a) In peacetime

- (i) to ensure coordinated planning, training, integration of systems, standardization of procedures, allocations of tasks and forces, etc;
- (ii) to facilitate the most economical expenditure and utilization of the limited resources available for air defence;
- (iii) to ensure that the overall Air Defence system is prepared to operate instantly at maximum efficiency in the event of an emergency.

(b) In wartime

- (i) to permit a single authority to make immediate decision as to priority of tasks;
- (ii) to permit coordinated operations and planning;
- (iii) to facilitate the rapid redeployment of forces to meet any enemy threat.

12. The only apparent military disadvantage to centralized control might be a possible requirement for increases in communications facilities and personnel. However, such increases might be kept to a minimum by assigning personnel and rearranging existing communications facilities, and in any case they would be justified by the more than proportionate increase in coordination and efficiency.

Possible Command Organizations

13. There are four main command organizations which might be suggested for increasing the efficiency of the present arrangements in respect to the organization of the forces assigned to the defence of the Canada-US region:

(a) The appointment of a Supreme Allied Commander Canada-US (SACCUS) responsible to the Standing Group.

(b) The appointment of a CinC Canada-US (CINCCUS) responsible to the Canada-US Regional Planning Group, Chiefs of Staff Committee.

(c) The appointment of a Commander-in-Chief Air Defence Canada-US (CINADCUS) responsible to the Canada-US Regional Planning Group, Chiefs of Staff Committee.

(d) The appointment of a CinC Air Defence (CINADCUS) for the Canada-US region, responsible jointly to the Canadian and United States Chiefs of Staff Committees.

(A) The Appointment of a Supreme Allied Commander Canada-US Region

14. The fact that the Canada-US region is the only remaining portion of the NATO area not under the command of a Supreme Commander provides a prima facie case for proposals for the establishment of a NATO Supreme Allied Commander Canada-US (SACCUS). Following existing NATO procedure, should a SACCUS be appointed, the Regional Planning Group would disappear and SACCUS would be directly responsible to the Standing Group as are SACEUR and SACLANT.

15. However, in view of the adequacy of present arrangements for the command and control of the land and sea forces and air forces other than air defence forces, there is no necessity for the appointment of a Supreme Commander over all military forces allocated to the defence of the Canada-United States region; and in the absence of a clear positive reason for the appointment of a Supreme Commander, the expenditures that would be entailed in establishing a SACCUS organization could not be justified. Moreover, the appointment of a SACCUS would have certain implications which would probably be unacceptable to Canada or the United States, or both countries, as follows:

(a) A SACCUS reporting directly to the Standing Group might have to disclose information to the Standing Group which would be contrary to present US disclosure policy.

(b) If detailed plans for the defence of the Canada-US region were made available to a NATO body, this would probably lead to discussion concerning the relative priorities of North American as against European defence.

(c) A SACCUS would report direct to the Standing Group, of which Canada is not a member, on matters relating to the defence of Canada.

(B) The Appointment of a Commander-in-Chief Canada-US

16. A possible alternative to the appointment of a SACCUS would be the appointment of a Commander-in-Chief Canada-US (CINCCUS) for all land, sea and air forces, directly responsible to the Regional Planning Group, Chiefs of Staff Committee, rather than to the Standing Group. The appointment of a CINCCUS would have two main advantages over the appointment of a SACCUS, which are:

(a) that Canada would have co-equal authority at Chiefs of Staff level as at present;

(b) that the US disclosure policy might not be endangered, because detailed plans for the defence of North America would not necessarily be submitted to the Standing Group but rather to the Regional Planning Group, Chiefs of Staff Committee.

17. However, for the reasons stated in the first part of para 15 above, there does not seem to be adequate justification for the appointment of a CINCCUS to command all land, naval and air forces for the defence of the region. Moreover, it might be difficult to justify to the rest of NATO the appointment of a commander-in-chief who would not be a supreme allied commander.

(C) The Appointment of a Commander-in-Chief Air Defence Canada-US, Responsible to Canada-US Regional Planning Group

18. Although there does not seem to be adequate justification for the appointment of a Commander to command all land, naval and air forces for the defence of the Canada-US region, a case can be made for the appointment of a Commander-in-Chief Air Defence Canada-US (CINCADCUS). He could be directly responsible to the Chiefs of Staff Committee of the Canada-US Regional Planning Group for the defence of the Canada-US region, including planning and some measure of operational control of all air defence resources in the region. Such an organization would be analogous to the one which exists for the Channel-North Sea area of NATO. There are both an Allied Commander-in-Chief and an Allied Maritime-Air Commander-in-Chief for that area. They are responsible to the Channel Committee, consisting of representatives of the Chiefs of Staff of the NATO countries in the area, which is in turn responsible to the Standing Group.

19. There would be four main advantages to the appointment of a CINCADCUS rather than a SACCUS or CINCCUS:

(a) Canada would have co-equal authority at Chiefs of Staff level as at present, and Canadian interests would be adequately protected.

(b) There would be less danger of conflict with the United States disclosure policy because detailed plans for the defence of North America would be considered at the Chiefs of Staff Committee level only and need not be submitted in detail to the Standing Group.

(c) It would provide satisfactory means of insuring flexibility, coordination and optimum utilization of the resources available.

(D) The Appointment of a Commander-in-Chief Air Defence Canada-US, responsible to Canadian and United States Chiefs of Staff Committees

20. Instead of being responsible to the Canada-US Regional Planning Group, CINCADCUS could be responsible to the Chiefs of Staff Committees of Canada and the United States co-equally. In terms of flexibility, protection of Canadian interests and efficient utilization of the resources available, this alternative would appear to have the same advantages as the appointment of a Commander-in-Chief Air Defence responsible to the Canada-US Regional Planning Group. It would, however, have the following disadvantages:

(a) it would further vitiate the NATO machinery (Canada-US Regional Planning Group) theoretically responsible for the defence of a part of the NATO area, and thus weaken such co-ordination as now exists on the higher level between the defence of North America and the defence of Europe. This may be largely academic from a military point of view in peacetime, but might be serious in time of war;

(b) in case of a conflict of views between the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the US Chiefs of Staff, there would be no higher organization which could resolve the conflict in the best interests of NATO as a whole.

21. It should be recognized, however, that from the Canadian point of view there would be a price to pay for the military advantages gained by the establishment of a Commander-in-Chief Air Defence Canada-United States:

(a) it would be difficult to deny the Commander-in-Chief the right to deploy his forces in what he considered to be the most efficient manner. Such deployment would likely be based on a system of regions running north and south rather than on the Canada-US boundary and might involve a substantial increase in the number of United States forces in Canada. This in turn might lead to the development of pressures to increase the Canadian contribution both of forces and resources to continental defence, with a probable consequent reduction in Canadian commitments to NATO in Europe and on the Atlantic;

(b) it would make it difficult, if not impossible, for the Canadian defence authorities unilaterally to set the pace for the development of the air defence system in Canada, and this would have a significant effect on the priorities assigned by the Chiefs of Staff to the various elements of the Canadian defence programme. It should be borne in mind however that regardless of whether or not a CINCADCUS is appointed, the present trend of events will themselves make it increasingly difficult for Canada to decide unilaterally what it will do in this field.

22. From the Canadian point of view, (C) above would be the best organization. However, because of US disclosure policy and the reluctance of the US to allow NATO to become too deeply involved in North American defence, it is likely that the US would prefer (D) to (C). (D) would offer comparable military advantages and should therefore be supported if (C) proved unacceptable to the US.

23. Under (C) and (D) above, there are several possible forms of CINCADCUS organization which merit more detailed examination than is possible in this paper. However, basically, these may be divided into two main categories:

(a) The appointment of an existing commander (probably the Commanding General, US Air Defence Command) as Commander-in-Chief Air Defence Canada-US, responsible for the air defence of the Canada-US region including planning and some measure of operational control of all air defence resources in the region. This Commander-in-Chief would retain his present national responsibilities, and to discharge his duties as CinC Air Defence Canada-US would be given a small separate international staff.

(b) The appointment of a separate CinC Air Defence with an international (Canada-US) headquarters, distinct from existing headquarters. The responsibilities of this CinC would be similar to those outlined in sub-para (a) above, except that he would have no national responsibilities.

24. The arrangement set forth in para 23(a) above has two main disadvantages:

(a) The Commander-in-Chief would have both national and international responsibilities. In this connection it should be noted that if this CinC were an American, he could, in his national capacity, be compelled to disclose information to various congressional committees, the disclosure of which would not be in the best interests of Canada.

(b) There is a danger that the Commander may not be able to resolve the conflict between his national and international responsibilities without harming the interests of one country or the other.

25. The appointment of a separate Air Defence Commander with an international headquarters appears to represent the most acceptable arrangement from the military point of view, as it provides:

(a) A satisfactory means of ensuring adequate planning control and optimum utilization of the resources available.

(b) Assurance that Canadian interests will be adequately protected.

(c) Flexibility.

(d) An organization which would probably be acceptable to the US.

SUMMARY

26. In summary

(a) Pressure may be exerted by the United States to improve the arrangements for command and control of the defence forces allocated to the task of defence of the Canada-US region.

(b) The present system of planning and control of land, sea and air forces other than air defence forces, is adequate and the establishment of an international control arrangement is neither necessary nor desirable.

(c) Planning and control of air defence should be improved. The present system involves control and responsibilities which are difficult to define in actual practice because of the division of vital areas by the border and the need for rapid redeployment of defence forces in war regardless of command or national boundaries.

(d) The appointment of a separate CinC Air Defence with responsibility for planning and an appropriate measure of operational control over all air defence forces allocated to the Canada-US region is desirable.

(e) Canada should ensure that any command arrangement of the air defence forces that might be set up should be subordinate to the Canadian and US Chiefs of Staff co-equally. The best arrangements would be to make such a command organization subordinate to the Chiefs of Staff Committee of the Canada-US Regional Planning Group but if that is unacceptable to the U.S., it would also be satisfactory, from the military point of view, to make it subordinate to the Canadian and US Chiefs of Staff co-equally.

(f) If left until an emergency occurs, any arrangement made with the US with regard to the integration of the air defence forces might provide less favourable results for Canada.

RECOMMENDATION

27. It is recommended that consideration be given to having Canada take the initiative now to discuss with the U.S. authorities the appointment of a Commander-in-Chief Air Defence.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE — DISTANT EARLY WARNING LINE

Colonel N.P. Ward, U.S. Army, who has recently taken over from Colonel Graling as Military Assistant to Dr. Hannah on PJBD matters, is in Ottawa making the acquaintance of his Canadian opposite numbers and called on me this morning. In the course of the discussion he told me that the question of the distant early warning line had been considered twice by the National Security Council within the past few days and that President Eisenhower had discussed it with Dr. Hannah. The President emphasized to Dr. Hannah the importance attached by the United States Government to obtaining the agreement in principle of the Canadian Government to the establishment of the line and asked if there was anything his office could do to facilitate the progress of this matter. Dr. Hannah and Secretary of Defence Wilson told the President that, in their judgment, no action by the President was required at this time.

2. Colonel Ward said there had been considerable pressure, both on the PJBD office and the Department of State, to submit at once to the Canadian Government a formal note requesting Canadian agreement in principle to the construction of the line. This had been resisted by Dr. Hannah and the State Department as being unwise and unnecessary.

3. Colonel Ward also made the observation that the attitude of the President with respect to the need for the distant early warning line had obviously changed significantly since last November, when he visited Ottawa. At that time, in Colonel Ward's judgment, the President was by no means convinced of the immediate necessity for the distant early warning line.

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I am enclosing a copy of a submission to Cabinet prepared in Mr. Campney's name, recommending approval of the recommendation of the Permanent Joint Board in connection with the Distant Early Warning Line.

Mr. Campney has seen this paper and concurs in the principles.

I understand in his absence you will be prepared to put it forward at the next Cabinet meeting, in order to meet the United States' views regarding the urgency of this matter.

I would hope that if approved, a joint announcement might be arranged rather than a unilateral statement or leak by the United States.

Yours sincerely,

CABINET DOCUMENT No. 173-54

[Ottawa], July 29, 1954

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE: DISTANT EARLY WARNING LINE

1. The attached Appendix "A"† indicates the present and proposed radar defence coverage for Canada. Briefly the most southerly line which is commonly called "Pinetree" was approved by Cabinet in February, 1951.³⁰ It is a joint Canada-United States chain of which Canada is bearing one-third the cost and manning 16 of the original 33 stations. The United States proposed an additional nine temporary radar stations to fill the "gaps" in this chain, but a formal request to build these additional stations has not yet been made although the necessary surveys were authorized by the Cabinet Defence Committee in February, 1953.

2. It will be recalled that in January, 1953, the United States presented an urgent request for permission to build an experimental radar station in the Canadian Arctic near Herschel Island, designed to test the feasibility and value, or otherwise, of an early warning system of radar stations in the Arctic. The Canadian Government agreed to permit the United States Government to build this experimental station at United States expense but suggested that the two Governments should establish a Joint Study Group to study those aspects of the North American Air Defence System in general and the early warning system in particular which are of mutual concern to the two countries. The purpose of this suggestion was to ensure that the United States Government would not in future confront the Canadian Government with plans for radar construction in Canada which had not first been studied by a joint Canada-United States body.

3. Arising out of the studies of this body and the recommendations of the Chiefs of Staff, Cabinet Defence Committee agreed in November, 1953, that an early warning chain should be established along the 55th parallel of latitude and subsequently in June, 1954, Cabinet agreed that the construction of this line would be undertaken as a Canadian project at Canadian expense. This line is commonly referred to as the mid-Canada line. The seaward extensions of the early warning system, in the Atlantic to the Azores and in the Pacific to Hawaii, are being undertaken by the United States. The sea wings in the Atlantic are expected to be in operation by 1957, and those in the Pacific soon thereafter.

4. Cabinet Defence Committee at its 100th meeting held on 25 June, 1954, noted that a proposal to construct a distant early warning line running along the northern coast of the continent had been recommended by the Study Group, and if such a project was to be undertaken, it would be desirable that this line be built as a joint Canada-United States project. The additional early warning chain is being designed to provide additional early warning for the following purposes:

(a) To allow the United States Strategic Air Force to deploy off its bases to avoid destruction;

(b) To allow for preparation for further deployment of fighters on to the path of the enemy raiders; and

(c) For civil defence.

It was mentioned that present American thinking envisaged the chain being constructed in one season as a task force operation and regardless of how the cost might ultimately be shared, it seemed quite likely that the United States would have to play a major part in the transportation of the necessary equipment, simply because Canada did not have enough ships or aircraft. For the same reason, the United States would have a significant part to play in the supply and maintenance of the line. However the Royal Canadian Air Force will be prepared to provide a proportion of both the supervisory and operational personnel of this early warning chain.

5. On 28 June, 1954, the Chiefs of Staff had for consideration the Third Interim Report prepared by the Canada-United States Military Study Group, which recommended that:

(a) the two Governments agree in principle to the need for the establishment of a distant early warning line across the most northerly practicable part of North America;

(b) militarily acceptable characteristics of such a line be developed;

(c) systems studies be initiated for the purpose of developing detailed recommendations on the specifications, types of equipment, over-all system composition, cost estimates, manpower requirements and the exact location of the line.

6. While the Canadian Chiefs of Staff agreed to recommendations (b) and (c) above they felt it would be preferable to withhold seeking government approval in principle for the construction of the distant early warning line until further study by the Military Study Group and the Systems Engineering Group brought to light the full implications of the proposed distant early warning line.

7. However, as the President of the United States has now approved the proposal for the need of a far northern line, the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff have requested, through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, at its last meeting held in July, 1954, extract from Journal attached as Appendix "B",³¹ that Canadian Government agreement in principle be obtained on the need for the far northern early warning line. It was pointed out that approval in principle by the two Governments would assist the United States authorities in seeking the required appropriations, which was necessarily a process requiring some time. It was further stated that the United States was willing to carry all or any part of the burden involved in constructing and operating the far northern line, depending upon the wishes of the Canadian Government as to the extent of Canadian participation.

8. It is suggested that approval in principle be given to the need for a far northern early warning line without prejudice and subject to further review when the necessary studies have been completed and the details and cost of the undertaking are available.

Dear Mr. Pearson:

DISTANT EARLY WARNING LINE

As I have suggested to Dr. MacKay, I think it would be preferable, if possible, to defer presentation of the P.J.B.D. proposals to Cabinet until Mr. Campney's return which will be at the end of this week.³²

In the event, however, you are of the opinion that the urgency is such that it cannot wait, there is one point not mentioned in the paper which you might raise orally.

Looking at the map accompanying the submission to Cabinet (Appendix "A"),† it will be seen that the seawings run from the Azores to Alaska and there joined to the Alaskan Radar Network on the Pacific side, and in the Atlantic run from the Azores to Argentina, joining the Newfoundland Radar Network. This is, I understand, the present U.S.N. proposal, but on the Atlantic side there is the grave defect that between the eastern end of the proposed D.E.W. Line along the Arctic Coast and the western end of the Atlantic seawing, the Distant Early Warning Line and the Labrador Early Warning Line will be one and the same. The result is that while in the Pacific and in the Canadian Arctic distant early warning is provided, across the run in from the northern tip of Labrador to the two Argentina, there is in essence no early warning for Canada.

At the Service level, representations have been made to the United States of our concern regarding this gap, but the expressions of concern have, of necessity, been limited to representations by either the R.C.A.F. or the Department of National Defence. It would probably be helpful if in future discussions one could quote the concern of the Canadian Government and its view that the line from the Azores to

³² Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Agreed L.B. P[earson]

Canada should be oriented northwards so as to provide distant early warning in the same degree as the line across the Arctic.

Even though the United States is to provide, pay for, and operate the seawings, it seems we are justified in putting forward our views regarding them in that the distant early warning system of which the stations to be located on Canadian territory are an integral part, does not make sense unless the eastern end of the land element is continued easterly over the sea towards the tip of Greenland.

It probably would not be desirable to establish as a condition precedent to our agreement to the principle, that the Atlantic seawing be reoriented, but when we inform the United States that the Canadian Government agrees with the United States Government on the need of additional early warning line that our representatives can communicate the concern of the Government regarding the present proposed location of the Atlantic seawing.

Yours sincerely,
C.M. DRURY

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE; DISTANT EARLY WARNING LINE

17. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of June 30th, 1954, said that a recommendation had been prepared in the Department of National Defence concerning radar defence coverage for Canada and, in particular, the distant early warning line. It would be recalled that the most southerly line, commonly known as "Pinetree", had been approved and was in operation except for one or two stations. This was a joint Canada-U.S. chain, whose cost and manning were being shared. The Cabinet had recently approved the construction, at Canadian expense, of a mid-continent line running approximately along the 55th parallel of latitude. Seaward extensions of the whole system from Alaska to Hawaii in the Pacific and from Newfoundland to the Azores in the Atlantic were being undertaken by the United States. The Canada-U.S. military study group had recommended the approval in principle of the establishment of a distant early warning line running along the northern coast of the continent. This additional chain was designed to provide sufficient warning to enable the U.S. strategical air force aircraft to be deployed off their bases to avoid destruction, to allow further preparation for the deployment of fighters and to assist civil defence purposes. Present American thinking envisaged the chain being constructed in one season as a task force operation regardless of how the cost might ultimately be shared. It seemed likely that the United States would have to play a major part in the construction of the project simply because Canada did not have enough facilities for such a large task force operation. However, the R.C.A.F. would be prepared to provide a proportion of both the supervisory and operational personnel of this chain. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff had agreed that militarily acceptable characteristics of the line be developed and that systems studies be initiated but had not sought government approval in principle of the project until further studies brought to light the full implication of the proposal. More recently, however, the President of the United States had approved the need for the line and the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence had requested that Canadian government agreement in principle be obtained. According to United States authorities, the deferment of such agreement would have an adverse affect on the development of United States plans, organization and fiscal arrangements, and the fundamental decision was very important in enlisting the full support of the many agencies which in one way or another would be concerned with the project. It was further stated that the United States would be willing to carry all or any part of the burden involved in constructing and operating the line depending upon the wishes of Canada.

It was suggested that approval in principle be given to a far northern early warning line without prejudice and subject to further review when the necessary studies had been completed and the details and the cost of the undertaking were available.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Minister of National Defence, July 29, 1954 — Cab. Doc. 173-54).

18. Mr. Pearson thought it would be preferable to defer decision on the proposal until a later meeting when Mr. Campney could be present. However, he would like to be in a position to indicate, if necessary, that the matter was being considered by the government since the United States government were pressing hard for Canada to take some action on the recommendations and there had been suggestions in U.S. quarters that we were not proceeding as rapidly as we might with respect to continental defence. Personally, there was no doubt in his mind that Canada would have to agree in principle to the proposal that a distant early warning line be established along the north shore of the mainland.

19. In the course of discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) If Canada did not agree to the establishment of the line or even to participating in the project to some extent, we would be faced with a proposal that the United States construct, man and operate the line wholly as an U.S. undertaking. It would be virtually impossible to withhold agreement to this suggestion. In the circumstances, while Canada might not be able to participate in the actual construction of the line, it would be desirable to have a share in its maintenance and operation;

(b) The eastern seawing, as presently envisaged, ran from Cape Race to the Azores. Between the eastern end of the Atlantic seawing there would be a gap for distant early warning purposes. It would be helpful if, in future discussions with the United States, concern over this matter be expressed and suggestions made that this particular segment be moved northward. This, of course, would remain a part of the system whose personnel and costs would be borne by the United States.

(c) There was no estimate of costs for the distant early warning line available and before a decision were taken, it would be helpful if some information about costs could be made available and also if an estimate could be provided of the Canadian personnel and other resources which might be involved.

(d) A further factor bearing on the proposal related to reports which scientists in the United States had received concerning Soviet thermonuclear developments. What information was available appeared to indicate that the effect of these weapons was greater than had been heretofore envisaged. This meant there would be greater pressure exerted to proceed rapidly with the construction of radar warning facilities.

20. The Cabinet deferred decision, to a later meeting on the proposal to approve in principle the need for a far northern early warning air defence line.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE; DISTANT EARLY WARNING LINE

11. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting of August 11th, expressed the opinion that there was no alternative but to approve, in principle, the United States proposal for early construction of a far northern early warning line subject to further review when the necessary studies had been completed and the details and cost of the undertaking were available.

12. In the course of discussion it was suggested that, although the government should approve the proposal in principle now, decision should be reserved as to the nature and extent of Canadian participation. Quite apart from the financial contribution the Canadian government might eventually make and the extent to which Canadian Armed Forces would participate in the operation and maintenance of this line, careful consideration should be given to the proposed locations of the various stations and to the extent to which U.S. military authorities proposed to employ local labour in the actual construction of the line.

13. The Cabinet agreed that the Canadian Ambassador in Washington be instructed to inform the United States government,

(a) that the Canadian government agreed, in principle, to the need for the establishment of a distant early warning line across the most northerly practicable part of North America, without prejudice, however, to the extent of Canadian participation and subject to further review when preliminary studies had been completed and the details and cost of the undertaking were available; and,

(b) that the Canadian government was seriously concerned over the fact that the proposed seaward wing of the distant early warning line on the Atlantic side of the continent would give only little early warning of the approach of hostile aircraft from the northeast, and that the Canadian government, therefore, urged that every effort be made by the agencies responsible for planning the various segments of the distant early warning line to select an alternative route with a view to remedying this defect.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

Dear Dr. Hannah,

I write to you to let you know personally and confidentially that the serious difficulties which arose over the acceptance by the Government of Canada of the proposals which we made in para. 4 of the P.J.B.D. Journal covering our meetings 12-15 July, 1954, have now been resolved and that I expect that in the course of the next few days our Ambassador in Washington will be instructed to call at the State Department and formally present the text of the Canadian Government Decision which will give agreement in principle to the need for a DEW line across the most northerly practicable part of North America; such agreement being, as we agreed in our meeting, without prejudice to the extent of Canadian participation and subject to further revision when the preliminary studies have been completed and details of and costs of the undertaking are available.

Our formal communication will express our consciousness that the value to be obtained from the land segment is directly related to the effectiveness of the flanking extensions, and very especially to those on the Atlantic side as against the approach of hostile aircraft from the north-east, where, as was pointed out at the P.J.B.D. meeting, the present plans give only minimal early warning. Our note will express the hope that the various agencies responsible for planning the various segments of the DEW line will use every endeavour to remedy this defect.³³

I feel sure that our Ambassador, in presenting this information, will stress that it is a most important policy matter on which there must be no release of information to press or public until there has been further discussion which would eventuate in the preparation of an agreed joint statement for release by the Governments on a specific date.

³³ La note du Canada, N° 480, a été livrée au Département d'État le 2 septembre 1954.

The Canadian note, Number 480, was delivered to the Department of State on September 2, 1954.

Naturally, I am deeply concerned, and I feel sure you are also, at the time which has been required to bring this matter to the present satisfactory point.

You will recall that I spoke to you by telephone on the afternoon of 19 July, 1954, when I advised you that immediately on my return to Ottawa I had made the rounds of the Canadian authorities especially concerned, and seen to it that they were provided with copies of para. 4 of our Journal; that I had fully explained the matter and that these explanations had been sympathetically received; and that I had been assured that it was hoped the question could be dealt with at the Cabinet meeting the following week. Unfortunately, the Minister of Defence was not able to return to Ottawa until the next week following, and by this time we were in the midst of upset which followed the unfortunate press account of your interview on 31 July, 1954, and its reference to the "mid-Canada line".³⁴

I am sure you will appreciate the serious impact of the release of this information, which was the first public intimation of such a decision by the Canadian Government, and which came at the very unfortunate moment when our Ministers were in the midst of their discussions relative to the form and content of the statement being prepared by the Minister of National Defence for release to the Canadian public on the first appropriate occasion.³⁵

However, I think now that despite this anticipation of a formal announcement by the Government of Canada on a matter of primary Canadian concern that the situation has been dealt with on its merits. It is, I think, when we are in trouble due to the development of some difficulty in inter-governmental cooperation that there should be the most complete passage of information between you and I, so that we can do everything within our capacity to clear matters and profit by experience, and I hope therefore you will agree that I should have written you in complete frankness.

With kindest personal regards and best wishes,

Very sincerely yours,

A.G.L. MCNAUGHTON

COMMAND OF CONTINENTAL DEFENCE FORCES

Introduction

The Joint Planning Committee recently submitted to the Chiefs of Staff Committee a paper entitled "Command of Continental Defence Forces" which recommended that consideration be given to having Canada take the initiative now to discuss with the United States authorities the appointment of a Commander-in-Chief, Air Defence. In taking the initiative at this stage, rather than waiting until an emergency arose, the J.P.C. considered that a command arrangement more satisfactory to Canada might be developed.

2. In arriving at this recommendation the report notes that "the present system of planning and control of land, sea and air forces other than air defence forces is adequate" and that only in the area of air defence is a more effective structure for planning and control of Continental Defences desirable. It concludes that the most satisfactory arrangement for Canada would be a Command Organization subordinate to the Chiefs of Staff Committee of the Canada-U.S. Regional Planning Group, or, if this was unacceptable to the United States, subordinate to the Canadian and United States Chiefs co-equally.

3. In the following sections this paper will attempt to describe briefly the existing air defence system, and to outline the major political implications stemming from the implementation of the J.P.C. recommendation.

The Present Air Defence System

4. For the past several years Canada and the United States, individually and jointly, have been at work constructing an elaborate and very costly network of air defences for the North American Continent. This system of defences, which will take several more years to complete, includes extensive radar lines, interceptor fighter bases, anti-aircraft and guided missile installations, extensive communication facilities, and a complex organization for civil defence.

5. This programme, which is based on the principle of "defence in depth", is designed to meet the threat of Russian attack by jet aircraft capable of delivering thermonuclear bombs to any target in North America. The development of the continental defence system to meet this threat has been greatly accelerated during the past year, not only as a result of the vastly increased power of the U.S.S.R., but also as a consequence of the belief of the United States that North America would be the primary target in another world war.

6. The principle of defence in depth requires, (1), the construction of parallel radar warning chains across possible lines of attack, (2), air defence forces, interceptor aircraft, anti-aircraft and guided missile units — to destroy the invading aircraft and, (3), an effective civil defence organization. The proposed Distant Early Warning Line in the Canadian Arctic and the extension to Hawaii in the west, and the Azores in the east, is intended to provide the first indication of attack and to alert the entire air defence and civil defence system.

7. From the time invading aircraft reach the leading edge of the mid-Canada or "tactical warning line" until the time they leave it, this chain and the Pinetree radar system will ultimately enable the Air Defence Forces to "track" the direction and speed of the attack and, therefore, to intercept and continually engage the invader with all the fighter aircraft, guided missile and anti-aircraft forces available.

8. To function with maximum effectiveness the air defence system should be fully integrated under a single commander, with sub-areas determined on the basis of geographical considerations and the probable direction of approach of enemy aircraft. Under present circumstances the various North American commands with an air defence role are only coordinated with boundaries determined on a political basis. It would not be possible to change the existing arrangements rapidly because it would require a great deal of careful planning, the establishment of communications facilities, and the training of a command staff. If, therefore, there is any intention of having the most effective command system in operation when the emergency develops, action to establish it must be taken now rather than later.

The Implications of an Integrated Air Defence Command

(A) The Command of the Air Defence Forces

9. The central and most significant problem is whether Canada is prepared to have the responsibility for the air defence of Canada, including the command of Canadian air defence forces, vested in a United States officer. Although Canada and the United States have agreed that both the Canadian and the United States Air Defence Commanders should have the power, in the event of war, to authorize the redeployment of R.C.A.F. Air Defence Forces to the United States (and the redeployment of U.S.A.F. Air Defence Forces to Canada), it is quite a different question to have all Canada's air defence forces and installations commanded continuously by an American located, in all probability, in the United States. Whether or not Canada is prepared to accept this surrender of its sovereignty in the interest of the defence of North America is the most difficult and the most important issue.

10. With this development of the air defence of North America, in which the United States will make much the larger contribution, in money and manpower, Canada will be faced with an increasingly difficult problem arising from the construction of more United States bases and, therefore, the stationing of greater numbers of United States service personnel in Canada. At present there is an agreement between Canada and the United States which specifies that any forces located in Canada will be under the operational control of a Canadian commander. It seems probable that under an integrated air defence command, the command areas, as the

J.P.C. paper notes, would run north and south across the International Boundary. A Canadian might be designated as the commander of one of these areas, but others would no doubt be headed by Americans.

11. Quite clearly it would be difficult, except within very broad general principles, to deny the commander the authority to deploy his forces in what he considers to be the most effective and efficient dispositions. It follows, therefore, that the air defence forces of either country might be deployed to meet a threat over the territory of the other country. For example, unless the joint arrangements provided otherwise, interceptors from Eastern Canada might be diverted to meet an attack aimed at the New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburg area. This, however, is probably unlikely in view of the fact that Canadian air bases are for the most part astride lines of approach from Russia to the United States.

The Proposed Integrated Air Defence Command and NATO

12. If it is agreed that the air defences of Canada and the United States should be integrated, the most important problem in connection with the structure of the command is whether or not it should be established within the framework of NATO and, as a consequence, responsible to the CUSRPC. As noted in the J.P.C. paper, the United States, as a result of its disclosure policy, might find it difficult to accept a command responsible to the Chiefs of Staff Committee of the CUS Region. On the other hand the establishment of a command outside NATO could have a very serious impact on the effectiveness of NATO in that it would deepen the split between the North American and the European members of NATO and would give grounds for the suspicion that the United States was gradually reverting to a strategy in which Europe would be left to save itself.

13. In connection with the possibility of relating an integrated command to NATO, it might be noted that at present the Canada-U.S. Region is the only NATO area which does not have a combined command. The establishment of a North American command outside the NATO framework would, therefore, sharply accentuate the weakness of the link between the North American and the European members of NATO. The propaganda advantages to the Soviet Union of this development merit careful consideration. Although this problem need not delay preliminary discussions to examine the possibility of establishing an integrated air defence command, it would seem of the greatest importance that any integrated command should be directly related to NATO.

Planning the Development of the Continental Air Defence System

14. Canada, as suggested above, would benefit directly from the integration of the continental air defence system through the more effective use of air defence forces. It might also be argued that under an integrated command it would also benefit through its participation with the United States in the planning and development of the continental air defence network. Moreover, if the procedure for integration were developed now rather than in the face of an emergency there would be more opportunity for it to be shaped in a form acceptable to Canada.

15. The United States, facing the vastly increased power of the Soviet Union, has committed itself to an extensive and costly programme to expand and strengthen the air defences of North America. As noted earlier, the Canadian Government has so far agreed, in general, with this programme of development, and it is unlikely that it would refuse to participate jointly, or to permit the United States, by itself, to proceed with the construction of any project which the latter is convinced is required for these defences on Canadian territory.

16. It seems clear, therefore, that regardless of whether or not an integrated air defence command is established, it will have little effect on the development of the air defence system. It might, however, be argued that, if such a command is established, participation in the planning of the programme might provide a more effective method than exists at present of influencing the construction of the continental air defence system.

Conclusion

17. The U.S.S.R. has or will soon have the capability of crippling seriously the war-making capacity of North America. Since the United States is convinced that North America will be the primary target in the event of total war, it has undertaken an extensive programme to develop and strengthen the air defences of the continent. At present the command organization of the air defences of North America is not as efficient as it would be if it were integrated. If the Canadian Government is in agreement with the United States that the security of North America is seriously threatened, and that defensive arrangements should be developed to the greatest possible degree of effectiveness, it seems essential that the question of an integrated air defence command should be carefully considered without further delay, bearing in mind that at least two or three years of careful planning and preparation will be required before an efficient integrated organization can be developed.

Proposed Amendments to the J.P.C. Analysis

18. Since External Affairs participated in the preparation of the attached J.P.C. Paper, there is little we can add to the main argument. However there are one or two points which you might raise during its consideration by the Chiefs of Staff Committee.

(1) We would recommend that the conclusion be qualified by adding:

“the appointment to take effect when the two countries agree that the establishment of an integrated air defence command is desirable and necessary.”

This modification would make it possible for the planners of both countries to evolve suitable measures without any implied commitment to put the plan into effect immediately.

(2) We would suggest that before the Chiefs of Staff Committee takes final action on the Paper, it should, if this has not already been done, refer it to the Air Defence Command of the R.C.A.F. in order to obtain its opinion on the analysis and the recommendations.

(3) We would suggest that, if and when a recommendation on this matter is submitted to Cabinet Defence Committee, it should include both military and political considerations, and should be submitted jointly by the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. (Mr. MacKay agreed with this suggestion when the J.P.C. Paper was sent to him for information on July 23, 1954).³⁶

Dear [Admiral Radford]:

As agreed at the meeting of consultation last Friday afternoon, I am setting out herein considerations and suggestions of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff regarding a re-appraisal of the problem of continental defence, particularly in view of the advances made by Soviet Russia in the fields of mass destruction weapons, bomber aircraft and the possible effects of fall-out of atomic and thermonuclear weapons.³⁷

The Canadian Chiefs of Staff consider that we must assume that sooner or later the Russians will have accumulated sufficient information on fall-out to realize some of the potent advantages of this phenomenon. It is considered that the possible effects of fall-out may mean that the Russians will need fewer weapons and carriers to accomplish the same neutralization task of this continent than they previously estimated. Also, as the permissible error of weapon delivery has been greatly increased, it may reduce the need for highly skilled bomb aimers and for accurate blind-bombing radar equipment. Furthermore, this permissible error may simplify some of the problems of propulsion and guidance of intercontinental weapons and, if this is right, it may be possible for the Russians to significantly move ahead the timing of successful development of intercontinental weapons.

Taking into consideration all these factors mentioned above, Soviet Russia might be in a position where they may feel they have sufficient potential to render a crippling attack on the retaliatory capacity of North America and advance the date on which they may be prepared to risk a third world war. In view of this, the Canadian Chiefs of Staff consider that a re-appraisal of our position in regard to continental defence, taking into consideration the recent Soviet developments in the fields of mass destruction weapons and their carriers and the question of fall-out, is urgently required.

We consider that the problem of timing has serious implications for both Canada and the United States, but particularly for Canada, if the present arrangements for the production of our own air defence weapons are to be continued. As you are aware, in 1946 we took a decision to develop an all-weather fighter aircraft, the CF-100, for continental defence. This decision to develop an all-weather fighter in Canada was taken only after a very careful review of all the all-weather fighter aircraft being developed in the United States and the United Kingdom and it was found that none of the types under development would meet the requirements for continental defence in Canada. However, the specifications for this aircraft were written to meet the threat of the TU-4, but the predicted characteristics of the new Soviet Type 37 aircraft will render the CF-100 inadequate for this task. Last year we took a decision to produce a successor to the CF-100 and the specifications were drawn up before there was knowledge of the T-37. This new aircraft is expected to be able to deal with the T-37 type but it is not expected to be available for squadron use before 1959-60. Therefore, if Russia is able to produce sufficient T-37 aircraft to attack the North American continent before 1959-60, we will not have anything capable of dealing with this Soviet threat. Further, if intercontinental weapons are developed successfully by 1960 by the Russians, it is not considered that even this new type of aircraft could deal with this type of attack.

These implications affecting our own production of air defence weapons are mentioned to emphasize the need for more positive joint action in preparing to meet this potential new threat. In our opinion, there is no time for unilateral development and further, we have grave doubts as to whether there is sufficient scientific and technical ability available in Canada to achieve success in the more advanced fields of air defence weapons, such as air-to-air and ground-to-air guided missiles with atomic warheads, in time to meet this new threat. Because of these considerations, we are rapidly reaching the stage where the development of a suitable weapons system for the defence of the North American continent must be a joint operation between our two countries in almost every respect. Although we are well aware that there may be many difficult technical and legal obstacles to overcome to achieve such a joint development we feel, in spite of such difficulties, there is an urgent need to re-examine this problem together because if we do not succeed in obtaining the right answer in time, our survival may be in danger.

In the light of the above, and fully realizing that there may be many legal difficulties to overcome, we would like to make the following suggestions as to how this problem may be examined:

(a) Initiate a joint study to define clearly the effects of fall-out. This will have to be a scientific study, and the security difficulties imposed by your present regulations are appreciated.

(b) After the effect of fall-out has been defined clearly enough for military understanding, initiate a study on the effects of fall-out on the present plans for the defence of North America.

(c) After the effects of fall-out on present plans are clarified, pursue a re-examination of our weapons system for the defence of North America.

(d) Finally, resulting from the above, initiate a study to determine a joint approach for the implementation of a revised weapons system.

Since my return from Washington, I have been able to give this matter further study. I have recently learned that the Atomic Energy Commission have proposed a tri-partite conference on 18 October to discuss fall-out measurements and it may be possible to use an extension of this conference to provide the necessary information on fall-out which will be required for a re-appraisal of our continental defence problem. I have been examining some of the legal obstacles and I think it might be worth mentioning that there may be a possibility of resolving the legal obstacles by means of existing agreements we have for securing restricted data directly from the Atomic Energy Commission under Section 144A of the Atomic Energy Act, and that this channel might well be used for securing any additional information in regard to fall-out which is not obtained at the meeting to be held on 18 October.

I hope you will advise me of the views of the United States Chiefs of Staff after you have had time to give this problem due consideration.

Yours sincerely,

CHARLES FOULKES

COMMAND OF CONTINENTAL DEFENCE FORCES

Following Representative Sterling Cole's speech last winter in which he began his campaign for the establishment of an integrated command for North American Defence Forces, the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff asked the Joint Planning Committee to prepare a paper on this subject. The Joint Planning Committee's analysis of the problem was submitted to the 568th Meeting of the Chiefs of Staff Committee held on September 21, 1954. I am enclosing for your information a copy of the Joint Planning Committee's paper to which we contributed, and a copy of a departmental memorandum discussing the implications of the implementation of the Joint Planning Committee's recommendations.

2. I quote below from the Minutes of the Chiefs of Staff Committee meeting at which the Joint Planning Committee paper was considered:

"VI. Command of Continental Defence Forces

26. The Committee had for consideration a report by the Joint Planning Committee regarding arrangements for command and control of United States-Canada military forces allocated to the defence of Canada, United States and Alaska. It was recommended that Canada take the initiative to discuss with the United States authorities the appointment of a Commander-in-Chief, Air Defence.

27. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff stated that recent informal talks with the Chairman, United States Joint Chiefs of Staff indicated that the United States authorities were not pressing for immediate action. He considered it desirable that interim discussions should take place and a plan formulated which could readily be put before the Government for approval in case of an emergency. Among the many implications which would require full investigation was the problem of communications.

28. The Chief of the Air Staff considered it would be most desirable to have Canadian planning elements integrated with United States Air Force planners. He was considering the advisability of placing a portion of the planning element of Air Defence Command, St. Hubert with the United States Air Defence Command at Colorado Springs. This group would study United States procedures and participate in the planning of air defence exercises at the working level.

29. The Committee noted the report of the Joint Planning Committee and agreed that:

(a) Canada should not at this time take the initiative to discuss with United States authorities the appointment of a Commander-in-Chief, Air Defence;

(b) it would be desirable to have an element of Air Defence Command, St. Hubert, stationed with United States Air Force Air Defence Command at Colorado Springs; and

(c) the Chief of the Air Staff would make a further study of the problems involved, including recommendations, and make recommendations to the Chiefs of Staff in due course."

3. Since, as you will note in paragraph 29(c) above, this matter may again be considered by the Chiefs of Staff Committee, we would appreciate having any comments you might wish to make on the papers which are enclosed.

BRIEFING ON NOVEMBER 5 BY CHAIRMAN OF CHIEFS OF STAFF ON PROPOSED RADAR CHAINS

Attached is a memorandum from DL(1) giving an account of General Foulkes' briefing to Officers of National Defence on above subject. I cannot but feel that General Foulkes gave his Officers quite an unfair impression of the discussion at

Committee of the Chiefs of Staff.³⁸ Despite the report of the PJBD which was forwarded to the Chiefs of Staff and despite our letter† and memorandum,† pointing out the necessity of speedy action, the chairman deliberately kept the item off Chiefs of Staff agenda. He did however make a brief reference to it but intimated no action was required by the Chiefs of Staff Committee, pending consideration of the minutes of the PJBD at the next meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee. This would certainly have had the effect of delaying action on the American request. However, other members of the Committee pushed the Chairman into getting in contact that day with Admiral Radford and getting joint agreement between the two chairmen to refer the matter at once to the Military Study Group with a view of having a report ready for the next meeting of the Cabinet Defence Committee.

I feel also that General Foulkes' comments on the question of integration of the various radar chains and their effectiveness by no means fairly reflect the discussion at Chiefs of Staff Committee. Dr. Solandt did raise the question as to whether proper integration between the DEW line and the Mongoose (or mid-Canada line), but after looking more closely at the proposals, he later expressed himself as satisfied. True, the Military authorities have as yet no answer to IBM (Intercontinental Ballistic Missile) which they predict for about 1962. But the technical people, including the RCAF seem to regard the radar chains, when "thickened up", plus replacement of the CF-100's with CF-105's and equipping of Air Defence Forces with the new self-propelled and "homing" weapons now being developed, are essential and reasonably effective for the time being.

I think General Foulkes' comments on our draft memorandum for Cabinet Defence Committee are also uncalled for. I suspect his real objection is not the contents of the memorandum but the fact that it came from External Affairs. The Chief of the Air Staff, the Vice-Chief of the Air Staff and Dr. Solandt all expressed privately favourable comments on our memorandum.

The real issue which seems to be shaping up is in simple terms whether the Government is to be guided by General Foulkes' opinion as to the urgency attached by the U.S. to the DEW line or the opinion of the U.S. Section of the PJBD who presumably spoke for the U.S. Administration.

Reference: Briefing by Chairman, Chiefs of Staff

THE PROPOSED RADAR CHAINS

At this morning's briefing, the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, gave a pessimistic review of his own thinking, which, I gathered, is shared by the Chiefs of Staff, on the development of the Mid-Canada and the Distant Early Warning Lines, and, in particular, External Affairs' draft submission to Cabinet Defence Committee which would authorize the U.S. to proceed with preliminary work on the DEW line. Since it is difficult to reconstruct his remarks in a coherent commentary, I have set them out, as he gave them, in a series of assertions.

(a) General Foulkes felt certain that Cabinet Defence Committee would not approve External Affairs' submission to authorize the U.S. to proceed with the DEW line until the MSG had completed its studies regarding the location of the entire line, composition, etc. It is to settle at least some of these questions that the MSG had been called together this week. Until these answers are available it will be impossible to arrive at a realistic estimate of costs, manpower, etc., which will enable the Canadian Government to decide on the extent to which it intends to participate in the construction and operation of the line.

(b) General Foulkes and the Chiefs of Staff were not, as yet, convinced that the Pinetree, Mid-Canada and the DEW lines fit into an integrated system which will offer the most effective and most economic warning network. At present, for example, the Mid-Canada line is being designed only for detection of aircraft, while DEW line planning calls for equipment which will identify as well as detect. If, then, the DEW line is able to provide warning of numbers, direction, speed, etc., of invading aircraft which will permit the SAC and interceptor forces to get into action, why bother with the Mid-Canada line when the Pinetree Chain will give final, and probably adequate, information on the probable targets of the invading forces. One must also take into account, he continued, the fact that Canada has extremely inadequate interceptor forces. Apparently, when the Chief of the General Staff asked how many of 150 invading jet bombers the RCAF could "kill", the Chief of the Air Staff replied "Probably three". What good, therefore, is the Mid-Canada line when there is little we can do?

(c) From this pessimistic thought, General Foulkes sank into an even deeper pessimism. As a recent J.I.C. paper[†] concluded, he noted, there is little likelihood of war for the next two years — roughly the period required to build the Mid-Canada and the DEW lines. Shortly after this time, we will be in the era of inter-continental missiles which will probably reach altitudes higher than the 100,000-foot capability listed as the "1965 requirement" for the DEW Line in the Report of the USAF-RCAF Military Characteristics Committee DEW Group† (which will be considered at the 570th Meeting of the Chiefs of Staff Committee, Monday, November 8, 1954). Is it not possible, therefore, that the proposed Mid-Canada and DEW lines are of questionable value?

(Although he didn't mention it this morning, I understand that General Foulkes has also made the point that, even though the plans for the DEW Line call for "the capability of being adapted to control of weapons" (recommended as a "1965 Requirement" in the Report mentioned in the foregoing paragraph), it is doubtful that the guided interceptor missiles would be capable of the speeds, altitudes, etc., necessary to destroy intercontinental ballistic missiles, even if they could be detected.)

(d) The RCAF has been working on the assumption, according to General Foulkes, that the DEW Line will be constructed, financed and manned by the U.S. This, he considers, is completely incorrect since he believes that the Canadian Government would wish to participate. Otherwise the Mid-Canada Line will be referred to as the "Canadian Line", the DEW Line will be called the "American Line", and Canadians and Americans will get the impression that the U.S. was assuming responsibility for, and control of the Canadian Arctic.

(e) General Foulkes made a vague, off-hand remark to the effect that Western Electric, as the management contractor, is in this business for profit and has, therefore, an interest in promoting it as quickly as possible.

(f) As reported earlier this week, General Foulkes confirmed that Admiral Radford, Chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, was not as anxious to proceed with the far northern line as the U.S. Section P.J.B.D. had suggested at the October 1954 meeting. (Although I am not sure of this point, I got the impression from the General's remarks that Admiral Radford was also having doubts about the overall effectiveness and usefulness of the Pinetree-Mid-Canada and DEW lines.) General Foulkes concluded his comments on this aspect by stating that he was not at all clear from the P.J.B.D. conference "what the U.S. actually want".

(g) General Foulkes concluded the briefing with the urgent directive that the RCAF immediately prepare a submission to Cabinet, or Cabinet Defence Committee, concerning the extensions of the Mid-Canada line westward from the Alberta-B.C. boundary, and eastward from Hopedale in Labrador.³⁹

Dear General Foulkes,

DISTANT EARLY WARNING SYSTEM

As the military members of the Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence have no doubt informed you, at the meeting held on October 18 and 19 the U.S. Section of the Board stated that on the basis of the latest report received from the Western Electric Company, the United States now considered that the feasibility of constructing an effective Distant Early Warning System at a reasonable cost had been established and that the technical and logistic data necessary to start work on the sites during the 1955 construction season was available. The U.S. plan envisaged that construction and installation of equipment would be completed by March, 1957, and that operational testing of the line would begin by July, 1957. If this schedule were to be met it would be necessary for the two governments to reach agreement at once on the initial arrangements for the construction of the line since the management contractor would have to start immediately to place orders for heavy equipment, begin procurement of supplies and negotiate transportation contracts. In particular the air lift would have to be completed before the spring break-up next May or June and steps would have to be taken to supplement existing facilities on the Mackenzie River system and along the Arctic coast from Tuk Tuk to Cambridge Bay.

2. The Canadian Chairman said that the Canadian Section of the Board would present to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff the information furnished by the U.S. Section with respect to the estimated cost of the project, the man-power implications and other details which would affect the Canadian decision on the subject. (I understand that the RCAF Member is submitting a report to you on these matters). General McNaughton also told the U.S. Section that the Canadian Section would seek to have the Canadian Government reach a decision on the terms under which the Canadian Government might authorize the construction of that part of the system to be situated in Canada and on the question of Canadian participation in the project.

3. In order to facilitate consideration of the U.S. proposal I have had prepared the attached draft memorandum to the Cabinet Defence Committee. It is appreciated that it may be necessary to modify it, possibly substantially, to reflect the views of the Chiefs of Staff Committee and the Department of National Defence. I propose that the draft might be discussed at the next meeting of the Chiefs of Staff Committee, following which we might submit the memorandum with any agreed revisions to our Ministers for approval.

4. I am circulating copies of the draft memorandum to the Deputy Ministers of Defence Production, Northern Affairs, Transport, National Revenue, Citizenship and Immigration, and Labour. In my letters to these Departments I will emphasize that the draft has not yet been considered either by the Chiefs of Staff Committee or by the Ministers of National Defence and External Affairs.

[Ottawa, November, 1954]

DISTANT EARLY WARNING SYSTEM

Introduction

Military developments during the past year have made it clear that the establishment of a comprehensive early warning system at the earliest possible date is vital for the protection against air attack of North American air bases required for launching retaliatory forces in event of attack, as well as for the protection of major centres of population and industry.

2. For this reason the Government decided, on June 30, 1954, that Canada should construct, operate, and meet the cost of the Mid-Canada early warning line. In addition, the Government, on August 18, 1954, agreed in principle to the need for the establishment of a distant early warning line across the most northerly practicable part of North America, without prejudice, however, to the extent of Canadian participation and subject to further review when preliminary studies had been completed and the details and cost of the undertaking were available.

3. The United States, for its part, initiated a project in 1953 (carried out by the Western Electric Co. and known successively as project Counterchange, Corrode and 572) to investigate ways of establishing a distant early warning line. In addition, the United States notified Canada through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence at the July 1954 meeting that it was taking steps to establish seaward extensions to the early warning system, from Kodiak to Hawaii, and from Argentina to the Azores. Subsequently, when Canada informed the United States of its agreement in principle to the need for a distant early warning line, the Canadian Government expressed concern that the seaward extension on the Atlantic side should provide as much early warning as possible and be compatible with the land-based early warning system.

United States Proposal

4. At the October, 1954, meeting of the PJBD, the U.S. Section of the Board stated that on the basis of the latest report received from the Western Electric Co., the United States now considered that the feasibility of constructing an effective distant early warning line at a reasonable cost had been established, and that the technical and logistic data necessary to start work on the sites during the 1955 construction season was available. If this were done the U.S. Government believed that it was possible for the system to be operating in 1957.

5. The Western Electric Company, which the United States proposes to appoint as management contractor, estimates that the total cost of the line, from Cape Lisburne, in North-Western Alaska, to Resolution Island in Hudson Strait, would be $200 million (see Appendix "A").† The line would consist of a combination of scanning radars and modified McGill fence equipment, and its operation is estimated to involve from 700 to 1000 men (For details of personnel requirements see Appendix "B").† The principal communication channels to the Air Defence Commands would be through radio relay stations at Hay River and Churchill.

6. The plan developed by the Western Electric Company to meet the target date of 1957 is dependent on being able to carry out all construction and major installation work during the 1955 and 1956 construction seasons, which in northern latitudes are very short. The plan envisages that construction and installation of equipment would be completed by March, 1957, and that operational testing of the line would begin by July, 1957. Four major approach routes would be used for the movement of supplies. Supplies for the section from Western Alaska to the Mackenzie delta would be brought in by ship from the Pacific Coast. Materials for the section from the mouth of the Mackenzie as far east as approximately Cambridge Bay would be brought in via the Mackenzie River. Materials for the eastern portion of the line would be supplied by ship from the Atlantic coast. In addition it would be necessary to move materials required at the beginning of the 1955 season by rail to Churchill, and from there by air to Cambridge Bay and Coral Harbour (see Appendix "C").†

7. The United States representatives emphasized that if the schedule planned by Western Electric was to be met it would be necessary to start at once to place orders for heavy equipment, begin procurement of supplies, and negotiate transportation contracts. In particular the airlift would have to be completed before the spring break-up next May or June, and steps would have to be taken to supplement existing facilities on the Mackenzie river system, and along the Arctic coast from Tuk Tuk to Cambridge Bay.

Intergovernmental Arrangements

10. The chairman of the U.S. Section of the Board said that if the time schedule contemplated by the United States was to be met, it would be necessary for the two Governments to reach early agreement on the initial arrangements for the construction of the line. The United States was prepared to accept full responsibility for the project but it would welcome Canadian participation on any basis which the Canadian Government might propose. He said the U.S. Government was aware that Canada had accepted a heavy commitment in undertaking to construct the Mid-

Canada Line and appreciated that for this reason Canadian participation in the Distant Early Warning project might necessarily be limited. He added that the U.S. Government and Western Electric, its proposed management contractor, in awarding sub-contracts for the various elements of the project, and in the procurement of supplies, would wish to take fullest advantage of all available resources both in Canada and the United States. It was intended to establish a project office in New York, and the participation of Canadian agencies in this project office would be welcomed as a means of ensuring that full use was made of Canadian resources.

Location of the DEW System

11. When the question of the compatibility of the land based early warning system with that over the Atlantic approach route was raised, the U.S. Section said that the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff had approved the Fourth Interim Report of the Canada-U.S. Military Study Group, which recommended that comprehensive studies be initiated regarding extensions to cover flanking approach routes to ensure that all segments of the distant early system were developed in a timely and compatible manner. These studies (with Canadian participation) had already been launched. However the final selection of the Atlantic seaward detection system hinged on the question of feasibility, and until the various alternatives had been fully investigated, it would not be possible to settle the matter.

12. It is understood that the combined U.S.-Canadian Location Study Team is satisfied with the general route of the DEW line from Alaska as far east as approximately Cambridge Bay, but is concerned about the section from Cambridge Bay to Resolution Island for two reasons:

- (a) the southward bend in line reduces the amount of early warning;
- (b) if the western end of the Atlantic seaward extension were shifted from Argentina to Greenland, then the eastern terminus of the land section should, if possible, be closer to Greenland, e.g., Padloping Island or Frobisher Bay instead of Resolution Island.

13. It is almost certain that if the eastern section of the line were to be moved further north it would run into terrain problems which would either greatly increase construction difficulties or necessitate re-routing and lengthening the line. This would of course be reflected in the cost of the project.

Factors Affecting Decision of Canadian Government

14. The first question to be decided by Canada is whether or not it is prepared to concur in the immediate initiation of the project. It would seem that there are two possible reasons for deferring authorization to begin construction:

- (a) insufficient information on costs, manpower requirements, site locations, technical data, etc.;
- (b) absence of any firm indication that the Atlantic seaward extension will be compatible with the land based system.

15. The adequacy and precision of the information now available as a basis for immediate initiation of the project is certainly open to question. It is doubtful however, that even a year's further study would significantly affect much of the data already at hand, and the answers to many of the problems involved can only be found through experience. The location of the eastern part of the line is an immediate problem, but one which can be expected to be resolved within a relatively short period. If this is the case, then the United States proposal to start at once on initial construction arrangements is defensible.

16. Assuming that the United States will select the best possible feasible route for the Atlantic seaward extension, then the question of whether its compatibility with the land-based system should affect the decision to initiate construction of the Distant Early Warning line would seem to hinge on whether the early warning line is of sufficient value to justify construction even if the United States comes to the conclusion that for the present at least the western terminus of the sea line must remain at Argentina. The United States, of course, believes that it is of sufficient value and should be constructed at once.

17. If it is decided that Canada should concur in the immediate initiation of the project, the next question is whether it is to be the sole responsibility of the United States, or whether Canada should participate in one way or another. The main argument in favour of Canadian participation is political and relates to the fact that failing such participation the United States will be operating a continuous chain of radar stations and communications facilities in Canada from the Alaska-Yukon border across the Canadian Arctic and down the Atlantic Coast to Cape Race. Stemming from this situation is the question of whether, under such circumstances, the Canadian Air Defence Commander would be able properly to exercise the control function assigned to him by the agreement on the principles of command currently in effect between the military authorities of the two countries.⁴⁰

18. It is suggested that in any case, if Canada is to participate, it should be in the operation rather than the construction of the system. Construction work will be essentially civilian in character and many of the sub-contractors will undoubtedly be Canadian. Any benefits which might accrue to Canada through accepting responsibility for part of the cost of construction would seem at best to be transitory.

19. The problem of how the system is to be manned and operated is complicated and will require study. The United States Air Force is giving some consideration to the possibility of civilian manning through a management contractor. If this were to be done the military role would presumably be limited to command and control, and the number of service personnel involved might be quite small. However there are obvious disadvantages to entrusting remote and important defence installations of this sort to civilians not subject to military discipline and possibly susceptible to labour unrest. It is considered therefore that if Canada concurs in the immediate construction of the system it should be on the understanding that the question of whether the system, or any of its parts, should be operated by military personnel or entrusted to a civilian agency should be a master for consultation between the two Governments. Likewise, the question of Canadian participation in the operation and manning of the system should be specified as a matter for later decision by Canada after full consultation with the United States.

Recommendation

20. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence, recommends:

(a) that Canada should concur in the construction by the United States of a Distant Early Warning system in Canadian territory, subject to the customary conditions governing United States defence projects in Canada;

(b) that Canada should reserve its position with respect to Canadian participation in the operation and manning of the system, and with respect to whether the line should be operated by military or civilian personnel;

(c) that the Canadian Ambassador in Washington should be authorized to deliver to the State Department the draft Note and Annex attached as Appendix "D" to this memorandum.⁴¹

We have been asked to transmit the following message from Outerbridge Horsey to the Secretary of the Canadian Section of the PJBD. Message Begins:

1. Proposed revision of paragraph 4.⁴²

⁴¹ La note provisoire et l'annexe constituent le document 483. Le paragraphe 5, la sous-section (d) et les deux dernières phrases du paragraphe 15 (garantissant le droit de l'ARC d'utiliser les terrains d'atterrissage américains) ont été ajoutées à la dernière version de ce document.

The draft note and annex is reproduced as Document 483. Paragraph 5, sub-section (d) and the final two sentences of paragraph 15 (ensuring the right of the RCAF to use U.S. air strips) were added to the latter version of this document.

In order to accelerate the negotiations, the United States was provided with a draft of the attachment to Document 481, along with the explanation that these were nominally the views of the Canadian Section of the PJBD.

"Canadian contractors will be extended equal consideration with United States contractors in the awarding of contracts for electronic equipment. For such purposes purchases from Canadian contractors will be deemed exempt from the provisions of the Buy America Act 41 US code 10 (A-D). Such procurement shall be accomplished by or under the supervision of the United States Department of the Air Force in the same manner as purchases of electronic equipment for its use within the United States, taking into consideration price (including transportation costs to point of installation) quality and delivery requirements. Subject to the above both the United States and Canada recognize the desirability of allocating the procurement of any piece of electronic equipment to such source whether United States or Canadian that is currently in production for such item or a closely related item."

2. This equalizing of the conditions is felt by our air force to be absolutely necessary in view of the interest of the United States industry. I understand that it is not intended or expected that this language would change what actually happens, i.e. where the contracts are placed. Our air force officials, including the Secretary himself feel that they cannot live with an agreement which on its face gives preference to Canadian contractors and therefore we have been asked to propose this alternative language.

3. There may be a few additional changes to propose within a few days but I do not think that any of them are of such substantial importance as this one.

Ottawa, November 10, 1954

DISTANT EARLY WARNING SYSTEM

Introduction

Military developments during the past year have made it clear that the establishment of a comprehensive early warning system at the earliest possible date is vital for the protection against air attack of North American air bases required for launching retaliatory forces in event of attack, as well as for the protection of major centres of population and industry.

2. For this reason the Government decided, on June 30, 1954, that Canada should construct, operate, and meet the cost of the Mid-Canada early warning line. In addition, the Government, on August 18, 1954, agreed in principle to the need for the establishment of a distant early warning line across the most northerly practicable part of North America, without prejudice, however, to the extent of Canadian participation and subject to further review when preliminary studies had been completed and the details and cost of the undertaking were available. At the same time the Government expressed to the United States its concern that the seaward extension on the Atlantic side should provide as much early warning as possible and be compatible with the land-based early warning system.

United States Proposal

3. At the October, 1954, meeting of the PJBD, the U.S. Section of the Board stated that on the basis of the latest report received from the Western Electric Co., which had been investigating the problem on behalf of the United States, that Government now considered that the feasibility of constructing an effective distant early warning line at a reasonable cost had been established, and that the technical and logistic data necessary to start work on the sites during the 1955 construction season was available. If this were done the U.S. Government believed that it was possible for the system to be operating in 1957.

4. The Western Electric Company, which the United States proposes to appoint as management contractor, estimates that the total cost of the line, from Cape Lisburne, in Northwestern Alaska, to Davis Strait, would be about $200 million (see Appendix "A").† The line would consist of a combination of scanning radars and modified McGill fence equipment, and its operation is estimated to involve from 700 to 1000 men (For details of personnel requirements see Appendix "B").† The principal communication channels to the Air Defence Commands would be through radio relay stations, possibly at Hay River and Churchill.

Intergovernmental Arrangements

5. The chairman of the U.S. Section of the PJBD said that if the system were to become operational in 1957, it would be necessary for the two Governments to reach early agreement on the initial arrangements for the construction of the line, since steps would have to be taken at once to place orders for heavy equipment, begin procurement of supplies, and negotiate transportation contracts. The United States was prepared to accept full responsibility for the project but it would welcome Canadian participation on any basis which the Canadian Government might propose. He said the U.S. Government was aware that Canada had accepted a heavy commitment in undertaking to construct the Mid-Canada Line and appreciated that for this reason Canadian participation in the Distant Early Warning project might necessarily be limited. He added that the U.S. Government and Western Electric, its proposed management contractor, in awarding sub-contracts for the various elements of the project, and in the procurement of supplies, would wish to take full advantage of all available resources both in Canada and the United States. It was intended to establish a project office in New York, and the participation of Canadian agencies in this project office would be welcomed as a means of ensuring that full use was made of Canadian resources.

Location of the DEW System

6. When the question of the compatibility of the land based early warning system with that over the Atlantic approach route was raised, the U.S. Section said that the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff had approved the Fourth Interim Report of the Canada-U.S. Military Study Group, which recommended that comprehensive studies be initiated regarding extensions to cover flanking approach routes to ensure that all segments of the distant early system were developed in a timely and compatible manner. These studies had already been launched. However the final selection of the Atlantic seaward detection system hinged on the question of feasibility, and until the various alternatives had been fully investigated, it would not be possible to settle the matter.

7. The combined United States-Canadian Location Study team is satisfied with the general route of the DEW line from Alaska as far east as approximately Cambridge Bay, but agreement has not yet been reached on the route from Cambridge Bay to Davis Strait. The Western Electric Company's cost estimate of approximately $200 million is based on the assumption that the line would run from Cambridge Bay to Resolution Island. A more northerly route, ending at Cape Dyer on Baffin Island more fully meets the operational requirement but undoubtedly would cost more to construct and maintain.

Conclusions of the Chiefs of Staff

8. The Chiefs of Staff, taking into account the advice of the Canada-U.S. Military Study Group, and of a committee set up to study the military characteristics of the proposed Distant Early Warning Line, have reached the following conclusions:

(a) the establishment of a Distant Early Warning System from Cape Lisburne to Cambridge Bay and thence eastward to Davis Strait is feasible;

(b) the provision of an effective Distant Early Warning System by 1957 is a requirement of great military importance;

(c) the proposed Distant Early Warning Line would augment the warning system already provided by the Pinetree radar stations and the Mid-Canada line, and would give the two hours warning required by the strategic air force and other users of early warning.

(d) from the military standpoint it would be undesirable for the RCAF to participate in the construction of the Distant Early Warning System as RCAF technical resources are now heavily committed in the attempt to complete the Mid-Canada Line by 1957;

(e) if the government decides that Canada should participate in the construction of the line, the Chiefs of Staff would wish to have the opportunity to consider the scope and character of such participation and make recommendations to the government in that regard;

(f) in the event that the government should decide not to participate in the construction of the system the Chiefs of Staff recommend that the U.S. be authorized to proceed with the project at once subject to appropriate terms and conditions;

(g) if, however, Canada is to participate in the construction of the line, then pending further consideration by the Chiefs of Staff in accordance with (e) above, and in view of the urgent requirement to have the distant early warning line constructed by 1957, the Chiefs of Staff recommend that the U.S. be authorized to undertake certain necessary preliminary measures, e.g. stockpiling, transportation arrangements, etc.;

(h) Canada should reserve its position with respect to Canadian participation in the operation and manning of the system, and with respect to whether the line should be operated by military or civilian personnel. In the meantime the RCAF should be instructed to look into the question of possible Canadian participation and subsequently initiate a joint study of manning problems in the Military Study Group.

Recommendations

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence recommend:

(a) that the Canadian Government agree to the construction of the proposed Distant Early Warning System as a joint project;

(b) that authority be granted for the conclusion of an agreement with the United States Government, granting permission to that Government to proceed with the construction of the proposed system, subject to conditions along the lines of those set forth in Appendix "C" to this memorandum;⁴³

(c) that at the same time the United States Government should be informed of Canada's intention to participate in the project, the nature and extent of Canadian participation to be determined in the near future;

(d) that it should be emphasized to the United States Government that Canada reserves its position with respect to Canadian participation in the operation and manning of the system, and with respect to whether the system should be operated by military or civilian personnel;

(e) that the departments concerned be directed to give immediate consideration to, and report as soon as possible on various forms of possible Canadian participation, it being taken as a guiding principle that the form of participation should not adversely affect Canada's ability to complete the Mid-Canada Line on schedule.

[Ottawa], November 12, 1954

II. CONTINENTAL DEFENCE; DISTANT EARLY WARNING LINE

4. The Minister of National Defence said that on June 30th of this year the government had decided that Canada should construct, operate and meet the cost of the Mid-Canada early warning line, and on August 18th had agreed in principle to the need for the establishment of a distant early warning line across the most northerly practicable part of North America. At the October meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, the U.S. Section of the Board stated that, on the basis of the latest report received from the Western Electric Company, the U.S. Government now considered that the feasibility of constructing an effective distant early warning line had been established and that the necessary data to start work on the sites during the 1955 construction season was available. If work began in 1955, the U.S. Government believed it would be possible for the system to be operating in 1957. The Western Electric Company estimated that the total cost of the DEW line, consisting of a combination of scanning radars and modified McGill Fence equipment running from Cape Lisburne in North-western Alaska to Davis Strait, would be about $200 million, and that its operation was estimated to involve from 700—1,000 men. The Chairman of the U.S. section of the P.J.B.D. had also said that if the system was to become operational in 1957, it would be necessary for the two governments to reach early agreement on the initial arrangements for the construction of the line. The United States was prepared to accept full responsibility for the project but it would welcome Canadian participation on any basis which the Canadian government would propose. He added that the U.S. government would award to Western Electric a management contract for the project but it would wish to take full advantage of all available resources, both in Canada and the United States. Studies were under way to determine where the seaward detection portions covering flanking approach routes would be located, and to ensure that all segments of the whole distant early warning system were developed in a timely and compatible manner. It was, however, not yet possible to determine where the Atlantic wing would be situated. The U.S.-Canada Location Study Team dealing with the route of the distant early warning line was satisfied that it would stretch from Alaska to Cambridge Bay, but agreement had not yet been reached on the route from Cambridge Bay to Davis Strait. If that latter portion of the line were to follow a more northerly route ending at Cape Dyer on Baffin Island rather than on Resolution Island, Western Electric's cost estimate of $200 million was probably too low.

The Chiefs of Staff believed that the establishment of the distant early warning line from Cape Lisburne to Cambridge Bay and thence eastward to Davis Strait was feasible, that it was a requirement of great military importance, that it would augment the warning facilities of the Mid-Canada Line and the Pinetree radar stations, and give the two hours' warning needed by the Strategic Air Force and other users. However, they concluded it would be undesirable for the R.C.A.F. to participate in its construction as R.C.A.F. technical resources were now heavily committed on the Mid-Canada line. If, however, the government decided that Canada should participate, the Chiefs of Staff would wish an opportunity to consider the scope and character of such participation and make recommendations about it. Should it be decided not to take part in construction, they recommended that the United States be authorized to proceed with the project at once subject to certain terms and conditions. On the other hand, if an affirmative decision were taken, the Chiefs felt that because of the urgent requirement for the line, the U.S. government should be authorized to take the necessary preliminary measures, e.g., stockpiling, transportation arrangements, etc. Finally, it was their view that Canada should reserve its position regarding Canadian participation in operation and manning of the line and, in the meantime, the R.C.A.F. should be instructed to examine this question.

5. Mr. Campney recommended, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the government agree to the construction of the distant early warning line as a joint project, and that authority be granted for concluding an agreement with the United States for the purpose, subject to certain conditions as outlined. At the same time, the United States should be informed that Canada intended to participate in the project, but that Canada's decision regarding operation and manning would be reserved. Departments concerned should give immediate consideration to the form of Canadian participation, it being understood that this should not adversely affect Canada's ability to complete the Mid-Canada line on schedule.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs and Minister of National Defence, November 10, 1954, Cabinet Defence Committee Document D15-54).

6. In the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The proposal as put up by the United States almost amounted to a crash programme. Canadian authorities did not know how authentic were the estimates of construction costs or of the personnel needed for manning the line. It seemed doubtful, too, if the United States were fully aware of the magnitude of the problems involved.

(b) The continental defence warning system, even though it involved several distinct lines, should be regarded as one whole project. It could be more easily established if one authority were made responsible for each segment, rather than having joint responsibilities for the construction of each one. Canada had undertaken to construct and operate the Mid-Canada line alone. For the same administrative reasons, construction of the far northern element of the system should be the responsibility of a single authority, in this case the United States. On the other hand, if the United States were given complete control over construction and operation of the distant early warning line, it would mean the establishment of exclusively U.S. installations right across the northern border of Canada, which was undesirable from the point of view of the general national interest. Even though the U.S. might have the overall responsibility for construction, Canada should participate to some extent, for instance, in providing some of the transportation facilities required and a certain amount of the equipment.

(c) It would also be desirable to have some Canadian control over the far northern line in the direct interest of the Eskimo population. Contacts between the Eskimos and the white man in the past, except in certain instances, had been unfortunate. In the Western Arctic regions, Eskimos had learned to live more closely in contact with the white man and it might be that in the relatively near future some of them could be usefully employed in connection with the distant early warning line without spoiling them. In the northeastern areas, however, the Eskimo population was still quite primitive. Even if the United States were given the responsibility for constructing the whole line, it would be essential to have a Commissioner appointed, as had been the case in other joint projects in the north, to govern the question of relations between the Eskimo and the white man in the whole area and also to keep under review any questions arising in the course of the construction of the line that would be important from the point of view of civil administration and of Canadian interests generally.

(d) There was a conflict between the requirements for the continental defence of North America and the defence of Europe. The United States had made a greater contribution to the defence of Europe than Canada. For a large scale U.S. contribution to continue, it would be necessary to have the support of the U.S. public, and that required defences of North America considered adequate by the U.S. public. Canada was not willing to let the U.S. government establish defences here for the protection of the United States without any regard to Canadian sovereign interests, and we had to avoid giving the Canadian public the impression that the U.S. had vested rights in the northern half of the continent. Where joint defence installations were established it had to be made clear that the U.S. was doing its share only with the consent of the Canadian government. If the Canadian government objected to the establishment of a distant early warning line, the American public might react unfavourably with unfortunate results for European defence. In order then to meet the U.S. request for the type of continental defence they considered adequate, and to protect Canadian interests in the north, Canada had to contribute to the development of the overall warning system. This might mean that the Canadian contribution to European defence would not be so great as might otherwise have been the case, but it would also mean that if the United States were satisfied that it was properly protected, it would continue to carry a large share of the burden of defending Europe. In consideration of all these factors, it would be desirable for Canada to make some contribution to the establishment of a distant early warning line.

(e) There was little doubt that the technical equipment in the various stations in the whole warning system would be modified and would have to be replaced as time went on. However, the basic installations — buildings airstrips, etc. — would remain much the same and these were the most costly features of the various lines under consideration. As techniques for countering offensive weapons improved, the fighter defences themselves might have to be moved farther north. But even with these developments the warning lines under construction and in contemplation would still be needed. U.S. scientists were continuing their study of the question of continental defence and early warning and it was probable, having in mind the likely use of atomic warheads on air-to-air missiles and ground-to-air missiles, that they would suggest that defences should be moved out of the less heavily inhabited areas and that the warning elements might even be extended up beyond the DEW line into the Arctic Archipelago. There was still no scientific answer to employment of inter-continental ballistic missiles.

(f) It was most important that any announcement with regard to the distant early warning line should be drafted in such a way as to indicate that it was not an isolated project but part of an overall continental system and that U.S. participation in it was governed by the same general principles that had applied to other joint defence projects undertaken in Canada in the past. At the same time, it would be useful to make some reference to the details of the Mid-Canada project and perhaps to the completion of the Pinetree chain. It should also be made clear that Canada reserved its rights in respect of control and ultimate participation in the system. It would also be desirable to point out on a confidential basis to the United States that any future joint defence projects should be proceeded with on a more orderly basis. The Chiefs of Staff, for instance, had not yet had an opportunity to consider the report submitted on the technical details of the DEW line. Nevertheless the U.S.A.F. had put this project forward for consideration through the P.J.B.D.

7. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed to recommend to the government:

(a) that the government agree to the construction of the proposed distant early warning line as one element of an overall continental defence warning system, the establishment of which is being undertaken as a joint Canada-United States project;

(b) that authority be granted for the conclusion of an agreement with the United States government which would enable that government to proceed with the construction of the distant early warning element of the joint system in accordance with terms and conditions along the lines submitted;

(c) that at the same time the United States government be informed of Canada's intention to participate in the project, the nature and extent of such participation to be more precisely determined in the near future;

(d) that a draft public announcement be prepared for discussion with the United States government and subsequent early release by the two governments, stating that the decision had been taken to proceed immediately with the construction of a distant early warning line as one element of an overall continental defence warning system being constructed and operated by both governments; that the United States government was to have the responsibility for the construction and equipment of this line, while the Canadian government assumed responsibility for the construction and equipment of the Mid-Canada line in the same system, and on the understanding that any construction and operation of this northern line is to be subject to the agreement of the Canadian government and in accordance with the same general principles that have governed other joint defence projects in the past, in particular the Pinetree radar network, the first main element of the air defence system, which is in operation.

DISTANT EARLY WARNING SYSTEM

Up until the time that the United States proposals for a Distant Early Warning System had been considered by Cabinet Defence Committee, the discussions with United States officials on the conditions which might govern the project were kept in PJBD channels since, nominally at least, they represented only the views of the Canadian Section of the Board. However, now that Cabinet Defence Committee has considered the matter, it is intended that the negotiations should from this point be conducted through diplomatic channels. It is anticipated that for the most part these negotiations will be carried on through the Canadian Embassy in Washington, although it will be appreciated that circumstances might arise which would make it desirable for us to take up specific points through the United States Embassy in Ottawa.

2. Enclosed are eight copies of the latest version of the proposed conditions. Would you please give some copies to the State Department, retaining enough copies to meet the needs of the Embassy, including the D.D.P. representative. You might explain to the State Department that, apart from section 4 which deals with the provision of electronic equipment, we do not anticipate that any of the changes from the earlier version will cause the United States officials any particular difficulty. In fact the changes made in section 3 dealing with plans should appeal to them. So far as section 4 is concerned, we propose to deal with the matter of the provision of electronic equipment separately, and will send instructions on this question to you in the course of the next few days. We will also send a draft text for the covering Note which will be required to accompany the conditions when they are finally agreed upon.

3. In the meantime, we would welcome United States comments on the conditions, other than Section 4, as set out in this latest draft.

Projet d'une déclaration des conditionsDraft Statement of Conditions

November 15, 1954

DRAFT CONDITIONS TO GOVERN PARTICIPATION BY THE UNITED STATES IN THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A DISTANT EARLY WARNING SYSTEM
IN CANADIAN TERRITORY

(In this Statement of Conditions, unless the context otherwise requires, "Canada" means the Government of Canada, "United States" means the Government of the United States of America, and "Distant Early Warning System" means all the detection stations, communications installations (including relay stations), and ancillary facilities, making up that part of the System in Canada.)

1. Sites. The location of all sites, airstrips, roads, wharves, jetties, etc., required for the DEW System in Canada shall be a matter for mutual agreement by the appropriate agencies of the two Governments. Canada will acquire and retain title to all lands required for the system. Canada grants and assures to the United States, without charge, such rights of access, use and occupancy as may be required for the construction and equipment of the system.

2. Liaison Arrangements. It is anticipated that the United States will carry out the construction of the DEW System through a management contractor appointed by the United States. It is understood that the United States and the management contractor will establish a DEW Project Office, and that the participation of interested Canadian Government agencies in the Project Office is desired. In addition, the Canadian Government may appoint a Special Commissioner for the Project, and may assign liaison officers to the construction operations in northern Canada.

3. Plans. Plans of the buildings, airstrips, roads (including access roads) etc.; information concerning use of local materials (rock fill, sand, gravel, etc.), (in sufficient detail to give an adequate idea of the scope of the proposed construction), and information concerning other arrangements related to construction and major items of equipment shall be supplied to the appropriate Canadian authorities if requested. Canadian officials shall have the right of inspection during construction. Proposals for subsequent construction shall be discussed with the appropriate Canadian authorities. The DEW Project Office will be used as far as possible as the instrument for consultation pursuant to this paragraph.

4. Provision of Electronic Equipment. The Canadian Government reaffirms the principle that electronic equipment at installations on Canadian territory should, as far as practicable, be manufactured in Canada. The question of practicability must, in each case, be a matter for consultation between the appropriate Canadian and United States agencies to determine the application of the principle. The factors to be taken into account shall include availability at the time period required, cost and performance. For the purpose of applying these principles to the DEW line, the DEW Project Office shall be used as far as possible as the instrument for effective consultation between the Canadian and United States agencies concerned.

5. Construction and Procurement (Other than Electronic Equipment)

(a) Canadian contractors will be extended equal consideration with United States contractors in the awarding of construction contracts, and Canadian and United States contractors shall have equal consideration in the procurement of materials, equipment and supplies in either Canada or the United States;

(b) Contractors awarded a contract for construction in Canada will be required to give preference to qualified Canadian labour for such construction. The rates of pay and working conditions for this labour will be set after consultation with the Canadian Federal Department of Labour and will be set in accordance with the Canadian Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act of 1935;

(c) Canadian commercial air carriers and Canadian shipping will to the fullest extent practicable be afforded the opportunity to participate in the air and sea lifts for the project;

(d) The DEW Project office shall be used as far as possible as the instrument for effective consultation between the Canadian and United States agencies concerned.

6. Canadian Law. Canadian law will apply to all phases of the project in Canada, provided that, if in unusual circumstances its application may lead to unreasonable delay or difficulty in construction or operation, the United States authorities concerned may request the assistance of Canadian authorities in seeking appropriate alleviation. Particular attention is directed to the ordinances of the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory, including those relating to the following:

(a) No game or wildlife shall be taken or molested in the Northwest Territories. Licences to hunt in Yukon Territory may be purchased from representatives of the Yukon Territorial Government.

(b) No objects of archaeological interest or historic significance in the Northwest Territories or Yukon Territory will be disturbed or removed therefrom without first obtaining the approval of the Canadian Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

7. Operation and Manning

(a) The question of Canadian participation in the initial operation and manning of the DEW System shall be a matter for later decision by Canada after full consultation with the United States. It is understood that, in any event, Canada reserves the right, on reasonable notice, to take over the operation and manning of any or all of the installations. Canada will ensure the effective operation of any installations it takes over.

(b) Subject to the foregoing, the United States is authorized to operate the DEW System in accordance with the principles of command currently in effect between the military authorities of the two countries. The United States may station military personnel at the various installations in the system under the command of United States military authorities, and also civilian employees of the United States Government. The question of whether the system, or any of its parts, should be operated by military personnel or entrusted to a civilian agency shall be a matter for consultation between the two Governments.

8. Financing. Unless otherwise provided by Canada, the costs of construction and operation of the DEW System shall be the responsibility of the United States, with the exception of Canadian military personnel costs if Canada should man any of the installations.

9. Period of Operation of the System. Canada and the United States agree that the DEW System shall be maintained in operation for a period of ten years or such shorter period as shall be agreed by both countries in the light of their mutual defence interests. Thereafter, in the event that either Government concludes that any or all of the installations are no longer required, and the other Government does not agree, the question of continuing need will be referred to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. In considering the question of need, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence will take into account the relationship of the DEW System to other radar installations established in the mutual defence interest of the two countries. Following consideration by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, as provided above, either Government may decide that the installations in question shall be closed, in which case the arrangements shown in paragraph 10 below regarding ownership and disposition of the installations will apply.

10. Ownership of Removable Property. Ownership of all removable property brought into Canada or purchased in Canada and placed on the sites, including readily demountable structures, shall remain in the United States. The United States shall have the unrestricted right of removing or disposing of all such property, PROVIDED that the removal or disposition shall not impair the operation of any installation whose discontinuance had not been determined in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 9 above, and PROVIDED further that removal or disposition takes place within a reasonable time after the date on which the operation of the installation has been discontinued.

11. Radio Installation. The United States military authorities shall obtain the approval of the Canadian Department of Transport, through the Royal Canadian Air Force, for the establishment and operation (including the assignment of frequencies) of radio stations in Canadian territory.

12. Scientific Information. Any geological, topographical, hydrographical, geophysical, or other scientific data obtained in the course of the construction or operation of the DEW System shall be transmitted to the Canadian Government.

13. Matters affecting Canadian Eskimos. The Eskimos of Canada are in a primitive state of social development. It is important that these people be not subjected unduly to disruption of their hunting economy, exposure to diseases against which their immunity is often low, or other effects of the presence of white men which might be injurious to them. While many Eskimo contacts with civilization have been of benefit to them, the opposite has been the case on many occasions, not only in Canada but in Greenland and Alaska as well. It is therefore necessary to have certain regulations to govern contact with and matters affecting Canadian Eskimos. The following conditions are set forth for this purpose:

(a) Any matters affecting the Eskimos, including the possibility of their employment in any area and the terms and arrangements for their employment, if approved, will be subject to the concurrence of the Department of Northern Affairs.

(b) All contact with Eskimos, other than those whose employment on any aspect of the project is approved, is to be avoided except in cases of emergency. If, in the opinion of the Department of Northern Affairs, more specific provision in this connection is necessary in any particular area, the Department may, after consultation with the United States, prescribe geographical limits surrounding a station beyond which personnel associated with the project, other than those locally engaged, may not go or may prohibit the entry of such personnel into any defined area.

(c) Persons other than those locally engaged shall not be given leave or facilities for travel in the Canadian Arctic (other than in the course of their duties in operation of the project) without the approval of the Department of Northern Affairs, or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police acting on its behalf.

(d) There shall be no local disposal in the north of supplies or materials of any kind except with the concurrence of the Department of Northern Affairs, or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police acting on its behalf.

(e) Local disposal of waste shall be carried out in a manner acceptable to the Department of Northern Affairs, or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police acting on its behalf.

(f) In the event that any facilities required for the system have to encroach on or disturb past or present Eskimo settlements, burial places, hunting grounds, etc., the United States shall be responsible for the removal of the settlement, burial ground, etc., to a location acceptable to the Department of Northern Affairs.

(g) If in the opinion of the Department of Northern Affairs the condition of buildings, equipment or other material no longer used for the project may have an injurious effect upon the Eskimos it may require the United States to raze any such buildings, or to remove or otherwise dispose of any such equipment and restore the site to a condition acceptable to it.

14. Canadian Immigration and Customs Regulations

(a) The direct entry of United States personnel into the Northwest Territories or Yukon Territory from outside Canada shall be in accordance with Canadian customs and immigration procedures which will be administered by local Canadian officials designated by Canada.

(b) Canada will take the necessary steps to facilitate the admission into the territory of Canada of such United States citizens as may be employed on the construction or operation of the DEW system, it being understood that the United States will undertake to repatriate at its expense any such persons if the contractors fail to do so.

15. Use of Air Strips. Air strips at installations in the DEW System shall be used by the United States solely for the support of the System. If it should be desired at any time by the United States to use an air strip for other purposes, requests should be forwarded through appropriate channels. The airstrips shall be available for use by the Royal Canadian Air Force if required. The airstrips shall also be available for use by Canadian civil air carriers operating into or through the area concerned, PROVIDED that this right will be exercised only after any proposal to use the airstrip or airstrips has been submitted through the Royal Canadian Air Force to the United States Air Force to ensure that it will not conflict with military requirements and SUBJECT to the understanding that the United States Air Force will not be responsible for the provision of accommodation, fuel, or servicing facilities of any kind.

16. Supplementary Arrangements and Administrative Agreements. Supplementary arrangements or administrative agreements between authorized agencies of the two Governments may be made from time to time for the purpose of carrying out the intent of this agreement.

17. Taxes. The Canadian Government will seek to obtain for the United States Government the same taxation exemptions as have operated in the Pinetree project.

DEW LINE: PROVISION OF ELECTRONIC EQUIPMENT

Would you please inform the State Department that we do not repeat not agree with the proposed United States revision of paragraph 4. You might explain that we do not anticipate that the wording of this paragraph is likely to have much effect on the final decision as to what electronic equipment is provided from Canadian sources, but we are concerned about the underlying principle and its application to future projects. In our opinion the strategic importance of industrial production cannot be overlooked in defence planning, nor the need to develop alternative sources of supply in this country. If the Canadian electronics industry is to play an effective part in the joint defence of the North American continent it must be given an opportunity to participate in the actual production of electronic equipment, particularly in the field of radar. Only through the experience gained in the manufacture of such complex precision-built equipment can Canadian industry be kept in readiness to meet wartime demands.

2. It is for these reasons that we maintain the principle that electronic equipment for radar systems on Canadian territory should, as far as practicable, be manufactured in Canada. The determination of practicability in each instance must be a matter of consultation between Canada and the United States. The basis of such consultation would be recognition of the fact that, in the interests of mutual defence, practicability must include strategic as well as commercial or economic considerations.

3. In our opinion the United States draft is the antithesis of the basis of consultation outlined above, and if applied would place the Canadian electronics industry in an impossible position in attempting to meet requirements for equipment needed in our own country. We take issue with the statement in paragraph 2 of Horsey's message of November 10, that, "This equalizing of the conditions is felt by our air force to be absolutely necessary in view of the interest of the United States industry". The United States draft, as we see it, would not equalize conditions, but would load them heavily in favour of the United States industry, and would make our position in dealing with our own industry an untenable one.

4. The Canadian Government has made every effort over the years to facilitate joint defence projects in Canadian territory and to ensure that they are carried out efficiently and expeditiously. We have no intention of imposing conditions which are unreasonable or of making demands which will delay these projects. In our view it is not too much to ask the United States Government, taking into account the record of previous cooperative ventures, to defer to our judgement as to the importance of the principle of practicability, and to give evidence of trust that we would not urge that the principle be applied unreasonably. Canada would yield the argument that provision of electronic equipment from Canadian sources was practicable in any case where it could be shown that such provision would adversely affect the project.

5. We understand that during his recent visit to Washington Mr. Howe spoke to you about this problem in a similar vein to the comments we have made above. No doubt you will wish to take his remarks into account when you discuss the matter with the State Department. It seems to us that this matter is the only one likely to present a difficulty in the early conclusion of an agreement on the DEW Line. We will be interested to hear how your representations are received by the State Department.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE DISTANT EARLY WARNING LINE

Following for Mr. Pearson on arrival Saturday:⁴⁴

⁴⁴ Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:

Note for file: Not sent. Mr. Rogers took this to New York and showed it to Mr. Pearson. W.H.
B[arton]
OK L.B. P[earson]

You will recall that Cabinet Defence Committee, at its meeting of November 12, recommended in a report subsequently approved by Cabinet:

(a) that the government agree to the construction of the proposed distant early warning line as one element of an overall continental defence warning system, the establishment of which is being undertaken as a joint Canada-United States project;

(b) that at the same time the United States government be informed of Canada's intention to participate in the project, the nature and extent of such participation to be more precisely determined in the near future.

2. We have now received a letter from the Deputy Minister of National Defence concerning the question of Canadian participation in the project. He argues that the main purpose of Canadian participation is to indicate joint responsibility and thus to make clear to the people of Canada that the United States is not being permitted to carry out large projects in Canada on its own. Part of this purpose was achieved by the issue of the joint press release. The question arises as to what further measures of participation are necessary. In his letter, Mr. Drury divides the project into two phases, the first being construction and installation, and the second operation and maintenance. He suggests that in respect to the latter phase it is probably too early to consider the form or extent of Canadian participation, other than to recognize that it would be desirable to have the RCAF participate in the manning of the line or its associated communications back-up or both, and that serious study should be given to all or part of the logistic support of the line being done by Canadian agencies. With respect to the construction and installation phase of the project, Mr. Drury points out that because of the Canadian preoccupation with the Mid-Canada Line, the United States Air Force designs, plans, and changes will have to be accepted largely without scrutiny and that any financial responsibility that Canada might undertake would be in the way of a nearly blank cheque. He suggests the following as possible ways in which Canada might participate:

(a) Canada might pay for electronic equipment produced in Canada. In Mr. Drury's view this would have the advantage of encouraging the placing of orders in Canada but the total liability would be difficult to estimate. Moreover production tends to be expensive when the design authority is spending someone else's money.

(b) Canada should pay for the transportation costs for services rendered by Canadian agencies. Mr. Drury considers that such a gesture would have little effect on the volume of business likely to fall into the hands of Canadian agencies and that in any case the total sum involved would not be very large because of our limited resources in this field.

(c) Canada would undertake to contribute a stipulated sum towards the overall cost of the project. This would have the advantage of limiting Canada's liability but unless the sum were quite substantial it would tend rather to indicate that Canada's participation was of a very minor character and convey the wrong impression. In the light of the disturbingly large expenditures for air defence in the relatively near future which are looming up and which will be for Canadian account, a gratuitous offer of this character would probably create more difficulties than it would solve.

3. It seems to me that in the light of the Canadian decision to pay for the whole of the Mid-Canada Line we should direct our participation in the DEW Line in such a way that the Canadian economy will get the maximum benefit from our contribution and should not be concerned that the dollar value of our participation in the DEW Line will be low relative to the total cost of the project. For example, two or three million dollars spent on the improvement of the transportation system down the Mackenzie River and along the Arctic Coast in the Beaufort Sea - Coronation Gulf area would have real value in the successful accomplishment of the project and at the same time would be of benefit to the Canadian communities in that area. Similarly if the Canadian Government undertook to pay for electronic equipment produced in Canada up to a maximum of, say, twenty or thirty million dollars, it would encourage both initial and continuing use of Canadian equipment and would help to keep up employment in the electronics industry. With the practical limitations on what the Canadian electronics industry could be expected to produce, I am not convinced that Mr. Drury's objections cited in paragraph 2(a) above need to be taken too seriously.

4. I agree with Mr. Drury's arguments against the contribution of a stipulated sum towards the overall cost of the project. It is becoming increasingly apparent that it will be necessary to add greatly to the air defence installations in Southern Canada in the near future and that it will strain our available resources to maintain our position vis-à-vis the United States in these new developments.

5. If you concur, we propose to take this stand at a meeting to be held on December 7 when this matter will be discussed. In view of the timing, we should be grateful for an early reply.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS EYES ONLY

Attached for your information is the first of two papers by Defence Liaison (1) Division dealing with the air defence of North America. It outlines the nature of the very large programme for the establishment of air defence installations in Canada which we expect will be put forward by the United States for the period 1955-1960. The second paper, which is now in course of preparation, will deal with the problems which the implementation of the programme would raise for Canada and will suggest some possible courses of action.⁴⁵

⁴⁵ Le second rapport sera reproduit dans le volume 21./The second paper will be reprinted in Volume 21.

2. In preparing these papers extensive use has been made of information which has been obtained "at the working level" from officers of the RCAF and USAF Air Defence Commands. The Chiefs of Staff would of course object strenuously if they knew that the information obtained in this way was being used to depict a programme which has yet to be submitted to the Chiefs themselves, let alone approved by them. For this reason the papers are being marked for "External Affairs Eyes Only". Experience has shown, however, that previous prognostications of this type prepared in External Affairs had proved to be quite accurate and it seems to me that even with the necessary limitation on their circulation these papers are well worth preparing for use within the Department.⁴⁶

THE AIR DEFENCE OF NORTH AMERICA

Introduction

1. On January 21, 1954, following a visit to Headquarters, USAF Air Defence Command, at Colorado Springs, the Canadian Section of the PJBD prepared a report summarizing the information obtained. The report stated:

"The most important conclusion to be drawn from all the discussions on the threat is that responsible United States officials are firmly of the opinion that the Soviet Union has now, or will have shortly, the capability of launching an atomic attack on North America on a scale sufficient to eliminate this continent as an effective source of resistance to the achievement of Soviet objectives. For this reason, the United States officials assert that, even to provide a margin of protection sufficient only to keep our losses to the point where we would have the ability to recuperate and retaliate, the North American air defence system must be greatly expanded and that it is necessary that this be done rapidly."

The report also stated that the features of the USAF presentation which the Canadian Section of the PJBD considered to be of most immediate importance to Canada were the expression of the United States Air Defence Command belief:

⁴⁶ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

I suggest it would be inadvisable to mention this memo to your colleagues for the present at least. R.A. M[ackay]

- “(a) in the necessity for an early warning line along the Arctic coast from Alaska to Baffin Island in addition to the line along the 55th parallel;
- (b) that integration of the North American air defence system is desirable;
- (c) that the depth of the “combat area” should be increased. Presumably this would mean fighter or guided missile bases in Canada.”

2. Since the PJBD report was prepared, the United States H-Bomb tests have demonstrated the incredible power of thermonuclear weapons, analyses of the Russian H-Bomb tests of a year ago have revealed that the Soviet Union has a weapon as powerful as that of the United States, and the Soviet high-performance jet bomber has made its bow (at the last May Day parade). For some years there has been general agreement in the United States that North American defences against air attack are inadequate and that this situation must be corrected as rapidly as possible, but these events of the past few months have had the effect of converting into enthusiastic supporters many responsible United States officials who had previously questioned the scale and timing of the programme proposed by the U.S. Air Defence Command. Particular importance is attached to the protection of the Strategic Air Command bases required for the launching of retaliatory forces.

Air Defence Plan

3. In the light of these facts it is clear that the United States will bend every effort during the next few years to build an air defence system capable of coping with high performance jet bombers armed with nuclear weapons. The main framework of this air defence system is already in being, but it still needs to have a roof put on it and be walled in. The basic plan, upon which the air defence experts of both countries are in general agreement should be in operation by 1960, is as follows:

(a) Establishment of a distant early warning line as far away from the settled parts of the continent as possible, and long enough so that it cannot be avoided by “end-running tactics.” The ultimate objective on the Atlantic side would be to tie the line to the European warning system. In the Pacific it will run from Alaska to Hawaii, and ultimately it might be extended as far as Wake Island.

(b) Creation of a “combat area”, with facilities for the control of intercepting aircraft and missiles, extending for as great a distance from the major target complexes as possible. The existing control facilities and interceptor bases are situated on the immediate fringe of the principal target areas. The next step will be to build a tactical early warning line about 400 miles ahead of existing installations. In Canada this will be the “Mongoose” or “55th parallel” line. In the United States sector this tactical early warning will be furnished by radar lines running down both the East and West coasts about 100-200 miles offshore and consisting of a combination of picket ships, (picket ships are small ships about the size of frigates or weather ships, equipped with radar and stationed at sea to detect aircraft approaching North America.) aircraft and “Texas Towers” (Texas towers are “islands” anchored to the bed of the continental shelf about 100 miles offshore and equipped with radar. They were named after the oil drilling towers used off the coast of Texas.). As rapidly as possible after the tactical early warning lines are established, the control area will be expanded by the installation of additional heavy radar, until it reaches the tactical early warning line, thus extending the combat zone by about 400 miles to the North and 200 miles to the East and West.

(c) Utilization of long-range interceptor aircraft and guided missiles to take advantage of the increased depth of the combat zone and to engage hostile aircraft at the greatest possible distance from their targets.

(d) Utilization of close-support interceptors and short-range "anti-aircraft" guided missiles in the protection of specific urban areas, key bases, etc.

Air Defence Programme

4. Implementation of this plan, particularly by the target date of 1960, will be a tremendous task, and can only be accomplished by the willing partnership of the two countries. The initial tasks which concern Canada directly are as follows:

(a) construction and operation of the Moose line by Canada — target date for operation January 1, 1957;

(b) construction and operation of DEW line along the Arctic coast, primarily by the United States but with Canadian participation — target date for operation mid-1957;

(c) modification of existing Pinetree radar stations to increase detecting height from 40,000 to 65,000 feet, the necessary equipment becoming available early in 1957;

(d) adoption of much more stringent civil air regulations to compel aircraft to cross radar lines through designated corridors and to file flight plans — this matter is now under discussion between the RCAF and the Department of Transport and will probably require enabling legislation.

5. In addition to the above projects, which are already "on the programme", it can be expected that the following proposals will be put forward within the next few months:

(a) installation of up to 110 semi-automatic gap-filler radars in the Pinetree system;

(b) construction of five additional heavy radar stations to improve the coverage over the Gulf of St. Lawrence;

(c) construction of eight heavy radar stations to close the gaps in the Pinetree chain between Manitoba and British Columbia, and the construction of six heavy radars north of the existing Pinetree stations in Northern Ontario to give added depth to the coverage in that area.

6. All the above measures are aimed at the improvement of warning and control facilities. There remains the question of how hostile aircraft can effectively be intercepted. The most immediate problem, of common concern to both the RCAF and the USAF, is that the long-range all-weather interceptor aircraft now in service do not have an effective ceiling high enough to engage jet bombers at the altitude at which the latter can be expected to operate. How long it will be before improved interceptors can come into service remains to be seen, although it is hoped that it will be possible to raise the ceiling of the CF-100 to 53,000 feet by 1956 and to 58,000 feet by 1958. It is doubtful that the new Canadian interceptor (CF-105) will be available until 1959.

7. The first anti-aircraft guided missiles (Nike) are now coming into service in the United States, and the Canadian Services are considered obtaining a supply for Canadian use. One consequence of the adoption of Nike by the United States is that the long-deferred problem of the defence of border cities, e.g. Detroit, Niagara Falls, and Buffalo, and the stationing of U.S. anti-aircraft installations on Canadian territory, is likely to come to a head in the not-distant future.

8. At a later date — during the period 1959-1961 — the United States will be ready to proceed with the installation of long-range interceptor missiles, possibly armed with atomic war-heads. It may not be necessary for these G.M. units to be based in Canada, but the missiles themselves will be intended to function over Canadian territory, thus giving rise to difficult operational and control problems.

9. The United States has been giving a great deal of thought to the economics of air defence, and the current view in the U.S. Defence Department is that for the period prior to the time when the enemy can be expected to rely on inter-continental ballistic missiles, (a ballistic missile is one which is fired as a projectile and follows a ballistic trajectory, e.g. the V-2) the only way of obtaining a sufficiently high attrition rate at a cost which would be within the bounds of reason is for our continental defence forces to use atomic weapons against enemy aircraft. The primary weapons would be air-to-air missiles armed with atomic warheads. They would be carried by our long-range interceptors and fired at the enemy while he was over the uninhabited parts of the continent (i.e. Canada) and over the ocean approaches. The development of these weapons is already in hand and will be pressed forward as rapidly as possible. It is expected that they will come into service in the autumn of 1956.

The Outlook for the Future

10. It should be understood that all these measures, costly as they are, have only a transitory value. The day of the intercontinental ballistic missile is rapidly approaching, — current U.S. intelligence estimates assign to the Soviet Union the capability of having such a weapon in service by 1963 and possibly as early as 1960. Even if this estimate anticipates the event by a number of years the fact remains that within a relatively short period of time we shall be confronted with a weapon against which at this time there is no known effective defence.

Problems Facing the Canadian Government

11. It cannot be emphasized too strongly that the programme outlined in this paper is not just a cloud on the horizon — it is a storm overhead. Over the period of the next five years the United States is going to press for the establishment in Canada of a series of costly defence installations. Stemming from this are a host of difficult problems with which the Canadian Government must come to grips. The following are some of the more important of these problems:

(a) To what extent will Canada have, as a measure of sovereignty, to participate financially in, and to man these installations?

(b) Where is the money and the manpower to be obtained, and to what extent will Canada have to reduce her NATO commitments to meet this requirement?

(c) Will the existing arrangements for command and control be adequate, and if not, what steps should Canada take to ensure that the air defence system operates with maximum effectiveness and that at the same time Canadian interests are protected?

(d) What is to be the Canadian policy with respect to the use of atomic weapons for defence and the arming of Canadian forces with atomic weapons?

12. In particular, the problem of command and control requires urgent consideration, since it will become increasingly difficult to modify current plans in the best interest of Canada as the costly programme for the provision of communications facilities advances during the coming year. A separate memorandum on this question is now being prepared.

DEW LINE CONDITIONS

Horsey at the Canadian Desk will arrange for a meeting on December 15 between Mr. Golden and interested United States officials on the subject of the electronics paragraph included in the Canadian draft conditions with respect to the DEW line. Horsey hopes that Roger Lewis, Assistant Secretary of the Air Force, will attend.

2. Horsey said that, while this meeting would be informal and would not give rise to commitments on either side, it would be welcomed by the State Department in that it would provide an opportunity for the direct exposure of Mr. Lewis to Canadian views on the subject. Interested officials at the State Department have felt themselves to be something in the nature of "shuttlecocks batted from one side to the other" and would welcome any development which would make the U.S.A.F. aware of the strength of the Canadian view.

3. A broad hint was given us that in spite of Mr. Lewis' engaging manner and apparent understanding of the Canadian view, he none the less held firm views himself on the important issues involved for the United States.

DEW LINE CONDITIONS — ELECTRONICS PARAGRAPH

The meeting with Roger Lewis, Assistant Secretary of the Air Force, to discuss the electronics paragraph of the Canadian draft conditions for the construction of the DEW Line, took place on December 15. The United States side was made up of the individuals mentioned in our telegram under reference. Mr. Golden and Mr. Wershof put the Canadian case. Representatives from D.D.P.'s Washington office and from the Embassy attended the meeting.

2. Mr. Wershof traced the history of the practicability formula from the Pinetree agreement to the present and set out the reasons why the Canadian Government placed such great store by the maintenance of the principle. The financial arrangements in the case of the Pinetree agreement had been different, but in the Canadian view differing financial arrangements did not affect the principle. The Canadian Government had been of the opinion that the United States Government understood and had accepted the necessity of meeting the Canadian Government's views in this respect. His argumentation was based in the main on the points raised in your telegram EX-2136 of November 22 and on the exchange of letters between Mr. Howe and Mr. Pearson in the fall of 1953. He admitted that, because of the urgent timetable laid down by the United States Government at the last PJBD meeting, acceptance of either the Canadian or the United States draft paragraph on electronics might not make much practical difference in the amount of electronic equipment procured in Canada. He went on, however, to point out that no one could be sure that the DEW Line was the last radar line on Canadian territory which might be considered necessary by the two governments. It was important therefore that the United States authorities should know of the strength of view of the Canadian Government on the principle of practicability involved in the electronics paragraph in the hope that in whatever future projects might have to be undertaken, a real opportunity would be given to the Canadian electronics industry to prepare itself to meet construction timetables. Mr. Wershof and Mr. Golden stressed the fact that there was no intention on the part of the Canadian Government of using the principle of practicability to delay the construction of the DEW Line.

3. Mr. Lewis made it clear that his remarks on the matter arose out of the Air Force operational interest in the DEW Line; he was not in this instance speaking for the United States Government as a whole or for any department of the Government other than his own. His main concern was that nothing should be agreed to which at some stage would delay the construction of the warning line. Any joint operation requiring inter-governmental consultation had inherent in it the possibility of delay. The problem could be reduced to fairly simple terms, however, when the principle of equality of opportunity for both parties was the basis of consultation. When the principle of preference was accepted, however, the problem became more difficult and the likelihood of delays more apparent.

4. The practicability clause, when interpreted with respect to time, did not seem to him to offer much of a problem; it was relatively simple to determine whether or not a contractor could meet a timetable. When it came to interpreting the principle with respect to the cost and the quality of individual items, much delay seemed inevitable. There was a further difficulty for Mr. Lewis; he would find it more difficult to explain preferential treatment of the Canadian electronics industry to Congress and to the United States industry than would be the case if only equal consideration had to be given. It was not difficult to foresee a situation where, as a result of strong industry pressure on Congress, a hold order would be applied to procurement of some item and the project as a whole would be delayed. He asked Mr. Golden how the Canadian Government would apply the practicability formula in cases where either quality or price was involved.

5. Mr. Golden said that so far as the question of quality was concerned, Canada would yield the principle if it could be proven that Canadian manufacturers could not meet the quality standards required by the United States authorities; quality certainly could not be sacrificed in a matter of such importance to national security. The matter of price differential was not quite as easy. The main concern of the Canadian Government was to maintain an adequate defence electronics industry. At the moment the "market" for such specialized equipment was relatively small so far as Canada was concerned. In contrast, the extended commitments of the United States throughout the world offered United States manufacturers a wide field for the development and manufacture of advanced equipment. The Canadian Government believed it essential that the Canadian defence electronics industry should be given an opportunity to keep abreast of the rapid and ever more complicated developments in the electronics field. It would be impossible, therefore, to give a direct answer as to what price differential would be acknowledged by the Canadian Government as rendering impractical Canadian supply of a certain item. It had to be taken for granted, Mr. Golden thought, that greater price alone need not automatically rule out Canadian supply in a particular instance. The specific item would have to be examined in the light of the more general strategic interest of the Canadian Government in developing an adequate defence electronics industry. Mr. Golden added that the Canadian Government was unlikely to attempt to press for Canadian supply of a higher priced Canadian item of a type already in production in Canada. Its interest in pressing for Canadian supply of an item would be greater if the item concerned were a more advanced item not normally produced in Canada but which the Canadian industry could reasonably take on.

6. Mr. Wershof returned to Mr. Lewis' point concerning the difficulties which would face him in defending preferential treatment of Canadian suppliers before the United States Congress and industry. Mr. Wershof suggested that two answers might be given. The first was that the DEW Line was being constructed not in the United States but on Canadian territory; any agreements made between the two governments had to be looked at in the light of that fact. The second argument which might be advanced was that the DEW Line was being constructed for the protection of the United States and of Canada. In the particular matter of production of electronics equipment, Canada was attempting to achieve a strengthening of the Canadian defence electronics industry, which in turn would increase the ability of Canada to contribute to the joint defence of the continent in time of war. Mr. Wershof also pointed out that the practicability formula for the production of electronic equipment was not a new formula; he had not heard that its inclusion in earlier agreements between the two governments had been the source of great concern to the United States industry. Mr. Lewis admitted that these were arguments which could be used.

7. Mr. Lewis reiterated his concern that implementation of the practicability formula seemed to him to be fraught with possibilities of delay. The language of the Canadian draft paragraph seemed to require that all procurement be tested against the Canadian interpretation of practicability and that the DEW project office could not act without clearing every item with a Canadian representative. Mr. Golden, in answer, said it was his understanding that action already taken in the course of only one meeting with Canadian representatives in New York covered a large percentage of the field and left over only 5% or 10% of the items to be procured for further consultation as to the best source of supply. (Mr. Lewis' deputy suggested that as much as 50% of the items to be procured would offer a problem.) Mr. Golden reminded Mr. Lewis that the practicability principle was not to be unilaterally implemented but that it contained a requirement for consultation.

8. Mr. Wershof pointed out that the draft paragraph did not in any case provide the Canadian Government with a legal veto over United States procurement. If a meeting of minds between Canadian and United States representatives could not be reached after consultation on a particular item, it was open to the United States under the Canadian draft paragraph to go ahead with the procurement of the item from whatever source it desired. If the Canadian Government, after examining the matter carefully, came to the conclusion that such an action violated the principle of practicability, it would register a protest with the State Department. He doubted if matters would ever come to this stage. The Canadian Government assumed that the provisions in the paragraph would be met by the United States Government in good faith.

9. The organization and functions of the DEW project office in New York were referred to at various times in the latter stages of the general discussion. For convenience we might consolidate in this paragraph our understanding of the discussion on this point. It was agreed that the project office was not a joint U.S.-Canadian office but a United States office to which Canadian representatives were invited. Mr. Golden indicated that the representative of the Department of Defence Production would be fully authorized to settle in the project office such problems as required his decision. It was agreed that experience in the operation of the office might indicate the need for changes in present plans. Mr. Golden said that the Canadian Government would be willing to consider any suggestions which might be put forward to render the office more effective. The two questions of (a) how much authority the project office would have, and (b) how electronic equipment was to be procured, were in the view of the Canadian representatives not fully answered by their United States colleagues.

10. The meeting was recessed for a few minutes to allow the representatives on each side to consult among themselves. At the end of the recess Mr. Lewis said that he was convinced that the discussion had "advanced the solution of the problem" and that further discussions might best be conducted through regular channels. We assume that Mr. Lewis is prepared now to accept the essential features of the Canadian draft paragraph on electronic equipment and that in the near future we shall hear officially through the State Department the views of the United States Government on the Canadian draft conditions as a whole. We were assured after the meeting by State Department representatives that the meeting had achieved exactly the results which the State Department had hoped for. We were left with the impression that no further delay was foreseen in the conclusion of an inter-governmental agreement.

11. Mr. Wershof and Mr. Golden will be able to elaborate on any points which we may have covered inadequately in this letter.

Dear Mr. Wershof:

I attach a draft report on the meeting held with respect to Canadian participation in the DEW line. Before submitting this to my Minister, I would be grateful for your comments.

I intend to recommend to him that we should endeavour to organize substantial participation in the operation and maintenance phase and limit our participation in the construction and installation phase to ensuring that the conditions of the proposed agreement are carried out.

Yours sincerely,

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE DISTANT EARLY WARNING LINE

The Cabinet Defence Committee, at its meeting of November 12 recommended, in a report subsequently approved by the Cabinet:

- (a) that the government agree to the construction of the proposed distant early warning line as one element of an overall continental defence warning system, the establishment of which is being undertaken as a joint Canada-United States project;
- (b) that at the same time the United States government be informed of Canada's intention to participate in the project, the nature and extent of such participation to be more precisely determined in the near future.

A group of officials, under the Chairmanship of the Deputy Minister of National Defence and comprising the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, the Deputy Ministers of Northern Affairs and National Resources and Defence Production, the Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance have met and discussed the possibilities of Canadian participation in the distant early warning line and generally concluded as follows.

It was assumed that the main purpose of Canadian participation was to make it clear to the people of Canada that United States is not being permitted to carry out large projects in Canada except under effective Canadian control.

The DEW project was considered in its two main phases:

- (a) construction and installation;
- (b) operation and maintenance.

In respect of the first phase, namely construction and installation, the joint press release of November 19, 1954, pointed out that Canada had undertaken responsibility for the construction of the Mid Canada Line and that responsibility for construction and installation in respect of the distant early warning line would be vested in the United States, although both Canada and the United States would participate in the project. This would appear to indicate that the area of Canadian responsibility in respect of the DEW line would be confined to the operation and maintenance aspects.

In respect of the second phase, it appeared that the continuing aspects of the project were more important than the transient operations of a crash nature and that it would be desirable to have the R.C.A.F. take as substantial a share as practicable in the operation and manning of the line. It also appeared desirable to have as much as possible of the continuing logistic support performed by Canadian agencies so that traffic in the arctic should be, as much as possible, Canadian. To achieve this, it might be necessary to provide special arrangements for shipping which might take some time to achieve. It was recognized, however, that at the present time not enough was known about the line nor would likely be known for some time, to permit specific recommendations to be made. It was agreed, however, that it would be desirable to initiate studies in respect of manning and resupply in order to ascertain the possibilities and consequences of Canadian participation in the continuing phase.

It was agreed that a grant could be made conditional and limited to a maximum sum. It was felt that if a grant were made, it should be accompanied by a stipulation that such money should only be used for payments of equipment or services procured in Canada. It is unlikely, however, that such a condition would have any appreciable effect on increasing Canadian business in that there is some indication that the extent to which Canadian resources will be used has already been largely determined and the United States appears to be willing to pay for these itself.

A grant, in order to achieve its purpose, would have to be substantial. Although $200 million is the present estimated cost of the construction and installation of the project, previous experience indicates that this is likely to be considerably exceeded and a contribution of the order of $25 million might merely serve to emphasize we were participating in the project but only as a one-tenth partner. In the light of anticipated defence expenditures on continental defence which would fall to Canada to pay, it would be difficult to contemplate a much larger contribution than this, unless defence expenditures as a whole are to rise.

The opinion was expressed that if a substantial contribution to the operation and maintenance of the line were to be made once it had been completed and was in operation, it might not be necessary to participate in the construction and installation phase, other than to ensure that the Canadian interests were protected in the ways outlined in the proposed agreement. The representative of the Department of External Affairs, however, was of the view that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would still wish to have Canada participate in the first phase.

Dear Mr. Drury,

Thank you for your letter of December 21, 1954, enclosing the draft report on the meeting held to consider the question of Canadian participation in the DEW Line.

My first observation is that it may be desirable to add a line at the end of the opening paragraph to make it clear that in accordance with the Cabinet's decision the United States Government was informed by means of a diplomatic Note of Canada's intention to participate, the nature and extent of such participation to be more precisely determined in the near future.

My second observation stems from the fact that my Minister has further considered the matter in the light of the views expressed at the meeting of officials on December 7, and has decided not to press the view that Canada should participate in the construction phase of the project, provided that there is a clear understanding that there will be effective Canadian participation in the operation and maintenance phase. You may wish to add a sentence at the conclusion of the report to reflect this development.

As you know, it is incumbent upon the Canadian Government to notify the United States Government "in the near future" of our intention with respect to participation. I presume that it is your intention to follow up the report to your Minister with a memorandum from him to the Cabinet so that a decision can be obtained and the United States Government notified. This Department would appreciate the opportunity of seeing the memorandum to Cabinet in draft.⁴⁸

Yours sincerely,

M.H. WERSHOF

DESPATCH 440

Washington, March 9, 1954

U.S.-CANADA MEETING OF CONSULTATION OF MARCH 4

I wanted to give you some preliminary comments on the meeting of consultation with the United States authorities which was held in the State Department on March 4. Since I am leaving Washington today on my western tour, this despatch will be held so that it may go to you with our final record of the meeting. I have seen and approved a draft of the record, but since it is customary to compare our notes with those kept on the United States side, so that our two records are in no substantial disagreement, it will be a few days before our record can be put in shape for transmission to you with this despatch.

2. This meeting was not, perhaps, wholly satisfactory in relation to Soviet intentions. But I am not sure that we could have expected much more on this subject and the meeting did have real value for us particularly in relation to continental defence. The "agenda" put forward by the State Department met the suggestions which we had made. It had seemed to us that, since the meeting was to be held so shortly after the Four Power meeting at Berlin, it would be natural for the U.S. side to start with a discussion of the results of that conference and so lead into the United States estimate of Soviet intentions as they were related to various trouble spots in the world. In the event Bowie told us little about the Berlin Conference that we did not know already through our normal contacts with the State Department and the examination of trouble spots did not produce much. A good deal more time might have been spent (though with what profit I do not know) on the political implications of the new United States strategy.

3. The most extensive discussion at the meeting concerned military matters. This was perhaps not surprising in view of the agenda and having in mind the military background of the Chairman. Admiral Radford's contribution to the discussion was interesting even though his prepared remarks on the new United States strategy contained a good deal of material which had already been made public, for example in the interview with Admiral Radford, published in the U.S. News and World Report of March 5. We were not able to explore very deeply Radford's thinking as to how United States atomic capabilities were to be applied to local incidents of aggression. (General Foulkes was to have a further discussion with Radford and possibly he was able to go into this subject more fully.) On the other hand Radford's forthright declaration of continued United States support of NATO was reassuring although I am not certain that our European colleagues would have been similarly impressed. He said categorically that United States commitments to NATO would not be decreased but he also made it clear that they were not likely to be increased in any significant degree.

4. I believe that the progress report which we gave on Canadian activity with respect to the mid-Canada early warning line made a real impression on our United States colleagues.⁴⁹ I believe that at this high level they appreciate now our intention to co-operate to the greatest extent possible in the better defence of the continent. Progress reports of this type given from time to time can, I believe, ease the work of those officials who are responsible for the detailed day-to-day work in this co-operative project.

5. You will note from the report of the meeting that our views on the Indo-China situation in relation to the forthcoming Geneva Conference were solicited⁵⁰ and that General Foulkes was asked to put on paper some of his informal ideas on civil defence organization for the benefit of United States authorities. Bedell Smith did, too, express the gratification of the United States Government at the Canadian attitude towards the grant of United States military aid to Pakistan and especially for the remarks made by the Prime Minister while he was in India.⁵¹

⁵¹ Voir/See Document 442.

6. In summary, I think that the meeting added something to our store of knowledge on current United States thinking on the extent of the Soviet threat to the security of the free world and of the steps which can best be taken by the United States to counter-act that threat. I was encouraged, as I am sure you will be, by the fact that Bedell Smith expressed the emphatic opinion that not too long a period of time should be allowed to lapse between these meetings of consultation. They provide a good informal channel through which we gain access to the high level thinking of United States political and military authorities and, while some may turn out to be less useful than others, we should, I believe, continue to make use of them whenever we think the occasion demands. I have said before that I do not think we should debase the currency by having too many meetings of consultation but I think we must bear in mind the expressed willingness of the United States authorities and particularly the Under-Secretary of State, Bedell Smith, to arrange for the meetings whenever we want to have them.

7. We have in addition gained some experience in the procedural aspects of the meetings which may allow us to make better use of future meetings of consultation. I think, for example, we should tend to discourage the growth on the United States side of too great an emphasis on formal "briefing" of the meeting by some individual. It will always be necessary that someone lead off the proceedings but I believe that the sooner the discussion stage is reached at these meetings the better they are likely to be. This in turn leads me to believe that it would be wise to make the agenda items as general as possible so that we need feel less limited in our questions. Finally, I think there is something to be said for limiting even more strictly the numbers of those attending. The larger the meetings become the more difficult it is to achieve that intimacy and informality in discussion which is likely to make the consultations most useful to us.

A.D.P. HEENEY

P.S. March 11. Six copies of our final record of the meeting of consultation of March 4 are attached. This record has been compared with the record kept on the United States side.

Washington, March 4, 1954

The meeting which was held in the State Department under the Chairmanship of General Walter Bedell Smith, the Acting Secretary of State was attended by

Admiral Arthur W. Radford,

Chairman, United States Joint Chiefs of Staff,

The Honourable John A. Hannah,

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Manpower and Personnel),

Mr. Robert Murphy,

Deputy Under-Secretary of State,

Mr. Robert Bowie,
Director of the Policy Planning Staff of the State Department, and State Department representative on the National Security Council Planning Board,
Mr. Hayden Raynor,
Director of the Office of Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs, State Department,
Mr. R. Gordon Arneson,
Special Assistant for Atomic Energy Affairs to the Secretary of State, for the United States Government, and by Mr. A.D.P. Heeney,
Canadian Ambassador to the United States,
General Charles Foulkes,
Chairman of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff,
Mr. R.A. MacKay,
Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs,
Mr. R.B. Bryce,
Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet,
Mr. G.P. deT. Glazebrook,
Minister, Canadian Embassy,
Rear Admiral H.G. DeWolf,
Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff, Washington,
Mr. J.J. McCardle,
Canadian Embassy,
for the Canadian Government.

2. The agenda of the meeting consisted of two items,

- (a) review of the Berlin Conference and its implications respecting the United States estimate of Soviet intentions,
- (b) the new U.S. military strategy and its implications, particularly regarding continental defence.

Introduction

3. The Chairman opened the meeting by referring to a conversation which he had been having with General Foulkes as to the desirability of issuing some public statement by the Canadian and United States Governments outlining the progress which had so far been made in the building up of the defences of the continent. He suggested that any such public announcement should be drafted with a view to anticipating criticisms that not enough was being done in this vital field. The Chairman suggested that the possible issuance of a press release might be considered by Canadian and United States authorities.

4. The Chairman then went on to mention the various and important demands on the time of senior officers of the State Department. He indicated that it now seemed likely that Mr. Dulles would have to remain in Caracas at the current meeting of the Organization of American States for a longer period of time than had been anticipated, probably until the fate of certain proposals which would constitute a political Monroe Doctrine against the international Communist conspiracy was decided. He said that the United States, while it had not outlawed the Communist party, was well aware of the infiltration which had been achieved in the Western Hemisphere by the agents of international Communism. In the circumstances, therefore, Mr. Dulles would probably stay only a short time at the Geneva Conference and Bedell Smith would remain there indefinitely as Head of the United States delegation.

5. The Chairman, referring to the Berlin Conference, said that it had been quite impossible to resist French pressures for discussion of Indo-China at the Geneva Conference which had been agreed on at Berlin, although it was recognized by the three Western Foreign Ministers that such a discussion was not without grave danger. In Indo-China the Navarre Plan was being implemented successfully. French military authorities were confident of eventual victory in Indo-China. However the press had over-played the "real estate" victories of the enemy, and this press coverage, together with other factors, had made it difficult to refuse a high-level discussion of the situation in Indo-China. The Navarre Plan would not come to full flower this fighting season. The plan envisioned the development of 54 native battalions by the end of this year and further battalions next year which would constitute a satisfactory posture of strength vis-à-vis the enemy. The French military authorities, he said, were now convinced, as they had not been in the past, of the fighting quality of properly trained native battalions.

6. The Chairman said that the United States Government was fully aware that great pressure for a negotiated settlement in Indo-China would develop at Geneva, before the necessary strength was built up to permit acceptance of a sound solution of the problem. The whole subject was under the most intensive study within the United States Government and the problem of what attitude the United States would eventually take was as yet unsolved. The idea of agreement to a coalition government in Indo-China would appear tempting at Geneva but so far as the United States was concerned was unacceptable since it would be the beginning of the end of anti-Communist rule in Indo-China. The military authorities of the United States Government regarded any artificial division of the country as completely unacceptable especially since there was no fixed line of battle as there had been in Korea. The Chairman indicated that the United States Government would be grateful for any views the Canadian Government might wish to present on the matter.

Berlin Conference

7. Mr. Bowie presented the conclusions of the United States Government on Soviet intentions as they had been revealed at the Berlin Conference.

8. The European objective of the Soviets had been revealed as an unshakeable intention to maintain the present Soviet military and political position in Germany and Austria at all costs. This determination was especially evident with respect to the Austrian Peace Treaty. The concessions offered by the three Western Foreign Ministers and by the Austrian authorities, although generous in the extreme, had no effect on the Soviet position. Molotov argued that no Austrian Peace Treaty was possible because of the imminence of EDC and the resultant possibility of an anschluss. United States authorities regarded his arguments on this score as completely insincere and simply advanced in an attempt to mask the real determination of the Soviet Union not to budge from Austria. The objective was perhaps not so clear in the discussions with respect to East Germany because of the many side issues which were involved, but the United States representatives were convinced that the Soviet Union was not prepared to agree to anything which would lead to the end of its control in East Germany. The Soviet Union would not be satisfied with any European security guarantee. United States representatives thought it probable that even if the Soviet Union were prepared to agree to a neutralization of Germany, it would not agree even within that framework to the liquidation of the East German régime.

9. The second main objective of the Soviet Union at Berlin had been the defeat of EDC. Mr. Bowie indicated that there was evidence that the USSR genuinely feared German re-armament as a threat to its security and that this was the essential reason for the Soviet position with respect to EDC. Molotov made it clear that the only safeguard acceptable to the Soviet Government, so far as Germany was concerned, was Soviet control of any/all German Government. Democratic processes might be good enough for other people or for other governments but were not suited to this situation so far as the Soviet Government was concerned. Molotov, in private discussions, made clear the Soviet belief that if EDC were defeated in 1954 it would be consigned to the archives. An intensive drive by the Soviet Union in this calendar year to defeat EDC might therefore be expected. So far as tactics were concerned the Soviet representatives completely disregarded the opinion of both East and West Germans and focused attention on French opinion. They attempted by every means to exploit the French fear of a rearmed Germany and to prove that, in this instance at least, the French interest lay in combining with the Soviet Union to exert strict control over Germany. Some attempt was made to appeal to opinion in the United Kingdom favourable to the neutralism of Germany. United States representatives regarded this as only incidental to the main effort directed at the French.

10. Soviet intentions with respect to Far Eastern matters might be classified under two headings: the drive for recognition of the Government of Communist China, and a possible genuine interest in some high-level meeting on Far Eastern matters. The attempt to gain recognition for Communist China seemed to be one of Molotov's main tasks. In every possible and some impossible circumstances Communist China was mentioned. This effort was most ridiculous in Molotov's suggestion that the United States and Communist China might be associated as observers in any scheme designed to guarantee European security. It was impossible to know whether this effort was made simply to placate Communist China or because the Soviet Union felt a real need for Chinese partnership. There were some grounds, although this was less certain, for the belief that the Soviet Union was genuinely interested in the convocation of a high-level meeting on Far Eastern subjects. The best evidence of this was Soviet acceptance of the restricted agenda and Soviet agreement to a meeting on Korea, under conditions which the Communist representatives at Panmunjom had refused to accept. Until the last moment Bidault had held out for conditions which would have allowed discussion of Indo-China only after a satisfactory discussion of the Korean situation and after Chinese assistance to the Viet Minh had been brought to an end. However the French Government "caved" and Bidault found himself unable to resist the Molotov offer which eventually was adopted. Bidault realized that discussion of Indo-China at the Geneva Conference involved grave dangers for France but yet he could not be put in the position of resisting any move to bring an end to the Indo-China war. One could only speculate as to Molotov's motives in this regard but it seemed reasonable to suppose he had one or all of the following objectives:

(a) To convene a meeting in which France would participate and in which a possible settlement in Indo-China could be used as a lever to pry the French away from acceptance of EDC.

(b) A real desire to bring about more settled conditions in the Far East because of Soviet uneasiness that the trouble spots there were getting somewhat out of control.

(c) To provide for a conference on Indo-China which could only be to the advantage of the Communists since almost any settlement which would be made under the present circumstances would lead to difficulties between France and the Associated States and eventually to Communist control of the whole peninsula.

11. Other less important indications of Soviet intentions were revealed at Berlin. Molotov made many efforts to split the three Western Ministers, not only on EDC and the Five Power Conference but also on such matters as the promise of increased East-West trade. The conduct of the Soviet representatives throughout the Conference suggested some desire on their part for a relaxation of tensions, in that their manner was not so pugnacious as usual. However it was evident that while the Soviet representatives might be seeking to lower the atmosphere of tension they were not prepared to give anything for such a relaxation. It was possible, of course, that their somewhat more restrained conduct of business was meant merely to contribute material for the use of their peace propagandists. The stress laid by Molotov on the desirability of holding further Big Power meetings was evident but the motives behind this move were not clear. Molotov may have hoped to divide the Western Foreign Ministers by his vague suggestions as to what might be accomplished at additional Big Power meetings, or his efforts may have been designed to prevent a clear-cut breaking-point on the problem of a European settlement which would tend to crystallize Western opinion against Soviet intransigence. Finally Molotov's references to disarmament were interesting but there was little to guide the Western delegates as to their real meaning. It was possible that they were merely designed for the use of Communist peace propagandists.

12. Aside from these indications of definite Soviet intention, Mr. Bowie indicated that he brought away three main impressions from the meeting;

(a) that there was a Soviet desire to keep the door of the conference room open;

(b) that the Soviet attempt to reduce tension without modifying its foreign policies might be a possible indication of the growing importance of Soviet domestic problems, and

(c) that the Soviet stand with respect to East Germany and especially Austria might indicate the growing influence of the Soviet Army on Soviet policy since the Army was in the best position to assess the effects on other Soviet satellites of any restrictions on Soviet military activity in these two areas.

MEDO

13. The Chairman then turned to consideration of the situation in the Middle East. He outlined the course of events which had led to the recent announcement of United States military aid to Pakistan within the framework of the Turkish-Pakistan Agreement. About a year and a half ago the Pakistan Government had informed the United States Government that it would have to reduce its defence forces by two divisions because the economy could not support them. At that time the Pakistan representatives had also indicated, however, that their country was "prepared to stand up and be counted" as a foe of communist imperialism but that it could offer little practical assistance without military aid from the United States. The United States Government was faced with a dilemma. It was thoroughly alive to the difficulties which would arise in United States-Indian relations as a result of United States military aid to Pakistan, which would be regarded by the Indian Government as a breach in the Asiatic neutrality bloc. The United States Government could not, however, in view of its stated objectives, refuse to accept the support of a willing ally in the fight against Communist imperialism. Further, the United States Government had made it clear that it did not accept the concept that neutrality was possible in the event of the outbreak of a major war. It was the United States' view, and it had been stated many times publicly, that no neutrality bloc could act as a bridge between the Free and the Communist worlds. The United States Government did indicate, however, that it would find it easier to grant military aid to Pakistan if it could be done within the framework of some area defence agreement under the United Nations.

14. The Chairman digressed for a moment to indicate to the meeting the general thinking of the United States Government with respect to a Middle Eastern Defence Organization. He said that the original concept of a Middle Eastern Defence Organization had had to be discarded or at least indefinitely delayed. It might be possible to arrive at an agreement involving "bits and pieces of the Middle East" but even this was uncertain. However, an agreement of the Northern tier of nations in the Middle East, that is Turkey, Iran, Iraq and Pakistan, did seem possible and practical. The present Government of Iran was more favourably disposed towards the West than the Mossadegh Government had been. Iran need no longer be written off and might join in an area defence agreement at the proper time. The Government of Iran, however, had been unable to go far publicly in this respect because of its dispute with the United Kingdom over an oil settlement. The Chairman said that within the last day or two there had been some evidence that an Anglo-Iranian agreement was in sight which would involve operation of the oil fields by a consortium made up 40 percent by the Anglo-Iranian Company, 40 percent by United States companies, and 20 percent by French companies and Royal Dutch Shell. So far as Iraq was concerned there was some willingness on the part of its Government to participate in an area defence agreement but the basic hostility between Iraq and Israel created political difficulties. The Chairman suggested that, while this basic hostility existed and was fanned by violent speeches made for domestic political consumption by leaders on both sides, there were grounds for belief that the situation would ease in the not too distant future. In the circumstances the United States Government had welcomed the association of Turkey and Pakistan, the two ends of the line, as a step towards the future development of a broader area agreement among the Northern tier of nations. The Chairman said that only thirty million dollars had been requested of Congress for United States military aid to the Middle East. He believed it would be better spent in Pakistan and Turkey than spread thinly throughout the whole area. The United States Government regretted that President Eisenhower's message to Mr. Nehru had not been accepted in the spirit in which it was written but was happy that Indian reaction had not been sharper. He expressed the gratification of the United States Government for the attitude which had been taken publicly by the Canadian Prime Minister in this matter.

The New United States Strategy

15. Admiral Radford introduced the second item on the agenda with an analysis of United States defence policy.⁵² Between the end of the last war and the beginning of 1950 the United States followed a policy of defence retrenchment which left her in an extremely weakened condition at the time of the outbreak of the Korean war. He said it was fortunate that the Communists chose to move aggressively before "we had cut our heads off". In addition the aggression occurred in the one place, Korea, where the United States could fight. Within a year United States military strength had been increased from less than a million and a half to three and a half million men. This had been possible only because of the large reserve of trained manpower which existed in the United States as a result of World War II. United States military authorities realized that there was something essentially unfair in once again placing the burden of combat on men so recently exposed in World War II and who, although they could be regarded as trained reserves, had become a bit rusty. It was not long before the inequities of this situation were brought to the attention of Congress which passed legislation limiting the service of these reserves to two years. By the end of 1952 and especially in 1953 the period of obligatory service for a large percentage of the reserves came to an end and a very high proportion of them elected to return to civilian life.

16. Concurrently with the build-up of manpower, there had been a tremendous build-up in war matériel towards a peak emergency to come in 1954. It was evident to the authorities by 1952 that this planned build-up could not be achieved because it was being done under conditions of only partial mobilization. It could only have been achieved within a controlled economy. Ultimately, therefore, the objective was moved from 1954 to 1955 and then to 1956. However, United States military authorities were well aware that there was a need for planning beyond the period of most intense crisis. It was obvious, therefore, that no matter what Administration had assumed office last year, planning for the "long pull" would have had to be a main effort. In April of last year, therefore, President Eisenhower had put the task to the new Chiefs of Staff of building a defence machine for the United States within the economic resources of the country and not requiring deficit financing for its support.

17. Admiral Radford said that military planners traditionally are not required to take economic factors into their military consideration. In this case, however, the service chiefs agreed that a sound economy was as integral a part of national security as was the military establishment. Admiral Radford said that he, as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, found it easy to agree to this concept since he was convinced that United States military aid to its allies had been an important factor in preventing further Soviet expansion. It was not difficult, he said, to get the agreement of the Chiefs of Staff. It was with the idea that the military establishment of the United States should be built without prejudicing the health of the national economy that the Chiefs of Staff took their "new look" at United States defence requirements. The service chiefs arrived at a figure of thirty-four to thirty-five billion dollars and this was regarded by the Treasury and the Bureau of the Budget as an amount which would be considered a reasonable annual outlay for the purely military functions of the United States Defense Department. The Chiefs of Staff were aware that an additional five to six billion dollars, annually, would be available for military aid and expenditures on atomic energy.

18. Another factor, which had had to be taken into consideration in the reassessment made by the service chiefs, was that of manpower. It had been possible between 1950 and 1953 to bring service strength up to 3 1/2 million personnel by the draft, by voluntary enlistment in the Air Force and Navy, and by calling on the reserve pool. It was, however, a fortuitous circumstance that that reserve pool existed. It is estimated that approximately 1 million men turn 18 each year in the United States of which 700,000 to 800,000 can be considered prospective additions to the armed forces. In their reassessment of United States defence strength the service chiefs estimated that the maximum defence forces which could be maintained over an indefinite period based on this United States manpower pool and without dipping into reserves would have to be limited to approximately 3 million personnel. There may be some change in this situation in 1960 when it is estimated that the manpower pool will take a significant jump. Admiral Radford indicated that while manpower, therefore, was a factor, cost was the most important factor which was taken into consideration by the service chiefs. They came up, therefore, with these figures which have now been made public: i.e. Army—approximately 1 1/2 million men; Air Force—975,000; Navy and Marine—800,000. The service chiefs agreed to these manpower ceilings, however, on the understanding that they were valid only if the world situation did not deteriorate significantly and if certain overseas commitments were to be reduced. In addition the service chiefs were able to assume that they would be permitted to use atomic weapons when that use seemed desirable and particularly in support of ground troops (i.e. the tactical use of the atomic bomb).

19. He said that the service chiefs still have not finished their study of the reserve structure. It was for this reason that they wanted to get back into the United States as much as possible of the United States Army in order that it could devote attention to building up a reserve structure which would be capable of producing trained manpower under conditions of emergency mobilization. No recommendations have yet been made to Congress on the reserve structure. However, the military authorities believe that any new plan should require reservists to join reserve units during the six year period in which they are obligated to be a part of the United States Reserve Army. While the obligation exists at the moment that soldiers discharged from active service continue in Reserve status for six years, an insignificant number of these reservists became associated with reserve units. The service chiefs are well aware that the voluntary enlistment rate in the Air Force and the Navy was kept up only because of the pressure of the draft and because a shooting war was going on in Korea. With reductions in monthly draft calls and the ending of the fighting in Korea, the Navy and the Air Force may have a good deal of trouble reaching the manpower ceilings which have been established. Finally the service chiefs are acutely aware that there is a lack of re-enlistment and believe that more inducement must be offered if the quality of the services (aside from the quantity) is to be increased. It is re-enlistments which increase the quality of an Army not first enlistments or draftees. In the short run therefore the problem of maintaining the desired qualitative standards, especially in the Air Force and the Navy, is more one of obtaining trained manpower than of appropriations. He pointed out the obvious inconsistency of the present circumstances in which, under GI benefits, an individual is given $6,000. if he leaves the service and only $300 if he re-enlists. This factor of increased quality is of special importance in the field of continental defence where the first requirement is to have a large organization of highly trained individuals of above-average intelligence. The increasing technical complications of Air Force operations underline the need for re-enlistments.

Discussion of Soviet Intentions and the New United States Strategy

20. The meeting then proceeded to discuss the briefs which had been presented by Mr. Bowie and Admiral Radford. The Chairman emphasized his opinion that not too long a period of time should be allowed to elapse between these meetings. Mr. Heeney recalled the original purpose of the meetings, pointing out that they had been begun in a time when international tensions seemed somewhat greater than at the moment, and when it seemed possible that the United States Government might feel compelled, at short notice, to employ the atomic bomb. The decision to hold periodic meetings of "consultation" developed from views exchanged between President Truman, Prime Minister Attlee and Prime Minister St. Laurent in December 1950. These meetings had been designed to provide for informal exchange of information and views and for a review of the "danger spots" with particular reference to situations in which the United States might consider using the atomic bomb.⁵³

21. Mr. Heeney indicated that, from the Canadian side, there seemed to be nothing of importance to add to Mr. Bowie's interpretation of the Berlin Conference. He did ask, however, whether other United States sources of intelligence support the general proposition that seemed to be accepted by the West, that international tension was now less than it had been even though Soviet long-term objectives had not changed. The Chairman thought that this was true when the usual limitations on intelligence estimates were taken into consideration. He stressed, however, that while there might be some indication of relaxation in tension, we were faced for an indefinite period with the threat of possible Soviet aggression which was serious enough to make it imperative that we be given the maximum of warning of any indications of the possible renewal of direct Soviet aggression. He thought that the view was somewhat less strongly held that we might be exposed to a sudden and surprise attack, "say the day after to-morrow", but not to the extent of reducing the sense of urgency concerning the development of the necessary continental defence.

⁵³ Voir/See Volume 17, Documents 682-713.

22. Admiral Radford pointed out that the Canadian authorities were aware of the United States military estimate that the Soviet Union was unlikely to launch a war of aggression within the next three years. They were also aware, however, that it was the United States military estimate that the Soviet Union had the capability of launching a war any time and that one could not discount the dangers of an accidental outbreak of war. He was anxious, he said, that no doubt should be left in anyone's mind as to how the United States military regarded the idea that tension had been relaxed. He suggested that the relaxation of tension was more in our minds than in the minds of Soviet planners and that the Soviet Union was keeping up a pressure on the West which should cause us as much concern today as it did three years ago. In those three years, of course, Western strength had grown more rapidly relative to Soviet strength, but since Soviet strength had never been seriously reduced after World War II, this should be cold comfort to us. He envisioned the Soviet threat as a three-pronged offensive on the psychological, economic and military fronts. It was possible, with some assurance, to estimate the military threat. It was almost impossible to estimate the extent of the psychological and economic threat and it was here that he thought the West would have its greatest problems.

23. The Chairman elaborated on Admiral Radford's point. He said that in the United States estimate the Soviet Union would not actively seek to launch a war in the next three years. On the other hand there was no significant change in Soviet foreign policy, even though that policy involved the possibility that the Soviet Union would be led into war. As time went on continued Soviet adherence to such policies might in fact make more acute the danger of the sudden outbreak of war. He stressed the difficulty of defining relaxation of tension, but however it was defined, it should not be interpreted by the West as grounds for any decrease in Western defence efforts.

24. Mr. Heeney expressed general agreement with this United States estimate. He then turned to a discussion of the implications of the new United States strategy for its allies. He recalled that in the formative years of NATO, Canadian representatives had done all they could to assist their United States colleagues in encouraging efforts on the part of the alliance to build up its strength. At the last Council meeting, however, the emphasis was shifted from the concept of the particular year of crisis to that of the "long pull" and it was agreed, with the full concurrence of the United States, that more consideration would have to be given to the economic basis of the NATO defence effort. This emphasis on better defence for less cost, taken together with public discussion of the United States "new look" in defence strategy, has raised in the minds of some of our European colleagues the fear that the United States might be embarking on a policy of gradual disengagement from its commitments abroad and turning away, in some measure at least, from support of the concept of collective security. Some chose to interpret the scheduled withdrawal of two United States divisions from Korea as further evidence of disengagement. While Canadian authorities could appreciate the factors which had led to certain re-adjustments in United States defence strategy, it was often difficult to combat such interpretations of United States intentions by friends in ignorance and by enemies in malevolence who criticized the United States. It was in this respect that these meetings of consultation were so important. They provided the Canadian authorities with an opportunity to get further information at a high level on the motives which underlay United States policy re-adjustments and put them in a better position to answer the questions posed by their European colleagues. He was certain that the United States Government appreciated the necessity of consultation with its allies on matters of such extreme importance as United States defence strategy. Without consultation the allies of the United States might be kept in as much doubt as the potential aggressor as to the real intentions of the United States.

25. The Chairman said he was fully aware of the problem raised by Mr. Heeney for United States representatives were faced with similar questions at every turn. He said he thought he would be breaking no confidence in referring to a comment made by President Eisenhower at a meeting earlier that day of the National Security Council. The Council was considering the first long-term planning paper (and the Chairman emphasized it was the first such paper) designed to present United States policy objectives not in terms of the next year or the current budget or the present Administration, but in terms of the long-range interests of the United States. The President had commented that responsible United States authorities would be fools if they did not realize that United States planning has to be in generations, in the same sense as Soviet planning had been since the success of the Revolution. The Chairman assured the meeting that United States commitments to NATO and EDC were as firm as they had ever been. He said, however, that because people must be constantly reassured, even of the obvious, the United States Government intended to reaffirm publicly these commitments in the not too distant future.

26. The Chairman said that while the United States Government fully appreciated the important implications that United States defence policy had for NATO and EDC, it also seemed reasonable that the European allies should take into account the emergency build-up of United States defence forces between 1950 and 1953, the amount of foreign military aid granted by the United States, its contributions in manpower and money to NATO, and the expense of United States support of the French in Indo-China. All these efforts had cost a great deal of money and there were Europeans who worried about economic collapse in the United States. It was in these terms that the new look in United States defence had to be explained to the European allies of the United States. He hoped that on their side they realized how important it was that France ratify the European Defence Community treaty this year. They must also be convinced that the late awakening of the United States to an awareness of the paucity of its continental defences was not a return to isolationism. The shoring up of those defences in the face of known Soviet capabilities was an act of pure military prudence and of vital importance to the defences of the Western world. Mr. Heeney asked if it was correct to assume that the United States continued to place the same weight as in the past on NATO as a deterrent to Soviet aggression. The Chairman replied that such an assumption was correct.

27. Admiral Radford pointed out that NATO and the United States had no alternative to the "long pull" and that the West must continue to live with the Soviet threat. The West is stronger than it was a few years ago and to the degree that it is stronger, there is probably some relaxation of tension. But there has been no removal of threat. A world divided between two powerful antagonists is not a happy world, but a situation of tension is preferable to atomic warfare. In his estimate a world divided between two major powers, in one of which only the desire for peace exists, is much more exposed to the danger that war will break out than is a world divided between two powers, both of which are ready for a war but which are prepared to exist without it under conditions of constant tension. The Chairman supported Admiral Radford's argument by referring to the fact that it was the lack of a power balance which in two instances led to the outbreak of major world wars. Any sense of security would be false unless it is firmly based on increased and increasing allied strength.

Continental and Civil Defence

28. General Foulkes said he would like to express on behalf of the Canadian services their appreciation for the willingness of the United States authorities to convene such meetings of consultation as this. Following along the line of thought which Mr. Heeney had developed, it would be much easier to deal with questions concerning the new United States defence policy which might be asked by European colleagues when opportunities such as this meeting were presented at which the Canadian authorities could learn more about United States intentions. In addition, United States views put forward at these meetings were obviously of great importance to Canadian planners as they tackled the problems of how best to provide adequate defences for Canada. He went on to refer to the problem of providing appropriate civil defence for Canada in the light of the increased capabilities of the Soviet Union to launch a successful atomic attack on the continent. He expressed the hope that it might be possible to issue some public statement on the work which had already been done on the mid-Canada early warning radar chain before the United States film on the 1952 hydrogen bomb test at Eniwetok was made available for public showing. The Chairman said that public showing of the film was still being delayed in spite of pressure from civil defence authorities for its release. In this the State Department have supported the Defense Department's view that it should be held up until at least after the Geneva Conference. In answer to a question by Mr. Heeney as to why there seemed to be a "second round" of articles in the press on continental defence, the Chairman said he thought civil defence authorities were responsible. They had found that they had to scare people thoroughly if they were to get their appropriations through Congress. It went even further than the question of money, in that civil defence authorities were finding it very difficult to interest the citizenry in the subject. This was one of the reasons why these authorities were pressing so vigorously for the release of the film. State Department and Defense Department authorities, however, were concerned that the use of such a scare technique might get out of hand and result in impossible demands being made upon the Government for expenditures in the field of continental defence. Mr. Bryce said that the same problem of perspective existed for the Canadian Government and asked if any decisions had been taken in the United States as to the limitation of the size of urban areas or the dispersion of industry and government.

29. Admiral Radford said that in his opinion civil defence authorities should concentrate on building up a sound professional staff and should leave the "arm waving and emotion" to voluntary organizations. He said that there had already been pressure for large-scale civil defence exercises in the United States but that the Defense Department was attempting to have them delayed, for in his opinion they were likely to give rise to more trouble than they were worth. The Chairman said that the United States Government was working on the problem of dispersion of industry and government. In this field the generous loan and depreciation benefits granted to new industries which would locate themselves in relatively isolated areas was a powerful lever. No steps were being taken to limit the size of urban areas, primarily because no one had been able to decide how it could be done successfully. Admiral Radford said that the whole question of dispersal of industry had to be most carefully considered, for it was important that highly industrialized centres not become pockets of depression. Most of the plans offered for really large-scale dispersion were simply not realistic. The natural trend in industry sitting at the moment was on the outskirts of large cities. Some workers travelled as much as 30 and 40 miles from the large cities in which they lived to the plants in which they worked. It was the height of foolishness to locate a plant 30 or 40 miles from the city for its protection while the workers required to operate the plant lived in congested cities exposed to the most disastrous effects of atomic bombing. The Chairman referred to the war-time experience of the Allies in Germany where it was finally decided that the human element was the only really vulnerable one in German aircraft production. Only when German aircraft workers were seriously discommoded did production fall off. Bombing of the plants alone had very little effect.

30. General Foulkes said that he was coming around to the view that civil defence must be brought in line with our present thinking of the Soviet capabilities to attack the continent. In Canada and, so far as he knew, in the United States present civil defence activity followed the lines of that carried out in London during the last war. It was what he called the "village pump system", i.e. local civil defence organizations working in their immediate areas. In the changed circumstances brought about by the possible use of the atomic bomb the civil defence organization would go up with the rest of the town. There was, it seemed to him, a need for a civil defence organization which could be moved from place to place and which was controlled centrally. Survival would be the dominating factor in the first 30 days of atomic attack and it was essential, therefore, that some civil defence organization should be capable of reducing the impact immediately the war broke out. He wondered if it might not be possible to use the bulk of the static armed forces in the country for this work, those who, for example, would normally be concerned with handing out quartermaster stores and administering large army camps. So far as he could see some such organization would be the only alternative to an expansion of a permanent civil defence organization of the type presently in existence. He thought that mobile columns might be organized whose task it would be immediately upon the outbreak of war to transport such members of the armed forces as had been assigned civil defence duties to areas of greatest need. In addition prior attention would have to be given to the dispersal of hospital supplies and protective equipment.

31. Admiral Radford said he was in complete agreement with this concept of a civil defence organization. The Chairman said he would certainly like to have these views on paper for examination by the United States authorities. It was pointed out by General Foulkes and Mr. Bryce that these ideas did not have Canadian Government approval but were merely the preliminary opinions of the Chiefs of Staff. However, they agreed that some consideration might be given to passing the views in writing and informally to the United States authorities.

Early Warning

32. General Foulkes said that the Canadian authorities felt that they had increasing reason for concern that little if any warning would be given before a Soviet attack. The extent of the warning which might be expected obviously had an important bearing on defence planning. In recent conversations with General Gruenther it had been indicated that probably three days' warning was all that could be expected. Admiral Radford said that at the moment, because of the lack of adequate early warning systems on this continent, the United States Joint Chiefs are assuming that they would be given no warning whatsoever of an attack. So far as NATO was concerned, he too had been talking to General Gruenther and found his worry to be that even if he had three to five days' warning he would probably be unable to use it since he would not be able to convince some of his European colleagues of the imminence of attack. They might even argue that to make such overt moves as would be necessary to reduce the success of a surprise attack would only serve to ensure that that surprise attack take place. The problem in the United States to which the Joint Chiefs had been giving some thought was over what period of time could an alert status be maintained. Could you, for example, have every one on 100 percent alert for a few days or weeks, with reductions in the degree of alert as the danger passed? What they really hoped to evolve was a degree of alert which could be maintained successfully in this country without loss of public interest over an indefinite period.

33. Both sides agreed that the problem of what degree of warning we would get of a Soviet attack was one to which a great deal of thought had to be devoted.

34. General Foulkes said that this problem of time of warning was of immediate concern to the Canadian service authorities. With Canadian air squadrons in Europe the problem was one of achieving maximum flexibility. If we were assured that adequate warning would be given it would not be necessary to have stations fully manned and it would be possible to rotate personnel in such a manner as to do away in large measure with the need for permanent housing in Europe for dependents.

Reserves for Europe

35. The problem was also directly relevant to the question of getting reserves to Europe in time to stem the initial Soviet ground attack. If there was not sufficient warning to get reserves to Europe, not only would we be at a serious disadvantage in ground strength but even the effect of the tactical use of atomic weapons would be seriously lessened by our inability to force the enemy to concentrate. There was a question in his mind also as to whether the strategic reserve to be built up in the United States would be of any use in Europe if there was to be no warning or very little warning. Admiral Radford agreed on the importance of as much advance warning as possible. The question of supplying reserves to Europe was one which gave him great concern. It was "fantastic" in his opinion to believe that the U.S. NATO commitment of two divisions by D+30 days could be honoured. The best that could be done in the most ideal circumstances would be the provision of these two divisions in D+45 to D+60 days. The aim of the NATO defence organization was the provision of balanced collective forces and in his opinion the European allies must be brought to realize that it was their job to provide the bulk of the ground troops which would meet the initial attack of the enemy. In this context, of course, a German contribution of manpower was essential. He said that when he spoke of the tactical use of the atomic bomb he had in mind a deep tactical offensive use which was something short of strategic bombing and something more than tactical bombing in front of our own troops. He thought it was important that in our planning we did not give the enemy more capability than he had. For example, he said that some of the Soviet planes which alarmed us so far as continental defence was concerned are the same planes which alarmed General Gruenther in Europe. In NATO we are fully aware of the logistic problems which will have to be met in keeping our forces supplied. The enemy will have many of the same problems and there are grounds for thinking that we are solving them faster than he is.

36. He summed up his appreciation of this situation in the following terms: If NATO was ever to be the instrument in the defences of the free world which it was supposed to be it would soon have to have a German military contribution.⁵⁴ The United States was prepared for the indefinite future to maintain the present level of its forces in Europe. Any additional power which NATO needed from outside Europe could not be in the form of ground troops, at least in the initial stages. It was nonsense to believe that reserves could be moved from the United States in time to have any effect on the early stages of the battle. On the other hand the Air Force was highly mobile and could bomb both strategically and tactically almost from the outset of the war.

37. The new Chiefs of Staff had, in their reassessment of United States defence strength, also stressed the importance of a build-up of a strategic reserve of men and matériel in the United States. While some of that reserve strength would probably be moved to support the NATO ground effort as soon as such a move was possible, some elements of it would be kept for eventual use against the Soviet Union in the right place at the proper time. A build-up of Western strength on the ground in Europe which might eventually lead to stalemate with Russian forces would not serve the purposes of the West. The new Chiefs of Staff had believed, therefore, that they must have immediate control of sufficient reserve strength so that it could be committed where it would best serve the interests of the free world.

38. General Foulkes agreed that in the initial stages at least any Russian ground attack would have to be met with the NATO troops on the ground and NATO commanders could not plan on the usefulness of reserves from overseas. Some discussion ensued between the Chairman, Admiral Radford and General Foulkes as to the possibility of stockpiling equipment in Europe for reserves in order that the personnel might be moved quickly by air. Admiral Radford said that there was no present intention on the part of the United States authorities to stockpile equipment in this fashion. The Chairman said that more attention would have to be given to the problem of marrying up troops and stockpiled supplies.

Mid-Canada Early Warning Line

39. General Foulkes then gave the meeting a progress report on the mid-Canada early warning radar line, pointing out that it was not, as some people tended to regard it, a southern line but one which bordered on the sub-Arctic. With the aid of a map he indicated the progress of the site survey now underway on which the RCAF and USAF have co-operated. Before dealing in detail with the site survey, he recalled for the meeting the requirements which had been set up for the radar line to meet requirements up to 1960; that it must be capable of handling aircraft at speeds up to 550 knots, flying singly or in groups, from 200 ft. to 65,000 ft.; that the interval between the stations be not more than 30 miles; that information that the line had been crossed had to reach Air Defence Command headquarters within three minutes; and that it had to be capable of discerning friend from foe, even though it was essentially a warning line and not an identification device. To assist in the identification process it would be necessary to introduce conventional scanning radar at certain points across the line. Canadian authorities favoured the setting up of a number of gates in the line through which all friendly aircraft would have to pass. Not only would this help in the identification of friend and foe, but it would introduce a flying discipline for civilian aircraft in time of peace, which would be useful in time of war. He said that Canadian authorities thought that in peacetime the line would serve the civil purpose of locating lost aircraft. If an aircraft did not use the gates someone would be sent up to investigate.

40. General Foulkes went on to indicate the progress of the site reconnaissance in the various sectors of the line. Work on the Atlantic and Pacific sectors would be delayed somewhat because of heavy snows, but the reconnaissance of the other three sectors would probably be completed by the end of this month. The difficult location of the line might prove valuable in the long run in that the possibility of sabotage would be reduced. Some of the line would, for example, have to be serviced by helicopter. A target date of June 1st had been set for the completion of reconnaissance of the whole line. It was estimated that the line, or a major part of it, would be in operation by the end of 1956. Individual sectors of the line might be put in operation as they were completed without waiting for the whole line to be completed. It was estimated that 400-500 men would be sufficient to operate the whole line. Tests of a pilot model of the line would probably be run in March. The line when completed would provide at least three hours early warning in Canada and more extended warning in the United States. Admiral Radford expressed enthusiastic interest in the North-South line running south from Churchill since it was the first indication he had had that such a line was being built.

41. Admiral Radford said that the United States Service chiefs were anxious to proceed rapidly but surely with the development of adequate early warning systems, although there had been some attempt to stampede them into acceptance of schemes of unproven reliability and practicability. General Foulkes said that the Service authorities in Canada had the same aim and hoped therefore to be able to test the mid-Canada line before giving attention to any more distant early warning system. The question of some public statement on the progress of the work was raised again, and Admiral Radford gave General Foulkes a draft press release which, it was proposed, might be released by Senate Armed Services Committee with respect to the briefing it had received from the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff on the problem of continental defence. Admiral Radford said that it was completely innocuous, but he would not agree to its release until it had been discussed with Canadian authorities.

42. General Foulkes made reference to one final point with respect to continental defence which was of some concern to Canadian authorities. The Canadian public would be inclined to question any development which would require the presence in Canada of USAF squadrons for the purposes of continental defence when a Canadian air division was in Europe. While this could be explained in military terms, it was not politically desirable.⁵⁵ The Chairman and Admiral Radford said they fully appreciated the Canadian problem.

43. The meeting ended with agreement on both sides that no mention of these meetings of consultation should be made in any public statement, but that responsible authorities of both countries might be asked to co-operate in the preparation of a draft press release or public statement concerning the progress of installations for continental defence.⁵⁶

Washington, September 27, 1954

MEETING OF CONSULTATION

The meeting of consultation between Canadian and United States officials took place on Friday, September 24. You will remember that it has been the practice for each side to keep its own records of these meetings and then to compare the two records so that no glaring inconsistencies exist. It will be some time before we are in a position to forward our record of the meeting to you.

2. The main topics dealt with at the meeting were (a) the situation on the China coast and at Quemoy, (b) Europe after EDC, (c) Soviet intentions and the Soviet threat to North America, and (d) continental defence.

3. Discussion of the Communist Chinese threat to Quemoy and Formosa confirmed the estimate which we have sent you in other correspondence that no final decision has been taken by the United States Government as to whether United States forces should assist in the direct defence of Quemoy. Admiral Radford made one point which was new to us and that had to do with the possibility that current Communist Chinese attacks on Quemoy might well be a covering operation for a planned attack on the Tachen Islands further to the north which were not, and could not be nearly as well defended by Nationalist forces. Admiral Radford said that an anxious eye was being kept on this possibility by both Nationalist Chinese and United States authorities. Bedell Smith spoke in more general terms of United States policy towards Communist China and the burden of his remarks was that if it were not for the strong views on China held in Congress the Administration's policy could be a good deal more flexible. He believed that Mr. Attlee had rendered a real service to the United States and other Western Powers by his decision to accompany Bevan to Communist China and by the report which he had made on the trip. Bedell Smith said that it was not without the bounds of possibility that in the relatively near future United States public opinion might be brought around to accepting the necessity of admitting Communist China to membership in the General Assembly. He saw little hope, however, that the United States could agree to Communist Chinese membership on the Security Council and he thought that some attention would have to be given to how this situation could be dealt with. Incidentally, these remarks obviously horrified Walter Robertson, the Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs who attended the meeting.

4. Discussion of the failure of the French to ratify the EDC Treaty and of the subsequent problems raised with respect to German re-armament and the possible admission of Germany to NATO confirmed our impression that the French stock is at an all-time low among senior officials of the United States Government both civilian and military. The Under-Secretary and I, without minimizing in any way the difficulties which the current French attitude posed for the United States and other members of the Western alliance, made every effort to impress our United States colleagues with the Canadian view that there was no alternative to French participation in the defence of Europe. Bedell Smith assured us that in spite of French actions in the recent past both with respect to European problems and Indo-China, the United States representatives would go to the nine-power meetings in London with an open mind and would be prepared to accept any formula which would be satisfactory to both Germany and France. Quoting Mr. Churchill's words of another day Bedell Smith expressed the hope that at London we would not have to be satisfied with "the lowest common denominator of all our apprehensions".

5. In spite of his assurances concerning the open-minded approach of United States representatives to the London meetings, Bedell Smith went on to stress that in the United States view time was running out for Chancellor Adenauer. He said that if at the London meetings there could not be found a formula for Franco-German co-operation in the defence of Europe the Western alliance "might have to follow the tactic of the vacant chair" for a time and there was no doubt that in Bedell Smith's mind the vacant chair would be that which France could not or would not occupy. It was his "personal view" that the Spanish bases treaty had changed the strategic picture in Europe significantly. It was possible he thought that attention would have to be given to an alternative strategy for the defence of Europe which would be "infinitely less satisfactory" than the strategy which would have been based on the EDC Treaty had France ratified it.

6. There was little new in the United States estimate of Soviet intentions or in Admiral Radford's appreciation of the Soviet threat to North America. So far as continental defence was concerned agreement was reached on the issuance of a press release by the two governments with respect to the distant early warning line. Your draft text was accepted with one alteration (our telegram No. WA-1682 of September 25⁺).⁵⁷ Bedell Smith and Admiral Radford were quick to agree that General Foulkes' suggestions concerning a truly joint approach to a North American weapons system should be brought up formally for consideration by the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff. They indicated that, in spite of the real difficulties which would arise for the United States because of security regulations, some solution to these difficulties could be achieved.

7. This will be the last meeting of consultation under the chairmanship of Bedell Smith and we note this fact with deep regret. There is no doubt that he is one of the ablest United States officials we are ever likely to come in contact with. Furthermore he has been particularly well disposed to Canada. He is to continue on in an advisory capacity to the Administration but I am sure his departure from day to day contact with the policies of the United States Government will become apparent. We can only hope that his successor in the position of Under-Secretary of State, Mr. Herbert Hoover, Jr., who attended this meeting, was impressed with the degree of frankness with which Bedell Smith conducted the meeting and will follow that practice when he presides at the next meeting of consultation.

MEETING OF CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS
ON SEPTEMBER 24, 1954

I attach four copies of the record of the meeting of consultation between representatives of the Canadian and United States Governments which was held on Friday, September 24. Highlights of the meeting were dealt with in our despatch under reference. The record has been compared with the record kept on the United States side and there are no major discrepancies between the Canadian and the United States records.

2. The attachment is almost a verbatim record of the meeting rather than a report on it and hence is lengthy. It is a record, however, worth reading for it throws light on the thinking of senior administration officials which underlies United States policy towards Europe and the Far East. The meeting, I believe, was one of the most useful of such meetings I have attended.

3. In the light of the decisions reached at the nine-power meetings in London, the discussion of the European situation outlined in the attachment may seem to be only of historical interest. On the other hand, it was not in any sense an academic discussion. It revealed what continues to be a basic element of United States policy towards Europe, the necessity of European integration involving France and Germany as a base for the defences of Europe against Soviet expansionism. European leaders should be under no illusions. If they fail in the implementation of a united European approach to the problem of Soviet expansionism they must expect increasing disillusionment on the part of both United States military and civilian authorities and a strengthening of the influence of exponents in the United States Government of the theories and practice of peripheral defence.

4. It was agreed that the suggestions made by General Foulkes at the meeting with respect to continental defence (paras. 54 to 57) should now be put to Admiral Radford in a personal letter from General Foulkes — the next step to be decided upon later.⁵⁸ I assume that you will arrange to send us copies of all the relevant correspondence on this matter. I believe it is essential that we should be kept informed at all stages as to where the matter stands in order that we can discuss the subject intelligently with the State Department. The State Department, I am certain, will be greatly interested and directly involved in developments arising out of the suggestions made by General Foulkes since they will affect the defence policies of the Canadian and United States Governments.

for the Canadian Government.

2. The agenda of the meeting consisted of four items,

- (a) the situation on the China coast as a result of Communist attacks on Quemoy Island,
- (b) Europe after EDC,
- (c) Soviet intentions and the Soviet threat, and
- (d) continental defence.

Situation on the China Coast

3. At the invitation of the Chairman, Admiral Radford outlined the military situation on the China coast in the light of recent Communist Chinese attacks on Quemoy Island. Three island groups off the Chinese mainland, Quemoy and its outlying islands, the Matsu Islands — 150 miles to the north — and the Tachen Islands — a further 200 miles north — were held by Nationalist Chinese forces. Quemoy was the best defended of the three. It was garrisoned by one corps of Chinese Nationalist forces, reinforced with artillery elements, a total of 53,000 personnel. The action, begun in August, had died down considerably in recent weeks until September 22 when Quemoy was subjected again to heavy Communist artillery barrage. The Nationalist Chinese air force was keeping up its regular attacks on shipping concentrations around Amoy harbour and on gun emplacements on the mainland.

4. The Communists would be faced with a tough fight if they attempted to take Quemoy. Communist forces had suffered losses of some 10,000 personnel in their last attack on the island in 1948. United States authorities were not sure but that the Communists had launched their attacks on Quemoy as a smoke-screen for an intended attack on the Tachen Islands. In the latter instance Communist air power from the Shanghai district could be employed, whereas in the vicinity of Quemoy the Communists had no air fields in operational condition. The Tachen Islands were less well defended than Quemoy. Nationalist forces on the islands consisted of one division of regular troops which had been trained and equipped by the United States plus some 3,000 or 4,000 guerrillas. The islands could not be held without outside assistance to neutralize the Communist air power which could be brought to bear on the islands.

5. In answer to a question from Mr. Heeney concerning the implications of the Communist attacks on Quemoy for the defence of Formosa, Admiral Radford said that the attacks might be the first step of a Communist drive against Formosa. However, the biggest factor in the attacks seemed to be psychological, on the one hand to honour the public pledges of the Communist Chinese Government to retake Formosa and on the other to weaken the morale of Formosa's defenders. There were, of course, obvious military objectives involved. The Nationalists, by their ability to control Quemoy and its outlying islands had been able to stop all Communist shipping from using the excellent facilities of Amoy harbour. It was known that most of the logistic support for any communist Chinese air force in Fukien Province would have to come by sea and in the present circumstances this would be impossible.

6. Mr. Robertson stressed the unfortunate psychological impact on the Nationalist Chinese cause which would be occasioned by Communist Chinese successes in taking Quemoy. It would tend to confirm some public estimates of the weakness of Nationalist Chinese forces. In addition to the obvious loss of face for Nationalist China it would involve the very practical loss of some 50,000 trained troops. So far as the Communists were concerned, a successful attack on Quemoy would free one of the best harbours on the China coast for use in assembling the necessary strength to launch an all-out attack on Formosa itself.

7. The Chairman then spoke in more general terms of United States policy towards Communist China. The United States Government was not blind to the realities of the situation. Communist China would not cease to exist by reason of its non-recognition by the United States. The United States Government deplored the aggressive policies of the Communist Chinese Government and, with its allies, had fought against the implementation of those policies in Korea. Communist China was in a different stage of revolution than was the Soviet Union. The latter was better able than Communist China to accept a state of relative quiescence in its relations with the outside world. The revolutionary momentum which had brought the present leaders of China to power had not yet been lost.

8. The Chairman thought that the first adverse press comment on Mr. Attlee's visit to Communist China had been balanced off by later and more favourable comment. The United States Government and the United States public should appreciate the effort which Mr. Attlee had made at his advanced age to accompany Mr. Bevan on the trip and in that manner to ensure that something other than a purely Bevan report on the trip was made to the world at large. Mr. Attlee was a sensible man who had rendered a real service to the United States and the free world and it was indeed fortunate that he had made the trip.

9. Mr. Heeney pointed out that Canada's position with respect to Communist China lay somewhere between that of the United Kingdom and the United States. Canada had not recognized the Communist Government but, just before the Korean war broke out, the disposition had existed within the Canadian Government to recognize the facts of Chinese political development no matter how distasteful they might be.⁵⁹ There remained in Canada a solid body of opinion of this temper. It was the stated policy of the Canadian Government to consider the establishment of relations with the present Government of mainland China if and when that Government had purged itself of its iniquities. Public opinion in Canada on the subject of Communist China was noticeably different than that in the United States even though it did not go as far as that in the United Kingdom.

10. The Chairman said he understood the Canadian position, and added that United States policy was not inflexible. For example, the United States Government has been requested by the United Kingdom Government to consider some moderate relaxation of current trade restrictions with respect to Communist China. The Chairman said that he had told the United Kingdom Ambassador that the United States could not give favourable consideration to such a relaxation at least until after the passage of the foreign aid bills at the next session of Congress. He hoped that if the United Kingdom pressed the matter it would be possible to have a study made which would result in much the same course of action as that taken in the recent past in connection with easing the restrictions on trade with Eastern Europe. The United States had followed this course of action with respect to Eastern Europe, despite doubts as to the wisdom of the action, in deference to the importance of United States-United Kingdom relationships. The United Kingdom had likewise been willing on a number of occasions to meet the United States point of view on Asian matters despite doubts which existed in the United Kingdom of the wisdom of those views. There was then a full realization by the two Governments of each other's problems. The Chairman did not anticipate that serious friction between the Governments would develop over the question of Communist China.

11. The question of the admission of Communist China to the United Nations could be expected to come up annually and it might be anticipated that the majority against admission would decrease each year. It was not beyond the bounds of possibility that the day would come when public and political opinion in the United States might be brought to accept the necessity of admitting Communist China to membership in the General Assembly. The Chairman saw no likelihood, however, that United States opinion could be brought around to accepting the necessity of Chinese Communist membership in the Security Council. Attention would have to be given to the problem of how to deal with this situation.

12. In reference to a question from Mr. Heeney as to Communist Chinese motives in the current attack on Quemoy, the Chairman quoted the opinion of a United Kingdom observer, with which he agreed. There was a possibility that the Communists would undertake an attack on Formosa itself even though it would be destined to failure. The failure could be portrayed as a failure in the face of over-whelming odds represented by the presence of the United States Seventh Fleet. By such tactics Communist China would hope to emphasize divisions in the free world coalition and especially differences between the United Kingdom and the United States. To a lesser degree the same arguments might be applied to Communist tactics with respect to Quemoy.

13. Mr. Robertson said he could not understand by what process of mental gymnastics members of the United Nations could take action to permit Communist Chinese membership even in the General Assembly, so long as the U.N. resolution declaring Communist China to be an aggressor remained on the record.⁶⁰ Nor could he see how the resolution could be withdrawn in the light of Communist violation of the terms of the armistice agreement in Korea and refusal to negotiate any kind of acceptable compromise there. Either the Charter of the United Nations and the resolutions passed by the Organization meant something or they did not. If the latter was the case serious doubts would arise as to the value of the Organization as a whole. The Chairman and Mr. Heeney agreed that the aggressor resolution as it stood was a legal barrier to the admission of Communist China to the United Nations. Mr. Heeney believed that some modification in the resolution would be necessary before any action could be taken on the admission of Communist China. He referred again to the Canadian Government's position that no consideration would be given to the question of recognition of Communist China or its admission to the United Nations until the Communist Chinese Government had given some solid indications of an intention to conduct its international relationships by peaceful means.

Europe After EDC

14. The Chairman called on Mr. Bowie to outline the United States attitude on the problems of European integration and German rearmament. When Mr. Bowie asked for some indication as to the extent to which he should go into details of the United States position, Mr. Heeney outlined briefly the information which had been made available to the Canadian Government on the situation arising out of French failure to ratify the EDC Treaty. He said that much of the general information had come from the welter of reports from Canadian missions in Europe. So far as the United States attitude was concerned, the Canadian Government was extremely grateful for the frankness with which senior State Department officials had spoken to the officers of the Embassy. He understood that United States representatives would go to the nine-power London meetings with an open mind and prepared to accept any formula acceptable to London, Paris and Bonn which offered hope for genuine Franco-German co-operation in the defence of Europe.

15. Mr. Bowie then went on to speak of the views which Chancellor Adenauer had expressed to Mr. Dulles in the course of the latter's recent visit to Europe. Chancellor Adenauer had made it clear that, in his view, the future of Europe depended upon a genuine Franco-German rapprochement leading to an organic unity of Europe. So far as German domestic needs were concerned it was essential that some move be made which would point to the eventual restoration of sovereignty for Germany. Finally German re-armament would have to be achieved in a fashion which would not foreclose on a genuine integration of Europe. Chancellor Adenauer's personal order of priority then was, first to find a suitable basis for Franco-German co-operation, second to provide some means by which sovereignty could be restored to Germany and third to give detailed attention to the problem of German re-armament.

16. The Chancellor was suspicious and distrustful of the methods used by Mendes-France in his handling of the EDC issue and yet he continued to stress the importance of Franco-German rapprochement. He was prepared to go far to meet the genuine fears of France if he could be convinced that Mendes-France was equally seriously interested in achieving a basis for Franco-German co-operation. He had expressed considerable doubts that France really desired such co-operation.

17. The United States Government for its part was disappointed in the latest proposals put forward by Mendes-France and especially in the lack of attention paid in them to problems of the admission of Germany to NATO and German re-armament. The United States realized that Mendes-France would face a difficult parliamentary situation on the question of the admission of Germany to full membership in NATO. On the other hand, the Mendes-France approach with its emphasis on inspection and controls was, in the United States view, too negative an approach. It was thought possible that at the London meetings the French proposals could be modified and made acceptable if Mendes-France came to London prepared to be flexible. Upon one's assessment of Mendes-France's sincerity in achieving at London a real basis for Franco-German co-operation would depend in large measure one's assessment of the likely success of the London meeting. United States representatives were going to the London meetings assuming that Mendes-France had a sincere desire to achieve results but were prepared to recognize that this assessment might be in error.

18. The Chairman said that Mendes-France's description of the French plan at Strasbourg had not been encouraging. The French démarche had been received by the State Department only twenty-four hours in advance of the Strasbourg speech and had not itself been encouraging. The question remained as to whether what Mendes-France presented at Strasbourg were final terms or whether they were general suggestions allowing for compromise and modification. If they were the former the situation would be a repetition of what happened at Brussels when the French proposals were presented on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. Mendes-France had later interpreted his failure to achieve acceptance of French proposals on the grounds that his Benelux colleagues refused to negotiate.

19. The Chairman spoke of an exclusive interview which Mendes-France had had with a United States correspondent recently in which he had outlined French requirements so far as European integration was concerned. While the State Department had been pledged to secrecy on the content of the interview pending its publication, it was interesting to record that the interview had been granted solely on the understanding that it would be published in the United States before the nine-power meeting in London got under way. Mendes-France's arguments were directed to a United States audience and an advance text of the interview was to be in Mr. Dulles hands before he took off for London.

20. Mr. Heeney spoke of the deep concern which the situation in Europe following French rejection of the EDC Treaty caused for the Western allies. This was shared by Canada. The Canadian Government realized the grave disappointment which the United States Government must have experienced at the failure of the French to ratify the EDC Treaty and was deeply conscious of the efforts which the United States Government had devoted to the objective of genuine European integration. The Canadian Government shared the United States view on the necessity of greater European integration and the defeat of the EDC Treaty had come as a shock to the Canadian Government. The stability of Western Europe was possibly the most important consideration in Canadian foreign and defence policy. To a certain extent then, Canada's pre-London position was much the same as that of the United States. Canadian representatives would approach the meetings with an open mind not ruling out any formula which might appear to provide a basis for genuine Franco-German co-operation.

21. At the same time, the Canadian Government had grounds for concern in the limited information coming to it of the re-appraisal of the United States thinking with respect to Western Europe which seemed to be taking place. At this most critical time in the formation of United States policy German popularity seemed to have soared to new heights and French stock to have fallen to an all-time low. It was evident that, unless some new and satisfactory arrangements for genuine Franco-German co-operation could be arrived at speedily, the Administration would face great difficulties in the forthcoming session of Congress. While the grounds for United States skepticism as to French intentions and capabilities were well understood by the Canadian Government and were in fact shared to some extent, nevertheless, the Canadian Government attached critical importance to the maintenance of France in the political and military coalition of the free world. Perhaps the information as to French intentions which had come to the Canadian Government was not quite as pessimistic as that received by the United States.

22. The Canadian Government was given some advance knowledge of what was contained in Mendes-France's Strasbourg speech. At the same time the Canadian representative at NATO in Paris had been assured that France accepted the necessity of German membership in NATO, and that this was an integral part of the French approach to the problem. The Canadian Government believed that both France and Germany must be part of NATO and hoped that the main feature of any substitute for the EDC would be an Atlantic feature. From the reports which it had received, the Canadian Government got the impression that Chancellor Adenauer was less than enthusiastic at the approach to the problem through the Brussels Treaty. The Chancellor seemed to be worried that United Kingdom participation in an enlarged Brussels Treaty might in fact put a ceiling on European integration in contrast to what would have been possible under the terms of the EDC Treaty.

23. The Chairman said that the United States Government had let both the German and French Governments know that the United States would support any solution arrived at in London which was acceptable to both parties. The United States preferred some formula which would provide for the admission to NATO of Germany simultaneously with her adherence to the Brussels Treaty. Time was running out for Chancellor Adenauer and if Adenauer were gone the difficulties of achieving a settlement in Europe would be increased tremendously. The Chairman would be highly pessimistic of Europe's future with a German national army rattling about in it. Yet this development could not be prevented unless something was done soon. The possibility could not be ruled out that the Soviet Union might make a dramatic move to attract the Germans. There were already groups in Germany, although they constituted only minority groups at the moment, who believed that they could make terms with the Russians. It was their opinion that after a relatively brief period of difficulty the German tail could wag the Russian dog. The Chairman said that while he regarded this as a completely mistaken interpretation such opinion did exist.

24. If, at the London meetings, France exercised its veto on European integration by calling for restrictions on Germany which Chancellor Adenauer could not accept, it might be necessary for the Western alliance to follow "the tactic of the vacant chair" for a time. There were alternatives, of course, and on some of these the United States had reached a large measure of agreement with the United Kingdom. It was the Chairman's personal view that the Spanish bases treaty had changed the strategic picture considerably. There were other developments in addition, the more forthcoming attitude of such Middle Eastern countries as Iran and Iraq and the Turkish-Pakistan agreement, which strengthened this personal view. These developments might make possible an alternative strategy for the defence of Europe even though it would be infinitely less satisfactory than that which had been envisaged as arising out of ratification of the EDC Treaty.

25. Mr. Léger believed that France would not agree to the Brussels Treaty formula unless the United Kingdom were more closely tied to it. Canada had never been completely convinced of the United Kingdom argument that Commonwealth responsibilities made it impossible for the United Kingdom to involve itself too closely in the defence of Europe. Canada would, in fact, welcome a closer integration of the United Kingdom in European defence if that would solve the problem of Franco-German co-operation. The Canadian Government believed that Mendes-France might be willing to stake the life of his Government on acceptance by the French parliament of any solution reached at the London meetings. There was no way to be sure, however, of this.

26. Mr. Bowie said that Mr. Eden, in his recent conversations with Mendes-France, had been assured that the latter would put a package deal to the French parliament as a matter of confidence and that the package would include acceptance of a revised Brussels Treaty, German admission to NATO and the restoration of German sovereignty. No mention had been made by Mendes-France of discriminatory restrictions against Germans.

27. The Chairman reminded the meeting that Mr. Churchill had never really believed in the EDC Treaty but had deferred, with many personal reservations, to the advice of his Cabinet on the matter. He was now, however, strongly in favour of solution of the problem through an expanded Brussels Treaty and the concurrent admission of Germany to full membership in NATO.

28. Mr. Léger was sure the Chairman would realize what special problems were created for Canada when the fate of France was under consideration and it was conceivable that Canada might not be completely in step with the United States and the United Kingdom in these circumstances. It was worth remembering that, no matter how low French morale might be at this moment, it was as high as any morale in Europe would be if France were excluded from full participation in the Western alliance. The influence of a neutral France over its immediate European neighbours would be tremendous, and the alternative strategy touched on by the Chairman would in fact effectively neutralize France. Such a neutralization of France would be the first step towards the neutralization of Europe. In West Germany and the Benelux countries such a development would cause extreme anxiety and bring morale to the low point at which it now stood in France. Canada would hope and expect that this situation could not be allowed to develop.

29. The Chairman appreciated these arguments fully. It was for just such reasons that the United States would negotiate with the French without any spirit of resentment. The United States Government had been shocked, not so much at the failure of EDC as it had been at the methods employed by Mendes-France. This was particularly true after the personal assurances which he had offered senior United States representatives. His actions at Brussels and before the French parliament invited rejection of the EDC. It was the United States view that he should have made a stronger effort on behalf of the Treaty even though it might still have been defeated. French actions with respect to Indo-China were equally disturbing. Mendes-France seemed to have forgotten that Indo-China existed. The United States Government knew full well the problems presented for France here as well as in Europe. On the other hand the United States had invested heavily in Indo-China, in money, in military aid and in political support. Soldiers had every right to ask United States political advisers if, in the light of recent developments in Europe and in Indo-China, France could be considered sufficiently stable as a base of operations through which the soldiers could run their major lines of communication. If no such assurance could be offered, another look at the agreed strategy for the defence of Europe might be necessary. The last war had been fought without much French support except that of the Resistance which, in any struggle with the Soviet Union would, of course, be on the other side.

30. Mr. Heeney said that it was only fair to point out the great anxiety which would be aroused in Canada and elsewhere in the alliance by any such basic revision in United States strategy for the defence of Europe. It was essential that, in spite of the justifiable impatience and disappointment which the United States and other Western Governments felt over the behaviour with respect to Europe and Indo-China of successive French Governments, every effort continue to be made to bring the French along with us. The alternative might well be the loss of whatever chance existed to have France an effective partner in any durable European alliance. And for Canada there could be no durable alliance without France.

31. The Chairman agreed that neither diplomats nor soldiers could afford the luxury of impatience. For the United States, however, immediate problems were involved. Vast amounts of United States funds had been spent in Indo-China, and the Administration had gone far out on a limb before Congress to support French actions in Indo-China. Both he and Admiral Radford had gone before Congressional committees to give enthusiastic support to the Navarre Plan for bringing the war in Indo-China to a successful conclusion. It had been a good plan on paper and if energetically pursued would have produced a position of strength for the French. It was not carried out energetically. If an American general had been in place of the French commander responsible for the prosecution of the Navarre Plan he would have been court-martialled. The Administration had pinned a lot of faith on the necessity and the possibility of genuine Franco-German accord. The United States security investment in Europe could not be protected by the United States alone. If the London talks failed the Administration would face real trouble in Congress. There was relatively firm agreement with the United Kingdom on what the first alternative would be. No alternatives under consideration, however, would rule out France if she were willing to participate effectively. Every alternative would be pursued, so far as the United States was concerned, with extreme caution for the Administration was acutely aware of the dangers of engendering European neutrality by any hasty actions which might seem to run counter to Europe's best interests.

32. Admiral Radford stressed the shortness of the time in which some concrete action would have to be taken. The United States had immense military commitments in Europe and he was fearful that the Pentagon could not get Congressional sanction for their continuance, unless some satisfactory evidence could be produced of a willingness on the part of Europe to assist in its own defence. The period of manoeuvre could only be until defence expenditures came before Congress early next spring.

33. Mr. Bowie stressed the United States belief that Chancellor Adenauer also had only limited time, possibly only a matter of months. He went on to say that Chancellor Adenauer was somewhat fearful that acceptance of an enlarged Brussels Treaty might lead to difficulties if the United Kingdom placed too stringent limits on the extent of its co-operation with the Treaty Group. It was possible, therefore, that the United Kingdom attitude in this context would create a problem. Canada and the United States might be able to help to prevent this problem from arising. Mr. Heeney said that Canada was looking for a satisfactory pragmatic solution to the problem and might not be as wedded to the idea of integration per se as the United States Government and Chancellor Adenauer might be.

34. Admiral Radford expressed the fear that in the effort to get a political settlement, arrangements might be agreed to which would make defence of Europe impossible.

35. General Foulkes agreed with Admiral Radford that time was an important factor. The military might have to accept something less in the way of political settlement than was desirable and it should be borne in mind that there were limits as to what political arrangements were defensible. He thought that General Gruenther at the moment was labouring under severe psychological handicaps in building the strength of NATO. The attitude of the red pencil was everywhere evident in the desire of governments to cut down their commitments and this psychology could well ruin the Western efforts of the last four years to build up a position of strength in Europe.

36. France could not be written off as a partner in the defence of Europe. It was essential to the plan under which General Gruenther now operated to have depth. General Foulkes could not visualize any successful tactics against Soviet forces without French real estate under our control. The state of morale in the French General Staff had always been a problem. The difficulties stemmed from the division between deGaullist and Vichy supporters. One of the main purposes of the EDC had been to attempt to revivify the French esprit de corps by throwing the French General Staff into competition with other General Staffs within the alliance. There could be no improvement in the military capabilities of the French army until the esprit of the officer corps was strengthened. No matter what the condition of the French army was at the moment, the alliance could no more do without the ten French divisions than it could do without the twelve German divisions.

37. There was a new danger arising out of the recent studies of the effects of atomic fall-out that a further wave of neutralism might soon sweep over Europe. It could be expected that the effects of fall-out would soon become better known to the public and might well engender the belief that it would be better to be a live Communist than a dead Westerner. The urgency therefore of some definitive action to weld France and Germany together in the defence of Europe could not be overstressed.

38. The recent action of the United States Chiefs of Staff in informing NATO that no further progress could be made in capabilities studies until the German situation was clarified was but one indication of the need for urgent settlement. If it was impossible to proceed with the capabilities study NATO efforts would grind to a halt and the hard work of the post-war years would all have been in vain. The military might have to accept some unpleasant political realities but it was essential that the NATO spirit be kept alive.

39. The Chairman brought this portion of the discussion to a close with an expression of the hope that we would not have to accept a situation similar to that which Churchill had described in another day as the lowest common denominator of all our apprehensions.

Soviet Intentions and the Soviet Threat

40. Mr. Bowie said that there had not been much change in the United States estimate of Soviet intentions since the last meeting of consultation. A summary of the latest agreed intelligence would soon be printed for distribution to the Canadian Government.

41. There seemed to be no prospect of major instability in the Soviet régime. Any conflicts for power or policy differences within the ruling group would probably be resolved within the confines of that group. There was no change in Soviet relations with the satellite countries. Possible friction between the Soviet Union and Communist China might develop but it was estimated that the cohesive forces in the alliance over-balanced the divisive forces. Internally it was thought that the chief emphasis would continue to be placed on heavy industry although no substantial increase in military expenditures was expected within the next year. The Soviet Union would continue to be plagued with agricultural problems. It was estimated that the Soviet stockpile of nuclear weapons would be increased. It was also estimated that there would be an increase in the capabilities of the Soviet Union to deliver nuclear weapons. There was no evidence of any likely change in Soviet policy which would make war more imminent. On the other hand, there were no signs that the Soviet Union had any intention of moderating the cold war even though it involved the continual risk of world conflict. It was not thought that the Soviet Union would be deterred by fear of the outbreak of a general war from acting to counter any moves by the free world which it considered would pose an imminent threat to Soviet security. The Soviet Union would probably remain extremely reluctant to precipitate a contest in which it would expect to be subjected to nuclear attack. The Soviet Union might estimate, however, that its increasing strength in nuclear weapons would serve to balance out the advantage formerly held by the West and leave the Soviet Union in a commanding position because of its preponderance of ground forces. The Kremlin might be led to the belief that, because of the growth of Soviet nuclear strength, there would develop an increasing reluctance on the part of the United States and its allies to risk a general war.

42. The United Kingdom estimate of Soviet intentions was in substantial agreement with this United States estimate. Possibly the United Kingdom estimate laid greater emphasis on the prospect of a split between China and the Soviet Union. There was a tendency also in the United Kingdom estimate to place more faith on negotiation as a means to settle cold war problems.

43. Mr. Barbour suggested that Soviet tactics rather than Soviet policy might give us cause for concern. The appearance of flexibility and apparent reasonableness on the part of the Soviet Union created difficulties especially in its effect on neutralist nations. It had been discovered at Berlin, however, that when the chips were down the Soviet Union was not willing to move towards a real compromise. The Western Powers would have to continue to attempt to reveal, despite the appearance of surface reasonableness, that the Soviet Union remained committed to its long-stated policies. Mr. Heeney commented that there seemed to be no difference in the Canadian estimate of the situation.

44. The Chairman spoke briefly of the latest Soviet explosion of a nuclear weapon and said that although detailed consideration had not yet been given to the explosion by United States authorities a few preliminary observations occurred to him. The explosion had occurred at a place where there had been no previous experiments. It occurred when other top Communist brass were visiting the Soviet Union. It might, therefore, have been a demonstration to impress the visiting satellite representatives. There was some reason to suspect, in addition, that the weapon had been a guided missile with an atomic warhead. Mr. Bryce indicated that he had heard similar opinions expressed by experts in Canada.

45. In the absence of Admiral Radford from the meeting for a few moments, the Chairman mentioned two recent actions taken by the United States Government which might be of interest to the meeting, one concerning Trieste and the other flood relief in India. The prospects for a settlement of the Trieste question looked good. It was to assist in a solution of this problem that Mr. Murphy, the Deputy Under-Secretary, had made his recent visit to Europe. He had gone to Yugoslavia as the allied spokesman for a common plan. His visit to Bonn had been merely a covering operation. Mr. Murphy's discussions with Tito were in the nature of a final bid and he got a quick and favourable decision from Tito.

46. The Chairman indicated that the United States had a week ago made a formal offer of flood relief to India on a government-to-government basis with no strings attached. It was suggested by the Indian Ambassador that the offer might be made to the Red Cross which in turn would offer aid to India. The United States Government had refused to accept this camouflage on the grounds that the Indian Government should be able to accept an act inspired only by humanitarian motives. No reply had been received as yet from the Indian Government. The Indian Ambassador at the same time had given some mild indications of Indian interest in participating in a programme for the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

47. Admiral Radford then spoke of the United States estimate of the Soviet threat to North America. The one big change in the situation since the last meeting of consultation he said had been the appearance of the latest Soviet jet bombers at the Soviet air show last May Day. They seemed to indicate that the Soviet Union had given up on the development of turbo-jet planes and was concentrating on twin-engine and four-engine jets. Display of the latter suggested that the Soviet Union was progressing faster and further than the West's development of this type of aircraft. He, himself, had found it hard to believe the evidence of his experts that the Soviet Union could be so far ahead in the production of big jet aircraft. An exhaustive research was being conducted of the whole jet programme in the United States. While it was possible that the planes which were seen at the Soviet air show were not equipped with the big engines for which they were obviously built, their appearance was very disturbing indeed. If the rate of Soviet progress of the last two years was continued over the next three years it could have a serious impact on the extent of the Soviet threat to North America. Except in the field of jet aircraft, there was no great change in the estimated strength, disposition and intentions of the Soviet armed forces. General Foulkes said that Admiral Radford's estimate coincided with that held by the Canadian Chiefs of Staff. A discussion ensued between General Foulkes and Admiral Radford as to whether the Soviet T-31 aircraft may be used for refuelling jet aircraft while in flight. Admiral Radford went on to say that it was one of the most disturbing features of the situation that in spite of the fact that the new engines must have been developed over a three or four year period there had been no advance intelligence from anywhere in the free world on the new aircraft. The Chairman added some remarks in this context which were not for the record.

Continental Defence: Report on the Mid-Canada Line

48. General Foulkes distributed two maps to the meeting diagramming the early warning chains completed, under construction and proposed, in Canada, and went on to report on the progress on the mid-Canada line.

49. At the last meeting of consultation in March the progress in reconnaissance and planning on the early warning chain had been reported. The reconnaissance of the line had just been commenced and a joint System Engineering Group had been set up to agree on operational requirements and specifications for equipment and actual siting of the stations. At that time he had expressed the hope that the chain would be in operation by the end of 1956. In spite of increased difficulties of physical siting and of differences of technical views it was still the hope of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff that the line would be in operation by late 1956. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff had produced an estimate of costs on the line in July and the Canadian Government had decided to proceed with the chain as a Canadian project. The Canadian government had seen advantages in one authority for the line in that decisions could be arrived at more expeditiously. The work had been placed with one contractor. Sooner or later a decision had to be taken to stop development and get into production and it was thought that this decision could be taken easier if only one authority was involved. Some arbitrary decisions have had to be taken by the Canadian Chief but the chain will meet the operational requirements of both air forces.

50. The reconnaissance was now finished and detailed maps were being prepared. The engineering studies had been completed and the Canadian Chiefs of Staff had settled on the type of early warning network to be employed. Five plans for linking the line on the east and west coasts with the seaward extensions were now before the USAF. The material for construction of the stations would be stockpiled this winter by tractor train and actual construction would commence in the spring. A test section was being assembled for final trials of equipment. The siting of the line was such that as and when improvements were made, new equipment could be installed.

51. Four systems had been studied:

(a) The Mark I Doppler System of two lines with stations 35 miles apart and the lines two miles apart.

(b) The Mark II Doppler System in line with inverted stations giving the same results as two lines of stations. These were supplemented by identification radars at the gates of most heavy traffic.

(c) A composite line consisting of the Mark II Doppler System with radios every 120 miles, and finally,

(d) The Lincoln Composite System consisting of a single line of radios 100 miles apart with low cover provided by the Doppler System.

The Canadian Chiefs of Staff had decided on September 21 that the Mark II Doppler System would be used. It gave cover from 200 to 60,000 feet. It was less susceptible to false alarm from birds. It was cheaper to construct and operate and it could be operated with teletype communication. It would require the disciplining of civilian flying in peacetime which was felt to be essential in easing the strain of wartime identification.

52. General Foulkes indicated that the Canadian Chiefs of Staff had been somewhat concerned with the gap in early warning which existed between Labrador and Greenland. At present there would be only five to ten minutes early warning for the important United States bases in Newfoundland. Admiral Radford indicated that no firm answer could be given at the moment as to what was regarded as practical in this respect by the United States Chiefs of Staff but indicated that the matter was under intensive study.

Press Release on the Distant Early Warning Line

53. Agreement was reached on the wording of the proposed joint announcement by the two Governments with respect to the agreement in principle between them on the need for construction of the distant early warning line across the far northern part of North America. The Canadian draft statement with one change suggested by the United States Chiefs of Staff was accepted and it was agreed that the release should be made at noon on September 27.

Revised Weapons System

54. General Foulkes said that the Canadian Chiefs of Staff had been giving some thought to the problem of re-appraisal of continental defence in the light of the rather meagre information which had been made available to them regarding the effects of atomic fall-out. It had to be assumed that sooner or later the Russians would have accumulated as much information on fall-out as is available to our side. Mention of fall-out had already been made in Pravda and it had to be assumed that some day the Russians would realize the advantages of the discovery for them. This could have a very serious effect on the joint arrangements between Canada and the United States for the defence of North America. It might mean that the Russians would need fewer bombers to accomplish the same task of neutralization than they required earlier. The permissible error of weapon delivery was greatly increased and might therefore reduce the need for highly skilled bomb-aimers and for accurate blind-bombing radar equipment. These two factors together, that is, smaller requirements of bombs and aircraft and the reduction in requirements of skilled personnel and technicians, might bring the Soviet Union to believe that it had sufficient potential to conduct a crippling attack on the United States retaliatory capacity. This realization might advance the date on which the Soviet Union would be prepared to risk a third world war. Reduction in the permissible error of weapon delivery might affect the schedule of inter-continental weapons. Many of the problems of propulsion and guidance of inter-continental weapons would be simplified if the fall-out effect of atomic weapons was taken into consideration. If this theory was substantiated, it might be possible for the Russians to move ahead the development of inter-continental weapons now estimated for the period between 1960 and 1962 to perhaps 1959 to 1960. Western calculations on Russian achievements in the aeronautics and thermo-nuclear fields have been in error in the past and this might prove to be the case with respect to inter-continental weapons. These factors taken together have led the Canadian Chiefs of Staff to believe that a re-appraisal of joint plans for continental defence taking into consideration the effect of atomic fall-out was urgently required.

55. The problem of the speed of Soviet development of new weapons had serious implications for both Canada and the United States but particularly for Canada, especially if the present arrangements for development and production of its own air defence weapons was to be continued. Even the present situation gave some cause for alarm. In 1946 the Canadian Government had taken a decision to develop an all-weather fighter aircraft for continental defence. Its specifications were written to meet the threat of the TU-4. It took until 1954 to put this aircraft into Canadian fighter squadrons. By the end of 1954 a fairly reasonable defence could be provided, therefore, against the TU-4. However, the Russian introduction of the Type-37 and Type-39 aircraft, if the assessment of the experts regarding these aircraft was correct, made inadequate the CF-100 aircraft which was just being delivered to Canadian squadrons. It was thought to be as much as 5,000 feet short of the T-39's ceiling. Last year the Canadian Government took a decision to produce a successor to this aircraft and the specifications were drawn up before there was any knowledge of the T-37. It was not expected to be available for squadron use much before 1960. If the Russians, therefore, were able to produce sufficient T-37 aircraft to attack North America before 1960 there would be nothing capable of dealing with the threat. Furthermore, if inter-continental weapons such as the ballistic rocket were developed by 1960 even the new Canadian fighter aircraft could not deal with them.

56. General Foulkes said that he mentioned these difficulties to emphasize the need for more positive joint action in preparing to meet the new threat, in which in the opinion of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff there was no time for unilateral development of new weapons. There was some doubt, in addition, as to whether there was sufficient scientific technical ability in Canada to go ahead in these more advanced fields of air defence weapons. He said he was speaking now of sophisticated types of air-to-air and ground-to-air guided missiles with atomic warheads. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff considered that the stage was rapidly being reached where the development of a suitable weapons system for the defence of North America had to be a joint operation in almost every aspect. General Foulkes said he was well aware that the suggestion raised many technical, legal and political obstacles. On the other hand he believed that if the obstacles were not surmounted our joint survival might be in danger. General Foulkes made four suggestions as to how the problem might be attacked:

(a) There should be a joint study to define clearly the effects of fall-out. This would have to be a scientific study and would raise security difficulties under United States regulations.

(b) After the effect of fall-out had been defined clearly enough for the military to understand it there should be a study of the effect of fall-out on the plans for the defence of North America.

(c) When the effects of fall-out on joint plans for the defence of North America were considered the weapons system should be re-examined in the light of the considerations which had been arrived at in the first two studies, and,

(d) There should be a further study to find a joint approach to the implementation of the revised weapons system.

57. General Foulkes said that it would not be enough to meet the problem for the United States to assume the responsibility of developing the weapons system and then providing Canada with the weapons. An aircraft industry had been developed in Canada for defensive purposes which could not be abandoned. Purchase from the United States of the bulk of the weapons to be used by Canadian forces would soon cause serious financial problems for Canada. If the full support of the Canadian people was to be achieved the matter would have to be put to them as a joint effort. Finally if Canadian forces were to operate the new weapons then Canadian technicians and scientists should take part in their development and the Canadian defence industries should take some part in their production.

58. The Chairman said that his personal reaction to the suggestions made by General Foulkes was favourable. He thought that if the suggestions were raised formally with the United States Government it would be possible to remove any security barriers which exist. Admiral Radford agreed with the Chairman and suggested that the matter might be raised in the P.J.B.D.

59. General Foulkes and Mr. Heeney thought that the Chiefs of Staff channel might be a better channel to use to initiate the approach. After some discussion it was agreed that the matter should be raised with Admiral Radford in a letter from General Foulkes.

60. In the course of the discussion Mr. Bryce underlined the concern of the Canadian Government with the future of the Canadian aircraft industry. He said, in addition, that it had been extremely difficult to convince Ministers of the Canadian Government that there was no alternative to Canadian development of the supersonic aircraft.

60. The Chairman said that while he would not wish to minimize the difficulties of implementing the suggestions made by General Foulkes, he thought that something could be worked out. The problem of gaining Congressional sanction for United States co-operation with the United Kingdom on intelligence matters had seemed equally difficult at first but after some convincing Congress had decided to "interpose no objections" to the exchange of information.

62. Some brief attention was devoted to next steps so far as the distant early warning line was concerned. It was agreed on both sides that current progress on the planning of the line was completely satisfactory.

63. Mr. Léger said that, as the United States representatives knew, Canada had reluctantly accepted the invitation offered by the Geneva Conference powers to serve on the International Supervisory Commissions in Indo-China. Much of the time of the Commissions so far had been taken up with necessary administrative arrangements. The Canadian Government would, however, make every effort to keep United States authorities informed of any important developments of substance arising out of the work of the Commissions. He said that so far the Polish members had not caused any difficulties.

64. Admiral Radford informed the group that since the last meeting of consultation a unified command for continental defence had been established within the United States services. It was expected that this re-organization would assist in the speedier handling of matters connected with continental defence.

65. The meeting ended with expressions from both sides of the value of meetings such as this.

UNITED STATES AIR FORCE REQUEST TO CARRY OUT SURVEYS FOR AIR STRIPS ADJACENT TO PINETREE RADAR STATIONS IN LABRADOR

An important element of the Pinetree radar project which was approved by an Exchange of Notes between Canada and the United States on August 1, 1951, is the chain of radar stations extending from Frobisher Bay on Baffin Island, down the Coast of Labrador and Newfoundland to St. John's.⁶¹ When the Pinetree project was originally planned it was realized that due to ice conditions some means of supplementing the sea re-supply of the Labrador and Northern Newfoundland radar stations would have to be provided. (There is, of course, an air strip already in existence at Frobisher Bay on Baffin Island, and construction of an air strip at Resolution Island was authorized last May). It was hoped that it would be possible to use helicopters but this has not proved feasible. The Exchange of Notes of August 1, 1951, authorizing the Pinetree project, made provision for this situation in the following terms:

"5. Within the sites made available to the United States . . . , the United States . . . may do whatever is necessary or appropriate to the carrying out of its responsibility in Canada in connection with the construction, equipment and operation of the extension in accordance with this note, including:

(a) construction, installation and operation of the necessary structures, facilities and equipment, and such improvement of the sites as may be required to fit them for their intended use, PROVIDED that there shall be prior consultation with the appropriate Canadian authorities with respect to all major construction . . ."

2. The United States Embassy, in Note No. 18 dated July 20, 1954, (copy attached), has now requested permission for the United States Air Force to carry out surveys preliminary to the construction of air strips in connection with the radar stations at St. Anthony, Newfoundland (Station No. N-26) and at Cartwright and Hopedale, Labrador (No. N-27 and No. N-28). The air strips which the United States Air Force wishes to build will be made of gravel, approximately 2,500 feet long and 100 feet wide. They will be suitable only for the light aircraft used in the re-supply of the radar stations; i.e. Beaver and/or C-47 aircraft.

Recommendations

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence, recommends:

(a) that the Department of External Affairs be authorized to send to the United States Embassy the attached draft Note concurring in the United States request for authority to carry out surveys for proposed air strips at St. Anthony, Newfoundland, and Cartwright and Hopedale, Labrador; and

(b) that, when in due course a request is received from the United States Government for permission to construct the air strips, the Department of External Affairs be authorized, after consultation with the Department of National Defence, to approve the request in accordance with the provisions of the Exchange of Notes of August 1, 1951, and subject to the condition that the air strips should not be used by the United States Air Force for any purpose other than the re-supply of the radar stations without the express approval of the Canadian Government, and that they should be available for use by the Royal Canadian Air Force if required.⁶²

NOTE NO. 18

SECRET

The Ambassador of the United States of America presents his compliments to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and, with reference to the Aircraft Communications and Warning Stations at St. Anthony, Newfoundland (N-26), and at Cartwright and Hopedale, Labrador (N-27 and N-28), has the honor to recall that initial planning provided for helicopter pads in the vicinity of each of these stations in the expectation that support by helicopter would largely satisfy support requirements.

However, observations for the past several months have clearly indicated that while these sites are relatively near their support base, weather conditions and other factors combine to effectively isolate them. In this connection, the following considerations are pertinent:

Each site is manned by ten officers and 115 airmen. Approximately five tons of mail, electronic communication spare parts, perishable foodstuff, and personnel require airlift to each site each month. Exclusive of emergency evacuations, it is estimated that approximately ten personnel must be removed to and from each site each month.

⁶² Approuvé par le Cabinet le 8 septembre 1954./Approved by Cabinet, September 8, 1954.

Transportation by amphibious aircraft can be made in the open water areas during the summer months. However, this type of transportation becomes extremely hazardous and cannot be utilized during part of the year, especially during the early spring and early fall due to the free air temperature causing ice formation on the aircraft hull during landing and take off and while on the water.

The general limitations of helicopters preclude their use for the full time support of these facilities.

In view of the foregoing, the United States Air Force is considering the possibility of constructing airstrips at the three sites and has requested the Ambassador to seek the permission of the Canadian Government to conduct surveys to determine the feasibility of the project.

In support of its request, the United States Air Force has stated that it would welcome Canadian participation in the surveys; that, if the surveys indicate that the airstrips are feasible, it will request Canadian Government approval before undertaking any construction, and that the airstrips it has in mind would be of compacted gravel, measure approximately 2,500 feet by 100 feet, and be capable of handling L-20 and/or C-47 aircraft.

The Ambassador would be grateful if Mr. Pearson would submit this request to the appropriate Canadian authorities and inform him in due course of their decision.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs presents his compliments to the Chargé d'Affaires of the Embassy of the United States of America and has the honour to refer to the Embassy's Note No. 18 of July 20, 1954, requesting permission for the United States Air Force to conduct surveys to determine the feasibility of constructing airstrips at the Aircraft Communications and Warning Stations at St. Anthony, Newfoundland (N-26), and at Cartwright and Hopedale, Labrador (N-27 and N-28).

The Secretary of State for External Affairs is pleased to state that approval is granted for the conduct of the surveys described in the Embassy's Note.

It is noted that Canadian participation on the surveys would be welcomed. The Royal Canadian Air Force will provide an observer to accompany the survey parties. It is requested that the United States Air Force approach the Royal Canadian Air Force through service channels in order to settle the details of this Royal Canadian Air Force participation.

It is also noted that the approval of the Canadian Government will be sought before any construction is undertaken.

Note

No. D-293

The Secretary of State for External Affairs presents his compliments to His Excellency the Ambassador of the United States of America and has the honour to refer to the Notes which have been exchanged in the course of the last seven months concerning the proposed construction by the United States Air Force of air strips at the United States Air Force Aircraft Control and Warning Stations at Resolution Island, Hopedale, Cartwright and St. Anthony.

In reviewing the progress of the projects to construct the above-mentioned air strips, the Canadian authorities have noted that the Canadian Government has not expressly stated in the form of a diplomatic Note its approval of the construction and use by the United States Air Force of the air strips which were constructed some time ago at the Aircraft Control and Warning Stations at Saglek, Labrador (Newfoundland), and at Puntzi Mountain, British Columbia.

Accordingly, the Canadian Government is pleased to state that it approves of the construction and operation of the air strips at Saglek and Puntzi Mountain, subject to the provisions of the Exchange of Notes of August 1, 1951, between Canada and the United States of America, constituting an Agreement regarding the extension and co-ordination of the continental radar defence system, and in particular to the provision of paragraph 5 (a) of Note No. 454 of August 1, 1951, from the Canadian Ambassador in Washington to the Secretary of State of the United States. This paragraph requires that there shall be prior consultation with respect to all major construction and the installation of all major equipment. In the event of any further major construction being contemplated, such consultation might, if the United States Air Force so desires, be undertaken in the first instance through Service channels.

In addition, the approval of the Canadian Government is subject to the following conditions:

(a) The air strips are used, and will be used, by the United States Air Force solely for the support of the Aircraft Control and Warning Stations at those places.

(b) If the United States Air Force should desire at any time to use the air strips for other purposes, requests should be forwarded through appropriate channels.

(c) The air strips shall be available for use by the Royal Canadian Air Force, if required.

(d) The air strips shall also be available for use by Canadian civil air carriers operating into or through the area concerned, provided that this right will be exercised only after any proposal to use the air strips has been submitted through the Royal Canadian Air Force to the United States Air Force to ensure that it will not conflict with military requirements, and subject to the understanding that the United States Air Force will not be responsible for the provision of accommodation, fuel or servicing facilities of any kind. This condition is, however, without prejudice to arrangements which may already be in existence for the use of the air strips by Canadian civil air carriers.

(e) The United States Air Force will forward to the Royal Canadian Air Force through Service channels complete descriptions of the air strips, including their exact location, dimensions and orientation, the type of surface, the nature of the adjacent terrain and the location of obstructions in the vicinity (especially those in the approach areas to the strips).

The Canadian Government wishes to state further that the above conditions also apply to the use by the United States Air Force of the air strip at the Aircraft Control and Warning Station at Resolution Island, N.W.T., in addition to the conditions set forth in Note No. D-126 of May 19, 1954.

Résumé d'une réunion non officielle

Summary of Informal Meeting

Ottawa, June 8, 1954

CANADA-U.S. COMMUNICATIONS PROBLEMS

The following were present:

Department of External Affairs

M.H. Wershof, Acting Assistant Under-Secretary
B. Rogers, Head of Defence Liaison (1) Division
O.G. Stoner, Economic Division
K.C. Brown, Defence Liaison (1) Division

Department of Transport

G.C.W. Browne, Controller of Telecommunications
C.M. Brant, Superintendent of Radio Regulations
W.A. Caton, Chief Inspector of Radio
H.R. Newcombe, Asst. Chief, Frequency Allocation Section

Department of National Defence

G/C K.C. Cameron, Director of Telecommunications

Mr. Browne referred to the fact that the Departments of Transport, National Defence and External Affairs have been aware for several weeks of the desire of the United States Air Force to use temporarily a small parcel of land at St. John's-Cape Spear, Newfoundland, for the purpose of conducting communications tests, using the ionospheric scatter technique to broadcast to the Azores. He said he had agreed, in consultation with National Defence, that the meeting should be held because of the importance of a number of problems connected with the project. In particular, he was concerned lest the tests should be followed by the establishment of an operational military requirement and the expenditure of large sums of money on installations in which U.S. commercial interests (specifically AT & T) would have a major stake. If this were to happen, pressure could easily develop for the operation of the circuit for commercial purposes. The circuit, might feel it was morally obligated to permit its use commercially. Certainly Canadian commercial interests would suffer as they would not be able to duplicate installations already in operation.

G/C Cameron said that National Defence considers projects of this kind purely from the defence aspect, ignoring diplomatic, economic and other considerations. He thought it was important that some group or agency should be considering the broad picture.

He mentioned that Canadian National Telegraphs is now negotiating through the Canadian Government for the purchase from the U.S. Government of land lines and plant in Newfoundland. If microwave transmission were to become operational, CNT might lose the U.S. traffic on which it is counting. He said he understood that the Bell Telephone Company (New York) is proceeding with plans for microwave installations in Newfoundland and for the training of technicians to operate them.

Mr. Browne said there was evidence that the U.S. was disregarding certain stipulations concerning radio installations in Canada. For example, a 50 kw. transmitter had been installed at Goose Bay, where only 10 kw. were authorized.

Mr. Wershof emphasized:

(a) In authorizing new projects (experimental or otherwise), External can consider including any stipulations which DOT wants.

(b) External can always enquire about the progress of projects already authorized.

(c) If DOT wishes, External can always tell the U.S. Embassy we suspect that an experimental project is becoming operational without authority.

(d) If an operational requirement for defence purposes were established, External would recommend the necessary authorization, after consultation with interested departments. However, it could be made clear that such authorization in no way implied authorization of use for commercial purposes, either now or at any time in the future.

G/C Cameron said that there is no long-range frequency policy, looking forward to 1960 or 1965, with regard to U.S. operations in Canada in the radio field, and that such a policy is needed.

Mr. Brant said that his department was responsible for developing such a policy and that the question was constantly under review.

He then said that, with the repeal of the Emergency Powers Act, DOT is now required to list all U.S. radio installations in Canada. The U.S. Embassy should be asked for such a list and should be told that only installations which are on the list can be authorized to operate.

Mr. Stoner enquired whether now might be a good time to get agreement with the U.S. on the general principles which should govern the operation of U.S. radio facilities in Canada.

Views were exchanged as to whether or not the U.S. Government had a "master" plan for commercial communications development on a global scale.

Mr. Stoner suggested that one way in which we could check on the degree of long-range commercial interest in a project would be to insist on seeing the terms of the contracts which were awarded.

It was agreed that:

(1) Present U.S. operations in Canada, and future requests, in the communications field will receive closer scrutiny from now on.

(2) In particular, the proposed experimental project at St. John's-Cape Spear should be carefully examined.

(3) DOT should request External in writing to obtain from the U.S. Embassy the information which is required from the U.S. authorities in the radio field, as a result of the repeal of the Emergency Powers Act.

(4) Consideration should be given to the desirability of obtaining agreement within the Canadian Government on the general principles which should govern the operation of U.S. radio facilities in Canada.

(5) Consideration should be given to the desirability of working out a long-range government policy with regard to U.S. operations in Canada in the radio field, having regard to Canadian commercial interests.

It was further agreed that an informal working group should meet as required to consider questions related to U.S. operations in Canada in the radio field, and that the group should meet to consider the formal U.S. Note asking permission for the St. John's-Cape Spear project, when this was received.

It was suggested that action on (4) and (5) above might wait until the information required under (3) is obtained from the U.S. Embassy.

Mr. Wershof suggested that perhaps (5) should later be referred to the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions.

CONFIDENTIAL

COMMUNICATIONS POLICY
UNITED STATES DEFENCE ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Dear Sir:

I refer to the establishment in Canada by the United States of defence installations and to the "conditions" or "principles" which the Canadian Government has evolved with respect to these defence arrangements.⁶³

In the field of telecommunications installations it is becoming increasingly apparent that two additional "conditions" might be introduced and they are put forward for your consideration.

The first is the use of frequencies. Certain frequencies and powers can be used for defence purposes, and certain interference with civilian activities tolerated, if it is only for defence and for the duration of the threat. However, the use of a frequency for a given length of time carries with it a certain "squatter's right" implication; and unless we specifically protect against the contingency it might be very difficult to recover the use of frequencies for our own civilian or other uses in peacetime which have been exploited by the military over a period of time before. A specific example of this is the allocation recently of television frequencies to the USAF for their tropospheric scatter programme along the Labrador Coast. These have been allocated officially for trials. If the trials are successful, the USAF are faced with two courses of action: one to continue to operate the system on the existing frequencies with the equipment which they have; or to completely replace the equipment they have now in order to operate on other and more suitable military frequencies. They are not likely to indulge in the latter additional expense unless they are forced to, and therefore we must be prepared to force them if we wish to protect the frequencies which properly belong to the television field.

A parallel problem is the use of power. In the past, difficulties have arisen in this regard and adequate provision should be made to ensure against its abuse.

The second proposed "condition" is the one of operating agreements between the USAF and civilian agencies to operate or maintain communication facilities on their behalf in Canadian territory. Any approval which we give to an operating agreement by the USAF should clearly allow for it to be null and void as soon as the military requirement no longer exists. An example of this is the fact that the ⁶³ Voir comme exemples, /See, for example, Documents 494, 495 et/and 466.

Bell Telephone Company are installing the Tropospheric scatter system up the Labrador Coast and indications are that they will be required as a contractor to operate this for the USAF. If the Bell system has been operating this for a number of years for the United States Air Force, they might consider it their right, to continue to operate it for commercial purposes when the emergency is over. If our position is not safeguarded, we are in danger of having commercial interests, under the guise of contracting for the military, build themselves a facility having commercial application, and get into a monopoly position which may or may not be to the best interests of Canada in time of peace.

In view of the increasing USAF telecommunications facilities proposed for installation in Canada I feel that these "conditions" might be suitable material to consider in any future agreements on these matters.

Yours sincerely,
C.M. DRURY

Dear Mr. Drury,

MANNING OF COMMUNICATIONS STATIONS IN THE PINETREE RADAR CHAIN

Representatives of the Departments of National Defence, Transport and External Affairs have recently discussed informally a question which has arisen in connection with the manning of communications stations in the Pinetree radar chain. Among the people participating have been G/C S.R. Burbank of the Department of National Defence and Mr. C.M. Brant of the Department of Transport.

2. As I understand it, when the Pinetree radar chain was established the United States Air Force planned to provide it with a VHF (very high frequency) and UHF (ultra high frequency) radio relay communications system. At the same time, the USAF requested and was granted permission to establish circuits between Goose Bay, Gander, and St. John's employing the experimental communications technique known as "tropospheric scatter", which showed promise of providing the required communications more quickly and at less cost. From information recently received by the Department of National Defence, it appears that the experimental circuits have a good chance of being successful — presumably for this reason, construction work on the VHF and UHF system has been suspended — and the U.S. authorities are likely to apply fairly soon for permission for the experimental circuits to become operational.

3. I understand that the Commanding General of Northeast Air Command has already enquired from the RCAF in Ottawa what the policy of the Canadian Government will be, in the event that the tropospheric scatter circuits become operational, as regards the manning of the installation at Gander. It is expected that the station would require a staff of fifteen to twenty men, which NEAC clearly hopes will be exclusively U.S. military personnel.

4. On the initiative of Mr. Pearson the manning of the Early Warning (radar) station at Gander was considered in 1952, and as a result the RCAF took over the operation of the station. Attached is a copy of a memorandum† on the subject which was made available by the RCAF in the course of the informal discussions referred to above.

5. In the informal discussions the opinion was expressed that it would be most desirable for the Canadian Government to control the operation of at least one link in the communications system of the Pinetree radar chain. It was said that the Gander station would be the obvious one to take over, both because of the political desirability of not having U.S. personnel near Gander International Airport and because Gander would be a key link in the Pinetree system — it would probably be the junction point for the Newfoundland and mainland circuits, including the extension up the Labrador coast.

6. It was pointed out that Canada could take over the manning of the station under the Pinetree Agreement, and the opinion was expressed that, for the purpose of establishing Canadian control, manning of the station by Canadian personnel, either civilian or military, would be sufficient. It was argued that it was most important for the departments concerned to reach agreement on the policy to be pursued before the U.S. authorities apply for the circuits to become operational, since pressure will undoubtedly be applied for quick approval of the application, including manning of the Gander station by U.S. military personnel, as an urgent military requirement.

7. Accordingly, I have drawn this question to the attention of Mr. Pearson. He has asked me to inform you that he is of the opinion that, in the event it is decided that a military requirement exists for the establishment of operational communications circuits between Goose Bay, Gander and St. John's, it would seem desirable for the station at Gander to be manned by Canadian personnel. (I am sending this same letter to Mr. Baldwin in addition to yourself).

[Ottawa], February 5, 1954

SECRET

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT BY THE UNITED STATES AIR FORCE OF NINE ADDITIONAL TEMPORARY RADAR STATIONS IN CANADA

On February 10, 1953, Cabinet Defence Committee concurred in the granting of permission to the United States Government to make site surveys, to operate and to man nine additional temporary radar stations (three in British Columbia, five in Ontario and one in Nova Scotia), in general line with the conditions included in the Exchange of Notes for the Pinetree Project, it being understood, however, that the United States would meet all costs of installation, operation and manning until such time as the R.C.A.F. could take over the operation and manning. In the event that the R.C.A.F. did take over the operation and manning of the stations, the United States Government would continue to meet all costs of operation, other than for Canadian service personnel.

2. Although Cabinet Defence Committee authorized not only the making of the surveys, but also the construction and operation of the stations, the United States Government was at that time notified only of the permission to make the survey since that was all that had been requested. During the past year, while the surveys were being carried out, the Department of External Affairs has been consulting informally with the State Department on the terms and conditions which would govern Canadian permission to construct and operate the stations when the United States Government is ready to go ahead with this.

3. The Exchange of Notes for the Pinetree Project deals with the problem of tenure by stating:

“neither Government will discontinue the operation of any station or any part of the extension without prior concurrence of the other Government”.

This means, in theory at least, that so long as the United States Government considers any stations in the Pinetree system are necessary, that they must be kept in operation, regardless of the views of the Canadian Government.

4. In the draft Statement of Conditions which has been under discussion with the State Department, tenure was dealt with in the following terms:

"All or any of the stations shall be maintained in operation for so long as both Governments agree that their continuation is in the mutual defence interest of both countries. In the event that either Government concludes that any or all of the stations are no longer required, the question of continuing need will be referred to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. In considering the question of need, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence will take into account the relationship of the station or stations to other radar installations established in the mutual defence interest of the two countries. Following consideration by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, as provided above, either Government may terminate the arrangement in which case the station will be closed and the following arrangement regarding ownership and disposition of the installation will apply . . .".

This paragraph, of course, would give the United States Government no assurance of tenure at all. It was hoped, however, that the inclusion of the provision that the matter would be referred to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence would satisfy the United States Government that they would not arbitrarily be dispossessed.

5. At the last meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence the State Department Member of the Board said that the operation of the proposed stations would add to the defences of the North American continent, and it was therefore in the mutual defence interest of both countries. The language of the draft statement, however, did not seem to follow this premise in as much as in his view there was in the language an apparent lack of mutuality. He said that while the United States Government did not wish to cause political difficulties to Canada, it was faced with legal requirements which were in fact political difficulties on the United States side. The Executive Branch of the United States Government have an obligation to ensure that appropriated funds were spent with adequate safeguards. While there was no indication and no thought on the United States side of any lack of faith, he felt that the language of the proposed paragraph did not meet the needs of the United States Government since it would appear that it would be possible for the United States Government to be denied the data from an installation while it was still considered to be important to the defence of the United States, even before the construction of the installation had been completed. For this reason he proposed an alternative wording as follows:

"The Canadian and United States Governments agree that all or any of the stations shall be maintained in operation for a period of ten years or such shorter period as shall be agreed by both countries in the light of their mutual defence interests. Thereafter, in the event that either Government concludes that any or all of the stations are no longer required, the question of continuing need will be referred to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. In considering the question of need, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence will take into account the relationship of the station or stations to other radar installations established in the mutual defence interest of the two countries. Following consideration by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, as provided above, either Government may terminate the arrangement, in which case the station will be closed, and the following arrangements regarding ownership and disposition of the installations will apply . . .".

The State Department Member expressed the view that the amendment he proposed would not impair the sovereignty of Canada because the ownership of the land would remain with the Canadian Government, and Canada would have the unrestricted right to take over the manning and operation of the stations at any time.

6. It may be that the proposal made by the State Department Member of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence represents a reasonable compromise between the United States and Canadian positions on this matter. It should be recognized, however, that if the Canadian Government agrees to it in this case, it will almost certainly become a precedent in future cases of a similar nature. For this reason the matter is being referred to Cabinet for consideration.⁶⁴

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF TEMPORARY RADAR STATIONS IN CANADA

At the last meeting of PJBD, the State Department and External Affairs Members reached agreement on the text of a draft statement of conditions (copy attached) which it was believed would be acceptable to the authorities of both countries. It was intended that as soon as the agreed draft had been concurred in by the United States officials concerned and the United States Air Force had reached a decision as to the number and locations of the stations required, a formal diplomatic request would be put forward by the United States Government to the Canadian Government for permission to construct and operate the stations.

The External Affairs Member undertook to refer the draft agreement to the appropriate Canadian officials at once and as soon as the agreement of all concerned at official level had been obtained, the United States Embassy in Ottawa would be notified of this fact informally. When the formal United States request was received the matter would be referred to the Canadian Government for final approval.

There were two sections in the draft agreement which required particular consideration by the appropriate Canadian authorities. The first related to the requirement that electronic equipment be manufactured in Canada when practicable. The Department of Defence Production has concurred in the text of the agreed draft of this section. The second of these two sections dealt with the problem of the cost of modifying the communications arrangements for the existing Pinetree network in order to link in the new temporary stations. The RCAF was not satisfied with the proposed wording of this section and has put forward an alternative wording which has been referred to the U.S. Section of the PJBD for consideration. The text of the RCAF proposal is included in the attached draft of the agreement.

Projet de déclaration des conditions

Draft Statement of Conditions

SECRET

[Ottawa], June 29, 1954

DRAFT CONDITIONS TO GOVERN THE ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION
BY THE UNITED STATES AIR FORCE OF TEMPORARY RADAR STATIONS
IN CANADIAN TERRITORY

(In this Statement of Conditions, unless the context otherwise requires, "Canada" means the Government of Canada, and "United States" means the Government of the United States of America.)

1. Sites

Canada will acquire and retain title to all lands required for the radar stations and their ancillary facilities. The Canadian Government grants and assures to the United States Government, without charge, such rights of access, use and occupancy as may be required for the construction, equipment and operation of the stations, pursuant to the provisions in the following paragraphs.

2. Plans

The detailed plans of the buildings, roads (including access roads), use of local materials (rock fill, sand, gravel, etc.), and other arrangements related to construction and major items of equipment will require the approval of the appropriate Canadian authorities (to be designated by the Canadian Government) in advance of construction. Canadian officials shall have the right of inspection during construction. Any plans for subsequent construction shall also be submitted for the approval of the appropriate Canadian officials.

3. Construction

(a) Canadian contractors will be extended equal consideration with United States contractors in the awarding of construction contracts, and Canadian and United States contractors shall have equal consideration in the procurement of materials, equipment and supplies in either Canada or the United States.

(b) Any contractors awarded a contract for construction in Canada will be required to give preference to qualified Canadian labour for such construction. The rates of pay and working conditions for this labour will be set after consultation with the Canadian Federal Department of Labour and will be set in accordance with the Canadian Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act of 1935.

(c) Canadian law will apply.

4. Provision of Electronic Equipment

The Canadian Government reaffirms the principle that electronic equipment at radar installations on Canadian territory should, so far as practicable, be manufactured in Canada. The question of practicability must, in each case, be a matter for consultation between the two Governments. After studying the plans for the establishment of the radar stations covered in this agreement the agencies of the Canadian Government concerned are satisfied that the initial provision of Canadian electronic equipment for these stations is not practicable. However, the Canadian Government requires that the above-stated principle shall apply in the future to the procurement of replacement or additional electronic equipment. The appropriate Canadian and United States agencies shall in these circumstances consult with each other to determine the application of the principle. In considering the question of practicability, one of the factors to be taken into account shall be the relative costs of procurement from Canadian and United States sources.

5. Financing (As drafted at April, 1954, Meeting of PJBD)

The cost of construction and operation of these stations shall be the responsibility of the United States Government, with the exception of military personnel costs, if Canada should man any of these stations at a later date. In the event that the erection of these stations requires changes in the present communications arrangements for Radar Extension Plan covered in the Exchange of Notes of August 1, 1951, it will be necessary for appropriate authorities of the two Governments to work out agreed technical arrangements whereby the Canadian Government will be assured against bearing any resulting expense exceeding those contemplated by existing arrangements.

5. Financing (as subsequently proposed by RCAF)

The cost of construction and operation of these stations shall be the responsibility of the United States Government, with the exception of military personnel costs if Canada should man any of these stations at a later date. In the event that the erection of these stations requires changes in communication arrangements for the Radar Extension Plan covered in the Exchange of Notes of 1 August 1951, and as detailed in the Schedule of Primary Communications for the Radar Extension Plan agreed Washington DC 15 March 1952, as subsequently amended, it will be necessary for appropriate authorities of the two governments to work out agreed technical arrangements whereby the Canadian Government will be assured against bearing any resulting expenses exceeding those contemplated by scheduled communications, or which might arise from their rearrangement or cancellation.

6. Manning

The United States may station personnel at the sites under the control and command of United States military authorities, PROVIDED that upon provision of reasonable notice Canada may take over the manning of any or all of the installations.

7. Period of Operation of the Stations

The Canadian and United States Governments agree that all or any of the stations shall be maintained in operation for a period of ten years or such shorter period as shall be agreed by both countries in the light of their mutual defence interests. Thereafter, in the event that either Government concludes that any or all of the stations are no longer required, the question of continuing need will be referred to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. In considering the question of need, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence will take into account the relationship of the station or stations to other radar installations established in the mutual defence interest of the two countries. Following consideration by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, as provided above, either Government may terminate the arrangement in which case the station will be closed and the following arrangement regarding ownership and disposition of the installations will apply.

8. Ownership of Removable Property

Ownership of all removable property brought into Canada or purchased in Canada and placed on the sites, including readily demountable structures, shall remain in the United States. The United States shall have the unrestricted right of removing or disposing of all such property, PROVIDED that the removal or disposition shall not impair the operation of any station whose discontinuance had not been determined in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 7 above, and PROVIDED further that removal or disposition takes place within a reasonable time after the date on which the operation of the station has been discontinued.

9. Radio Installations

Arrangements respecting such technical matters as radio frequencies, types of emission, and power, also the location of antenna masts and the question of their marking and lighting will be co-ordinated with the Department of Transport through the Royal Canadian Air Force and will be subject to the approval of the Department of Transport.

10. Supplementary Arrangements and Administrative Agreements

Supplementary arrangements or administrative agreements between authorized agencies of the two Governments may be made from time to time for the purpose of carrying out the intent of this agreement.

11. Taxes

The Canadian Government will seek to obtain for the United States Government the same taxation exemptions as have operated in the Pinetree project.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF TEMPORARY RADAR STATIONS IN CANADA

At the last meeting of the PJBD [July 12-15, 1954] the United States Air Member suggested that discussion by the PJBD with respect to the proposed establishment of temporary radar stations in Canada should be deferred until the conclusion of studies being carried out by the United States and Canadian Air Defence Commands. The External Affairs member referred to the draft agreement which had been prepared in consultation between officials of the two countries in anticipation that the United States Government would submit a formal request to the Canadian Government to construct these temporary stations. It was pointed out that there were two sections in the draft agreement still under discussion. The first related to the requirement that electronic equipment be manufactured in Canada when practicable. The proposed text of this section had been concurred in by the Department of Defence Production. The second of these two sections dealt with the problem of the cost of modifying the communications arrangements for the existing Pinetree network in order to link in the new temporary stations. The RCAF had drafted a proposed text for this section which had been given to the United States Authorities. No word has yet been received as to whether this proposed text is agreeable to the United States Government.

The External Affairs member also pointed out that the draft agreement, and in particular the section relating to the provision of electronic equipment, had been drafted over a year ago in the light of circumstances existing at that time. He reiterated that the proposed agreement was only a draft which had not been submitted to or approved by the Canadian Government. The Canadian authorities reserved in particular the right to reconsider Article 4 regarding the provision of electronic equipment.

6. (SECRET) Proposed establishment of Temporary Radar Stations in Canada

With reference to Section 6 of the Board's Journal for its meeting of October, 1954, the U.S. Air Force Member recalled that, in accordance with approval granted to the United States Government by the Canadian Government in April, 1953, site surveys had been carried out for nine proposed temporary radar stations in Canada. As a consequence of subsequent study by the two Air Defence Commands, it had been determined that only four augmentation radar stations were now required instead of the nine temporary stations originally planned. The U.S. Air Force now wished to proceed with the construction of these stations, basic information on which was as follows:

	M-102	M-119	M-120	SM-153
Location	Barrington Nova Scotia	Oba, Ontario	Marathon Ontario	Kamloops B.C.
Acreage	13.5	40	44	15
Function	Direction Center	Direction Center	Direction Center	Direction Center
Primary Search Radar	AN/FPS-3A (Arctic)	AN/MPS-7 (Arctic)	AN/MPS-11 (Arctic)	AN/FPS-3A (Arctic)
Primary Height Radar	AN/FPS-6 (Arctic)	AN/MPS-14 (Arctic)	AN/MPS-4 (Arctic)	AN/FPS-6 (Arctic)
Backup Search Radar	AN/TPS-1D (Arctic)	AN/MPS-11 (Arctic)	AN/TPS-1D (Arctic)	AN/FPS-8 (Arctic)
Backup Height Radar	AN/TPS-10D (Arctic)	AN/MPS-8 (Arctic)	AN/TPS-10D (Arctic)	AN/TPS-10D (Arctic)
Personnel	21 Officers 177 Airmen	17 Officers 167 Airmen	15 Officers 154 Airmen	21 Officers 185 Airmen

It was pointed out that when the project had first been proposed it had been intended that only one of these stations, i.e. Oba, Ontario, (Fire River), was to have had a ground control intercept capability. After careful study by the two Air Defence Commands it was now considered necessary that all four stations should have this capability. As a consequence the number of personnel involved at the other three stations was somewhat higher than had originally been forecast. Originally these stations had been referred to as temporary because the radar equipment which was to have been installed was transportable. However, with the added control capability, the word "temporary" was a misnomer, and in the future they should be referred to as augmentation radar stations. The U.S. Air Force appreciated that the Canadian Government would wish to consider proposals of this kind in relation to an overall plan for aircraft control and warning facilities. The U.S.

Air Force Member suggested however that this particular requirement for augmentation of the Pine Tree System was not directly related to the need for low-level gap-filler radars and in the light of the fact that it was a long-standing requirement, he proposed that it be considered separately from other future requirements.

The Canadian Chairman expressed appreciation for the information which had been furnished by the U.S. Air Force Member. He said that in his opinion it was important that the members of the P.J.B.D. should be kept currently informed of the thinking of the air forces as to possible future air defence requirements and organization since in due course the Board would have to make recommendations on the inter-governmental arrangements which would be necessary to implement approved plans.

He then said that it was the opinion of the Canadian Section that the most expeditious way of dealing with the proposal to construct the four augmentation radar stations would be for the Canadian Air Force Member on his return to Ottawa to have it referred to the Chiefs of Staff Committee for consideration of the military operating requirement. When the conclusion of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff on the matter had been reached, the Canadian Air Force Member would inform the U.S. Air Force Member. The State Department might then wish to submit a Note to the Department of External Affairs.

The Canadian Chairman added that he anticipated that the conditions under which the Canadian Government might approve the project would be very similar to the conditions for the distant early warning system.⁶⁵ The question of the practicability of the provision of the electronic equipment from Canadian sources would have to be the subject of consultation between officials of the two Governments. In addition, because of the location of the stations, the Canadian Government would wish to reserve its right to take over the manning of any or all of the stations at any time.

The U.S. Chairman expressed his confidence that the procedure proposed by the Canadian Chairman would lead to a satisfactory conclusion of the matter at an early date.

MOVEMENT OF SERVICE AIRCRAFT ACROSS THE CANADA-UNITED STATES
BORDER: STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND TRAINING FLIGHTS

1. At the 81st meeting of the Cabinet Defence Committee 12 December 1951 the Committee approved PJBD Recommendation 51/5 regarding movement of Service aircraft across the Canada-United States border and a document based on this recommendation setting out the detailed methods of clearing flights of Service aircraft across the border.⁶⁶ This document, which was subsequently included in the PJBD Journal of March 1952, is attached as Appendix "A" to this paper. PJBD Recommendation 51/5 was given statutory effect by PC 2307 dated 17 April 1952.

2. The USAF has found that two provisions in the procedure (Appendix "A") for clearing their training flights over Canadian territory are causing difficulty. The first, sub para (j), requires that no bombs be carried in aircraft conducting camera bombing and radar scope photography over Canadian cities. This restriction limits the value of the Radar Bomb Scoring Unit at St. Hubert, P.Q., which consists of a small radar over which Strategic Air Command aircraft carry out simulated bombing missions. This unit, along with approximately fifteen others of a similar nature located at various points in the USA, makes an important contribution towards maintaining the high standard of efficiency required of Strategic Air Command.

3. The aircraft are actually over the site only a few minutes since this is only one of several exercises during a training mission which might require the same aircraft to be airborne for 20 hours and travel several thousand miles, the flight often extending over several different countries. Because of the restriction in sub para (j) the US aircraft scheduled to use the St. Hubert site must always drop their bombs at an approved bombing range first. If the weather conditions are such that the bombs cannot be dropped, the aircraft has no other choice but to land and unload its bombs before using the St. Hubert site. These conditions obtain on about three out of four Strategic Air Command missions. Thus the aircraft have to descend from high altitudes to unload their bombs and then return to operational altitude, with the result that the use of the St. Hubert site becomes an expensive and at such times, an inefficient operation.

4. The active use of the Radar Bomb Scoring Site at St. Hubert by the U.S. Strategic Air Command is of inestimable value to the RCAF in that it provides increased bomber aircraft training activity over the main Canadian air defence area. This enables the entire air defence system in the area to be exercised under realistic conditions in that it provides practice interceptions for RCAF Fighter Squadrons and the ground controlling organization. Also, as the RCAF has no bomber force, the affiliation of these aircraft with the RCAF provides one means of keeping in touch with modern bomber techniques.

5. The second restriction, contained in sub para (k) of Appendix "A", prevents USAF aircraft from carrying, over Canada, photoflash bombs which are required for photographic reconnaissance training over isolated, uninhabited areas. Thus the USAF aircraft on long range training flights, during which these bombs are required, must circumnavigate Canadian territory. Since the aircraft are therefore often prevented from flying the most direct route to their destinations this provision has also proven uneconomical and inefficient. These photoflash bombs will not be dropped by the USAF over Canada.

6. Specialist officers of the RCAF have examined the safety procedures followed by the USAF and are satisfied that they provide adequate safeguard against possible accidents. Accordingly, the RCAF and USAF have prepared jointly a document to replace the one attached as Appendix "A" to this paper. This revision of methods of clearing training flights of USAF Strategic Air Command over Canadian territory, in addition to meeting the points referred to above, also contains a number of minor amendments which, without changing the substance, improve the form of the document.

7. The new document was discussed and approved at the July 1954 meeting of the PJBD. A copy of the new document is attached as Appendix "B" to this paper.⁶⁷

ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION OF A JOINT RCN-USN SOUND SEARCH STATION AT SHELburne, N.S.

As you know, a proposal by the United States Navy for the establishment and operation of a joint Royal Canadian Navy-United States Navy Sound Search Station at Shelburne, N.S., has been the subject of discussion between the two navies and in the Permanent Joint Board on Defence for some time. At the April 1954 meeting of the PJBD, the proposal was considered in some detail. The attached draft memorandum to Cabinet has been prepared as a consequence of these discussions. In view of the urgency of the matter, it is proposed, if you concur, to submit it to Cabinet in your name for consideration at the meeting of April 29.

2. In view of the importance of the proposal and because of the questions of policy which arise from it, General McNaughton proposes to discuss the matter with you and with some of the other interested Ministers, including Mr. Howe, Mr. Gregg, and Mr. Winters.

3. The attached draft has been circulated to the Deputy Ministers of National Defence, Defence Production, Labour, Transport (Air), and National Revenue (Customs and Excise), and to the Secretary to the Cabinet. I understand that you will not be in town next week. I thought, however, that if you concur in the proposal, you might arrange to have Mr. Campney speak to the proposal on your behalf in Cabinet. If the Deputy Ministers of the Departments concerned propose any changes in the detail of the draft memorandum, this Department could consult with Mr. Campney prior to having the memorandum prepared for circulation to the Cabinet next week.

4. I should be grateful to know whether you approve of the memorandum and concur in the proposal I have suggested.

PROPOSED U.S. NAVY EXPERIMENTAL SOUND SEARCH STATION
SHELBURNE, NOVA SCOTIA

1. At the April, 1953, meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, the United States Navy Member reported on a new and promising system for the long-range detection of submarines. The first segment of this sound search system had been tested in the Caribbean area and it was now proposed to extend the experiment to include the range of waters to be found along the Atlantic Coast as far north as Nova Scotia. The system involved the laying of cables with arrays of sonic detectors in deep waters some distance off the coast. These would be connected to a series of nine "sound search stations" situated at intervals on the shore from the Caribbean to Nova Scotia. A logical situation for the northernmost of these experimental stations was Sable Island, Nova Scotia. It was hoped that if the project was approved, it would be possible to construct this station in the summer of 1954. If the experiment proved successful it would no doubt be desirable to extend it at a later date to cover the entrance to the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

2. Approval of Cabinet Defence Committee for the Royal Canadian Navy and the U.S. Navy to carry out a joint survey of Sable Island was granted on May 18, 1953, and the U.S. Embassy was notified of this on May 19, 1953. When a preliminary reconnaissance disclosed that the waters off Cape Sable were too rough to land the experimental cable, the Minister of National Defence authorized extension of the survey to include the south shore of Nova Scotia. It was finally decided that the most suitable site was on land belonging to the Department of National Defence, at Government Point, Shelburne, N.S.

3. At the April 1954, meeting of the PJBD, the U.S. Navy Member of the Board reviewed the status of the project and reported that exploratory discussions between the U.S. Navy and the Royal Canadian Navy had been completed, and that the U.S. Section of the Board now wished to present a proposal involving the installation and operation of the station jointly by the U.S. Navy and Royal Canadian Navy.

4. After studying the proposal the Board came to the following conclusions:

(a) In the light of the importance and urgency attached to this project for the defence of North America against attack from hostile submarines, every effort should be made to expedite its progress.

(b) The early construction of the Shelburne station was of great importance since it was the only station embracing the following features: cold water, the warm water of the Gulf Stream, deep water, and the shallow water off the south-eastern coast of Nova Scotia.

(c) The U.S. Navy hoped to begin assembling materials in May, 1954, in order to begin construction of the Shelburne station in July, 1954. This meant that it would be necessary to have the approval of the Canadian Government by May 15, if the work was to be done in 1954. Since construction of all the stations, both in the United States and Canada, had been carefully phased, failure to construct the Canadian station in the summer of 1954, would adversely affect the construction and cable-laying programme for all nine stations.

5. In view of the urgency of the project, the representatives of the State Department and the Department of External Affairs agreed upon the text of a draft statement of conditions to govern the establishment and operation of the Shelburne station (copy attached as Appendix "A"),[†] which could be presented to the appropriate authorities of the two Governments for approval. The Board noted that if it did not prove possible to go forward with the proposed construction in 1954, either Government might wish to suggest certain changes in the draft agreement.

6. In general the proposed conditions are the same as those which have governed other recent joint defence projects in Canada.⁶⁹ The principal exception is Section 3, dealing with construction, which provides that the United States will be permitted to carry out the construction in 1954 with United States Naval Military Construction battalions, using standard prefabricated advanced base component material provided from U.S. Government stocks. The permission to use construction battalions would be limited to 1954 and would not be regarded as a precedent either for subsequent construction at Shelburne or for any other installation which the United States might wish to erect in Canada.

See, for example, the conditions outlined in the attachment to Document 483.

7. The Canadian Section of the PJBD pointed out to the U.S. Section the difficulties raised by the proposal to use construction battalions, and agreed to put it forward to the Canadian Government only after a detailed examination of all possible alternatives made it clear that only in this way would it be possible to complete the construction programme during the summer of 1954.

8. The construction work at Shelburne would consist of the erection of temporary accommodation ("Quonset huts") for an operating staff of 97 and a transient staff (during the period of installation and evaluation) of 46. The technical equipment would also be housed in a Quonset hut. The time required for construction is estimated to be about two months — i.e. from mid-July to mid-September.

9. A memorandum prepared by the Royal Canadian Navy giving further technical details of the United States Navy requirement is attached as Appendix "B".†

Recommendation

10. I recommend that the Department of External Affairs be authorized to enter into an Exchange of Notes with the United States Department of State, to permit the establishment and operation jointly by the Royal Canadian Navy and the United States Navy of an experimental sound search station, in accordance with the conditions set forth in Appendix "A" to this memorandum.

JOINT RCN-USN EXPERIMENTAL STATION AT SHELburne, N.S.

The U.S. Embassy has sent us a Note on this subject, No. 99, dated November 29, 1954, the text of which is as follows:

"The Ambassador of the United States of America presents his compliments to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and has the honour to refer to the agreement for the establishment and operation of a Joint Royal Canadian Navy-United States Navy Experimental Station at Government Point, Shelburne, Nova Scotia, effected by the Exchange of Notes of May 1 and May 10, 1954.

"The Ambassador recalls that paragraph 3(b) of the Annex to the first of these Notes provides that the permission to use United States Navy construction battalions is limited to the year 1954. He also recalls that, at the meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence last October, it was noted that (because of unanticipated delays occasioned by severe weather conditions, difficult terrain, and certain design modifications requested by the Royal Canadian Navy) it had been found that the construction of the Experimental Station could not be completed until around April 1, 1955. Furthermore, in accordance with Canadian Navy recommendations, it was agreed that the paving of roads on the site should be postponed until the summer of 1955.

"As a result of the foregoing and because budgetary considerations preclude construction by other means, the services of a forty-man construction battalion detachment would be highly desirable both for completion of the Station's construction phase and for road surfacing from May 1 to September 15, 1955.

"The Ambassador hopes that, in view of the considerations outlined, the Canadian Government will find it possible to agree to permit the use of United States Naval Construction Battalions at Shelburne during the desired period in 1955."

Paragraph 2 of the Note refers to the discussion of the matter at the last meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, held on October 18-19, 1954. Enclosed is a copy of the record in the Journal of the discussion at the meeting.† The attitude adopted by General McNaughton at the meeting was that, under the circumstances as described by the U.S. Navy Member of the Board, the desire of the U.S. Navy to employ U.S. Naval Construction Battalions at Shelburne from May 1 to September 15, 1955, appeared to be reasonable.

While in principle I am not happy at the thought of extending the period during which USN Construction Battalions may be used when we were so definite in limiting their use to the year 1954, it seems to be that under the circumstances the request is a reasonable one. I have accordingly written to the Deputy Ministers of the interested departments, i.e. National Defence, Labour and Defence Production, to say that and to ask for the views of their departments on the Embassy's request, including the views of their Ministers if it is considered that they should be consulted.

I have also informed Mr. Winters who is interested as the Cabinet Minister from Nova Scotia. A copy of the letter which was sent to him on December 6 is attached for your information.†

I should be grateful to know if you agree that the Embassy's request is a reasonable one and that, assuming there is no objection from the interested departments, the request might be granted.⁷⁰

Cabinet approved the original request for the establishment and operation of the Experimental Station at its meeting on April 22, 1954. As you were not present, the item was sponsored by Mr. Claxton, acting on your behalf. Do you agree that it will

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF A LORAN STATION BY THE UNITED STATES COAST GUARD AT CAPE CHRISTIAN, BAFFIN ISLAND

On April 16, 1953, the United States requested permission of Canada to build a Loran station at Cape Christian, a point on the northeast coast of Baffin Island approximately nine miles from the settlement at River Clyde. The request was motivated by the need for further Long-Range Aid to Navigation facilities for the use of ships and aircraft operating out of Thule in Greenland. These facilities would also of course be available to Canadian ships and aircraft. Because the building season at Cape Christian is only approximately six weeks long, the United States wished to do preliminary work on the site during the summer of 1953 in order to undertake the construction of the station in the summer of 1954.

2. The Cabinet Defence Committee at its 94th Meeting, on May 15, 1953, agreed "that the Department of External Affairs should inform the United States that the Canadian Government approved the preliminary construction work on the Loran station at Cape Christian on the understanding that the detailed terms and conditions would be negotiated at a later date." This was done on May 21, 1953, and preliminary construction work was carried out last summer.

3. At a meeting in Ottawa on March 9, 1954, officials of interested departments and the two governments discussed possible terms and conditions under which the Canadian Government might be prepared to authorize the erection and operation of the proposed Loran station. On the basis of this discussion and subsequent correspondence with the members of the Advisory Committee on Northern Development, the Department of External Affairs prepared a draft of terms and conditions. These have been incorporated in the annex to a draft note to the United States Embassy† which is attached to this memorandum. It will be noted that the conditions with regard to the right of Canada to assume operation, Paragraph 5(a), and the period of operation of the station, Paragraph 5(b), are in conformity with the tenure formula approved by Cabinet on February 25, 1954, in connection with the proposed establishment by the U.S. Air Force of additional radar stations in Canada. The United States is prepared to accept the draft terms and conditions including that contained in Paragraph 5(a) concerning the sharing of costs should Canada assume the operating of the station, it being understood that the arrangement is subject to the usual qualification with respect to the availability of appropriated funds.

4. The Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs and Minister of National Defence recommends that he be authorized to send to the United States Ambassador a note in terms of the attached draft.⁷³

SECURITY CONTROL OF FOREIGN SHIPS IN THE GREAT LAKES

The Great Lakes Seamen's Security Regulations which were made by Order in Council P.C. 2306 of May 22nd, 1952, under the authority of the Emergency Powers Act apply only to Canadian ships and not to foreign ships that ply the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence route.

As a result of representations that had been made from time to time, the Security Sub-Panel considered in the summer of 1953 whether some form of security control should be exercised over the masters and crews of foreign ships sailing into the Great Lakes. A simple scheme was devised which would provide a limited degree of security control and, at the same time, provide a suitable answer to possible criticisms that the government had imposed fairly severe security measures on Canadian seamen in the Great Lakes but had done nothing to provide similar controls in respect of foreign shipping.

In brief, the scheme suggested by the Security Sub-Panel last year would involve the following main steps. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration, which now receives one copy of crew manifests of foreign ships sailing into Canadian ports, would in future require two copies of such manifests to be submitted to the Department. The second copy would be forwarded to the R.C.M. Police for an appropriate check. The ship would be allowed to proceed on its journey but if the police check subsequently revealed the presence of subversive elements amongst any of the crews, the agents of the ships concerned would be informed that the crew members in question would not in future be permitted to enter Canada. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration would also make an Order under section 15 of the Immigration Act authorizing the detention of any seaman so named if he should re-appear at a Canadian port.

The procedure described above can be adopted with a minimum of administrative inconvenience under the authority of the Immigration Act, section 7 of which empowers the Minister to make a deportation Order, with no right of appeal, against persons who have communist associations, or who are likely to engage in or advocate subversion, or who are likely to engage in espionage, sabotage or any activity detrimental to the security of Canada.

The scheme set out above was approved by the Security Sub-Panel in June 1953 but was not put forward for Cabinet consideration because it was hoped that it would be possible to do away with the Great Lakes Seamen's Security Regulations if the government decided, as it now has, to allow the Emergency Powers Act to lapse on May 31st next. After lengthy discussions with U.S. authorities, however, it is now apparent that if the security regulations were allowed to lapse, the United States might well enforce inconvenient security measures which would result in expensive delays of Canadian ships in U.S. ports.

The Minister of Transport has consequently submitted for consideration an amendment to the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the purpose of which is to empower the Governor in Council to continue the security regulations in force for a further period of three years. Should this measure be approved for introduction, it is recommended that approval in principle be given to the recommendations set out above with regard to security control of foreign shipping in the Great Lakes and that the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the R.C.M. Police be instructed to implement these recommendations immediately.

It is further suggested that no special announcement be made concerning the new arrangement unless and until questions are raised in the House or elsewhere.⁷⁴

PUBLIC INFORMATION ON THE NORTH

Object

The first object of public information on the north is to emphasize that the northern regions are as much a part of Canada as any other area in the country.

It is most important that all Canadians should be aware of this fact in order that the measures to stimulate and encourage the development of our northern frontier will be supported and sustained. It is also important that the rest of the world should be aware that the Canadian Arctic is not an "Ultima Thule" but is being effectively occupied, administered and developed by the Canadian Government and people.

This emphasis should underline all public information on the north whether it relates to long-range policy plans or to spot news. It may be developed through reference whenever possible to the Canadian civil administration and activity in the north in order to draw to the attention of the general public, both at home and abroad, that the north, like any other part of Canada, has its own civil government and a developing economy.

There are, of course, wide areas where the civil administration is not represented on the ground, but where there are Canadian activities of a military, scientific, or commercial nature. It is important that the public be aware of these activities and the contribution which they are making to northern and national development. As far as possible, however, they should be put in the same sort of perspective as similar activities elsewhere in Canada; that is, their importance should be given full weight without creating the impression that they are the only form of Canadian interest in the areas involved.

Northern Development

The Prime Minister and members of the Cabinet have made many public statements on the growing importance of the north and the growing attention to be focused on that area. This growing importance should be emphasized. The reason for the increased interest is not, in the Government view, due primarily to defence requirements, but it is the logical extension of the development of Canadian nationhood. Canada has developed in the east, the south, and the west, but the time and the conditions of peace and prosperity have not until now been present to permit us to develop the northern areas of the country.

Canada is interested in northern development in part to exploit for present and future generations its immense natural resources. In part, also, Canada is developing the north merely because it is Canada and because we have a responsibility to ensure that conditions are established to permit residents of the north, Eskimos, Indians, and others, to share in the benefits of and to contribute to Canadian national life. Our shortcomings in the past, particularly in relation to policy for native people, are recognized but there is now a determination to fulfil our responsibilities.

Defence

The role of the military in the development of the north should be given full credit, but we should avoid the impression that defence activities are the only, or even the main, interest of the Canadian Government in the far north. To some extent it is in fact necessary to correct the imbalance between military and civil aspects of the north which has sometimes been created by journalists who have travelled in the north only to Service installations and on the Service aircraft. It should be pointed out that in the past the principal defence activity in the north has been in the field of transportation and communications and related facilities. It would be incorrect to convey the impression that there are vast military bases in northern Canada. We should, however, point out that Canadian defence authorities are keenly aware of the problems of defence in the north.

References to defence activities will be governed by military security and enquiries should be referred to the Directorate of Public Relations, Department of National Defence. For the present, public information released on continental defence will be governed by the statement of the Minister of National Defence on April 8, 1954.

Economic Development

Emphasis will be put on the great mineral potential of the north, on its rapid development in the past ten years and on the factors which govern the future rate of industrial growth. Industry in the north will generally be developed by private interests without direct government support. It may be pointed out, however, that the Federal Government has special responsibilities in the north for creating conditions, particularly in transportation, to permit private enterprise to operate. The justification of Federal contributions to northern development when necessary can be made to the Federal contribution to the trans-continental railway system.

Political Development

In public information on developments in the north reference should be made whenever possible to the role of the Councils of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories. The Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories are generally on the road to greater self-government, but it must not be indicated that provincial status is an immediate goal. Local autonomy will develop as the territories are able to assume greater responsibility for local development. For the present, however, and for many years to come, the interests of the territories as well as the country as a whole are best served by a division between the federal and local authorities of responsibility for administration and financial contributions. The Yukon Territory is at a somewhat more advanced stage of political development than the Northwest Territories. The role of local government in both areas, however, should be kept before the public.

Canadian-United States Relations and Sovereignty

Canada welcomes co-operation with the United States in northern activities which are of mutual concern to the two countries. We fully acknowledge the useful work which agencies of the United States have done in co-operation with Canada in the Canadian north. Northern development, however, is never a joint responsibility; it is a Canadian responsibility which cannot be allowed to go by default or left to others to carry out.

Reference to U.S. activities in the Canadian north in isolation should be avoided, if they can be coupled with reference to Canadian work. The status of U.S. defence activities should be clearly defined. For instance, if any mention is made of U.S. troops at Frobisher, it should be accompanied by a report in some form that the installation is an R.C.A.F. station in Canadian command and control. Any extensive reference to the five joint Arctic weather stations should be accompanied by some mention of the large network of Canadian stations.

No emphasis should be placed on Canadian claims in the north lest we seem to be on the defensive. Canada owns all the lands shown on official maps of Canada and we recognize no differences in degree of control between any of the northern islands and counties in a southern province. We do recognize, however, that the maintenance of sovereignty in any part of Canada requires continuous, effective administration which there now is and will continue to be.

Questions concerning sovereignty over waters on the continental shelf, straits, and narrow passages between islands should, if at all possible, be avoided, or referred to authorities such as the Legal Division of the Department of External Affairs.⁷⁵

BILATERAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH THE UNITED STATES (NON-MILITARY)

4. Mr. Bennett described to the Panel his discussions with Admiral Strauss, the Chairman, and General Nichols, the General Manager, of the United States Atomic Energy Commission. He said the primary purpose of the meetings had been to discuss the plutonium contract between the United States Atomic Energy Commission and Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd., and relations between the two bodies as a consequence of the enactment of the new United States Atomic Energy Act.⁷⁶ However he had also taken the opportunity to raise the general question of Canadian-American relations in this field and to comment on developments in connection with the Eisenhower proposals, particularly in the light of the President's reference to such discussions in a recent speech.⁷⁷

5. Mr. Bennett drew attention to the provision in Section 144 (a) of the United States Act for cooperation in non-military fields "pursuant to an agreement existing on the effective date of this Act". He reported that Admiral Strauss had said that both the existing Canadian-United States raw materials agreements made under the provisions of the old United States Act, and the technical cooperation arrangements made under the Modus Vivendi of 1948, qualified as existing agreements.⁷⁸

6. Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd., and Eldorado Mining and Refining Ltd. were interested primarily in obtaining information from United States sources and in being able to make use of United States industrial firms and consultants. The Modus Vivendi would make it possible to continue to receive information in the categories already established, but if it were desired to extend these categories or open up new ones, an Agreement for Cooperation under the new Act would be required. United States industrial consultants could be employed on Canadian projects which did not involve the use of Restricted Data merely by obtaining the consent of the United States Atomic Energy Commission. If Restricted Data was involved, an Agreement for Cooperation would be necessary. Mr. Bennett said he had asked Admiral Strauss if six separate Agreements for Cooperation would be required for the six areas of cooperation listed in Section 144 (a) of the Act. He was assured that this would not be necessary and that one omnibus agreement could be made. The Atomic Energy Commission expressed the desire to make the first Agreement for Cooperation with Canada and indicate that this agreement would serve as a pattern for those subsequently negotiated with other countries. As far as the United States was concerned the executing authority for these agreements under Section 144 (a) would be the Atomic Energy Commission.

BILATERAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH THE UNITED STATES (MILITARY)

7. Dr. Solandt drew attention to the fact that while Section 144 (a) of the new United States Act provided for continuing cooperation in non-military fields pursuant to "existing agreements", Section 144 (b), which dealt with cooperation in the military aspects of atomic energy, had no such provision. As a consequence, military atomic information (other than intelligence relating to other countries) in categories already established will continue to be supplied, but through the Atomic Energy Commission rather than the Department of Defence as has been the case in the past. When, in due course, an Agreement for Cooperation could be concluded, the Defence Department to Defence Department channel would be re-established. The United States Defence Department was now preparing a draft Agreement for Cooperation with Canada and this would be transmitted to the Canadian authorities through military channels in the near future.

8. Dr. Solandt said it was expected that it would be possible to continue cooperation on intelligence aspects of atomic energy by removing certain areas of information from the Restricted Data category under the provisions of Section 142 (e) of the Act.

9. The Panel, after discussion, agreed that it would appear desirable that the civil and military aspects of cooperation with the United States should be dealt with under separate Agreements for Cooperation and that they should probably be the subjects of Exchanges of Diplomatic Notes between the two Governments, even though the Atomic Energy Commission or the Department of Defence might be the executing authorities for the United States Government.

I have discussed today with Dr. Solandt the question of the agreements with the United States under their new Atomic Energy Act. We both think it would be desirable that our Panel on Atomic Energy Matters should see something of the agreements which Mr. Bennett is working out on the civil side and General Foulkes on the military, before we are fully committed on them and while the thinking on them is still in its formative stages. On the other hand, neither one of us likes to enquire at this stage and we both felt that it would be more appropriate for your department to enquire, and to suggest that perhaps our Panel would be a suitable forum in which to go over any questions of policy that may be arising of interest to several of us. Would you feel prepared to take this on?⁷⁹

Incidentally, Solandt and I feel that our Panel will probably have to be somewhat more active in the future than it would have been had Mr. Howe proceeded with the enlargement of the scope and powers of the Atomic Energy Control Board that he had originally contemplated when revising our Canadian Atomic Energy Control Act. As it is, the Control Board's role has been diminished not increased, and the interests of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited are more and more confined to the civilian, scientific, production and power aspects of atomic energy, rather than its military and international policy aspects, while the Services are naturally interested primarily in the effects of atomic weapons. Consequently, there seems to us to be a case for our Panel maintaining a fairly frequent contact with what is going on to ensure that Canada's interest in the field does not get too specialized on either the production and research side on the one hand, or the Service side on the other.

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, October 28, 1954

Dear Mr. Howe,

Some weeks ago I gave you a verbal report on the amendments to the U.S. Atomic Energy Act as they affect fuller collaboration in the power reactor programme. Section 144(a) of the Act reads as follows:

"The President may authorize the Commission to cooperate with another nation and to communicate to that nation Restricted Data on

- (1) refining, purification, and subsequent treatment of source material;
- (2) reactor development;
- (3) production of special nuclear material;
- (4) health and safety;
- (5) industrial and other applications of atomic energy for peaceful purposes; and
- (6) research and development relating to the foregoing:

Provided, however, That no such cooperation shall involve the communication of Restricted Data relating to the design or fabrication of atomic weapons: And provided further, That the cooperation is undertaken pursuant to an agreement for cooperation entered into in accordance with section 123, or is undertaken pursuant to an agreement existing on the effective date of this Act."

You will note from this that the collaboration in the several areas of civilian application can be achieved under an "Agreement for Co-operation". Such Agreements must be made subject to Section 123 of the Act. The significant features of this Section are as follows:

- (a) The terms, conditions, duration, nature and scope of the co-operation must be set out in the Agreement.
- (b) Adequate security safeguards and standards must be maintained.
- (c) The co-operating party shall not use any material which it receives under the Agreement for atomic weapons or for research on or development of atomic weapons, or for any other military purpose.
- (d) The co-operating party will not pass to a third party any material or any Restricted Data which it receives under an Agreement, unless the Agreement so specifies.
- (e) The President shall approve and authorize the execution of the Agreement and shall make a determination in writing that the Agreement will not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defence and security.
- (f) The proposed Agreement for Co-operation, together with the approval and the determination of the President, shall be submitted to the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy for a period of thirty days while the Congress is in session.

As I explained to you, the proposed amendment allows for the type of collaboration which we have been seeking for some years. So far as Canada is concerned, there will be no difficulty whatever in meeting the conditions set out in Section 123. However, our close association with the Atomic Energy Authority in the United Kingdom makes it desirable that the U.K. should also be in a position to negotiate an Agreement for Co-operation.

When Sir Edwin Plowden was in Canada late in June I had a lengthy discussion with him as to what the attitude of the U.K. would be in the event that the American Act was amended. Plowden indicated a strong desire to enter into full collaboration with the U.S. on the power reactor programme. When I met with Lewis Strauss early in September I inquired of him as to whether the U.S. was anxious to continue the tripartite arrangement through the medium of the amended Act. Strauss assured me that he was anxious to enter into an agreement with the U.K. as well as with Canada. It was agreed with Strauss that when I went to the U.K. I would propose to Plowden that we get together with Strauss at an early date for the purpose of discussing the preparatory steps which must be taken if Agreements for Co-operation were to become effective. Plowden accepted the proposal and a tripartite meeting was held in Washington last Saturday. The meeting was attended by the members of the Atomic Energy Commission and certain technical advisers, Sir Edwin Plowden and Sir John Cockcroft, and myself.⁸⁰

Bearing in mind the rather unhappy relationship which has existed between the United States and the United Kingdom in the post-war years, the meeting went extremely well. Strauss made it clear at the outset that the United States was anxious to continue the tripartite arrangement and to this end he thought it most desirable that Agreements for Co-operation should be entered into with both Canada and the United Kingdom at an early date. He likewise stressed the need for getting the paper work in shape in order that the draft Agreements could be submitted to the Congressional committee as soon as Congress meets early in the new year. A working committee was set up at the meeting, with the understanding that this committee would meet on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of this week. The present thinking is that the body of the U.K. and Canada Agreements will be identical, although there will be items attached in Appendices to the Agreements which may differ.

Since security standards and procedures have been the main obstacle to better relations between the United Kingdom and the United States, I impressed upon Plowden during my visit to the U.K. that he should take the security situation in his own hands. This he has done. The new Atomic Energy Authority will have its own security organization. Plowden is sending a member of the organization to Chalk River early in November in response to my suggestion that we should be glad to assist the U.K. in establishing a security standard and procedure which would be acceptable to the U.S.

⁸⁰ Voir/See Document 190.

As you are aware, we have had a number of embarrassing incidents at Chalk River, both with the U.K. and with the U.S., because of the fact that we have not been able to disclose certain U.S. information to the U.K. and vice versa. We could expect this situation to be aggravated if we were in a position to take advantage of the U.S. amendment and the U.K. was not. For this reason I am extremely pleased with the outcome of our meeting in Washington.

I shall keep you advised of further developments.

Yours sincerely,

W.J. BENNETT

Atomic Energy Discussions in Washington

4. Mr. Bennett gave an account to the Panel of discussions he had attended in Washington on October 22 and 23. The meeting on October 22 was attended by Sir Edwin Plowden, Sir John Cockroft and Sir Roger Makins for the United Kingdom and by Mr. Heeney, Mr. Bennett, Dr. Lewis and Dr. Babbitt for Canada. The purpose of this meeting was to coordinate the United Kingdom and Canadian thinking on the problems to be discussed with the Americans on the following day. The United Kingdom representatives were interested primarily in negotiations for a bilateral "agreement for cooperation", and ascertaining the possible arrangements for trilateral cooperation, while the Canadian representatives were mainly concerned with clarifying the position with respect to the proposed International Atomic Energy Agency before the pending debate in the United Nations General Assembly got under way.

5. The meeting on October 23 was attended by Admiral Strauss and a number of officials of the United States Atomic Energy Commission and a representative of the State Department as well as by the United Kingdom and Canadian representatives mentioned above. Mr. Bennett said that Admiral Strauss wanted to make agreements for cooperation in accordance with the provisions of section 144 (a) of the United States Atomic Energy Act with both the United Kingdom and Canada and hoped that they might be submitted to the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy at about the same time. It was anticipated that the two agreements would be generally similar although the detailed list of the subjects for cooperation might differ. Since the subject matter of the two agreements would overlap it should be possible for scientific consultation to be carried out between the three countries on a three-way basis. Admiral Strauss urged quick action so that draft agreements could be submitted to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy as soon as Congress reconvened and he set up a drafting committee of United States officials with this end in view. Conversations between the British and United States officials on the substance of the United Kingdom-United States agreement were conducted during the following week. These had been attended by Dr. Babbitt as an observer. Sir Edwin Plowden had subsequently informed Mr. Bennett that the meetings went very well.

6. At the meeting of October 23, after discussion on the matter of bilateral agreements for cooperation, Mr. Heeney raised the question of the International Atomic Energy Agency and referred to a paper† which had been prepared outlining what the Canadian officials thought were the more important problems that required solution. Admiral Strauss and the Atomic Energy Commission had not had an opportunity to study the paper but promised to do so. The State Department representative said that it would be found that most of the Canadian points had been covered in a draft speech prepared for the use of Ambassador Lodge, copies of which would be given to the Canadian and United Kingdom representatives immediately after the meeting.

Bilateral Agreements for Cooperation between Canada and the United States

7. The Panel discussed the question of whether the agreements between the United States and Canada, i.e. the non-military agreement under section 144 (a) of the United States Act and the military agreement under section 144 (b) of the Act would be executed as inter-governmental agreements by means of exchanges of notes or whether they would be made between the United States Atomic Energy Commission and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited on the one hand and between the two Defence Departments on the other. It was considered probable that the non-military agreement would be between the two atomic energy agencies but that it might be desirable that the military agreement be effected by an exchange of notes. It was considered, however, that both the military and non-military agreements, regardless of the manner of execution, were of such importance that they should be submitted to the Governor-in-Council for consideration prior to final approval.

DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS CCC COMMODITIES, PARTICULARLY WHEAT

We were called to State Department today to be informed that there are new deals in the process of development or that may be near completion concerning the disposal of surplus CCC commodities, particularly wheat.

2. It is being proposed that the CCC negotiate sales of wheat for local currencies or in exchange for other commodities without any regard to the orderly marketing of friendly countries or any other type of safeguarding clauses.

It is claimed that no authority is necessary as the CCC already has the authority to dispose of its surpluses at any price in world markets — specifically deals under study and these may be very near completion, involve 150-200,000 tons of wheat to Yugoslavia and 50,000 tons to Brazil.

3. It is important to understand that these types of operations are entirely divorced from the 550 deals⁸² and represent new thinking that is based on the elementary facts; "we have surplus wheat, other countries are willing to barter for it or to buy it in local currencies, why don't we let them have it". This new concept of marketing is evidently not to be confined to wheat, but may well represent the new process by which it is hoped CCC may be relieved of the pressing burden of its surpluses.

4. In the case of Yugoslavia and Brazil, we have been privately informed that officials of these countries are actively pushing the United States to agree to sales of wheat for local currency or in exchange for goods or services. In view of the pressures from the Department of Agriculture and criticism of former State Department interference in sales of wheat under 550, these pressures are undoubtedly difficult to resist.

5. From conversations with relatively junior officers of the State Department, we are convinced that the most senior officers of that department cannot be convinced by their own officials of the serious repercussions this process of disposal will have on friendly countries. There is no doubt in our minds that the officials of the State Department would welcome our most energetic representations. We could start our message to the State Department by saying: "We have been informed that the United States may enter into agreement with other countries, notably Yugoslavia and Brazil, for the disposal of substantial quantities of wheat for local currencies or in exchange for other commodities or services. We also understand that these operations (and possibly others may be under consideration) are independent of any sales under Article 550 of the AAA. If this is so, it would appear that this is an important change in policy, and one that can hardly fail to seriously disrupt the orderly marketing of wheat".

6. We suggest an opening along these lines because of the confidential nature of the advice given to us by the State Department, and the necessity of not betraying confidences, since only part of the information given us was passed on as a result of official instructions.

7. We have informally told State Department that this news will be received with the greatest possible misgiving in Canada and have drawn to their attention the untimely nature of this development coming on the eve of the first meeting of our new joint committee, particularly as the disposal of the surpluses is on the agenda.

DISPOSAL OF UNITED STATES AGRICULTURAL SURPLUSES

As the result of a further sounding, today we believe that the situation may be even more serious than represented in our telegram yesterday. Schaetzel, the United States Secretary of the Joint United States-Canadian Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, read to us in strict confidence this morning the minute recording decisions taken by the United States Cabinet last Friday, February 5, concerning disposals abroad of United States surpluses. Discussion of this subject in Cabinet was precipitated by the offers of United States dealers to sell surpluses to the Soviet Union and its satellites. The Cabinet decided

(a) That perishable United States surpluses could be bartered for imperishable goods to be delivered by countries in the Soviet Bloc; and

(b) That the Commodity Credit Corporation should be authorized to sell agricultural surpluses to friendly foreign countries at the world price (even when considerably below the United States support price) and to take in exchange anything that would be useful to the United States.

2. Schaetzel said that the Cabinet discussion and decisions had been surprising in the extreme since they had not been based on any careful staff work, and since only the previous day it had been decided that a "Czar" should be appointed to advise the government on the disposal of United States agricultural surpluses and to carry into effect whatever plans might be agreed on. No appointment has yet been made to this new position. But Governor Adams has been interviewing this morning the President of Swifts' with a view of offering him the assignment.

3. In addition to the deals now being considered both with Brazil and with Yugoslavia on which we reported in our telegrams yesterday, Schaetzel said that consideration is being given under this wider policy to disposing of some tobacco and long-staple cotton to Finland. The reason we were not informed of this possibility yesterday was that it was not thought that the deal with Finland would have any effect on our normal trade.

4. This recent policy decision by the United States Cabinet must cause us in Canada the greatest concern; and clearly we must make our views known without delay. It is my view that very careful thought should be given to what type of representations would be the most effective and, in spite of the provocation which we have been given for a very sharp reaction by this new development in United States policy, coming as it does only a little more than a month before the first meeting of the Joint Committee, I believe that our representations will have more effect if they are restrained and carefully weighed. My advice is that I should be instructed to see Governor Adams, who is fully conversant with these issues, and to give him a letter for President Eisenhower signed by Mr. Howe as the Acting Prime Minister. My immediately following telegram contains a hurriedly prepared draft of the kind of letter which it seems to me is likely to be most effective.

5. If this draft seems weaker than the situation warrants, it should be remembered that, in spite of the decision precipitately taken by the United States Cabinet last week, United States policy on the disposal abroad of agricultural surpluses is by no means fully clarified yet. For example, the State Department has within the last few days directed a letter to all the other interested agencies questioning whether the CCC possesses the authority to dispose of agricultural surpluses to friendly countries on the terms authorized by the Cabinet directive. Moreover, the new appointee to advise on the disposal of agricultural surpluses has not yet been chosen. And further, no decision has yet been taken on what legislation should be sought from Congress to regulate the use of the new appropriation of $300 million which the President requested in his budget message for the disposal of agricultural surpluses during the coming fiscal year. In these circumstances our chief objective for the moment, I think, should be to stave off any irrevocable decisions, either on general policy or on particular deals, until the whole subject can be thoroughly threshed out when the Joint Committee meets on the 16th of March. The decision taken by the United States Cabinet last week is so fuzzy and was made after such little consideration that it need not be considered, it seems to me, as being in any sense irrevocable. No reference is made to it in the text of our draft letter because we are not supposed to know of it officially.

DISPOSAL OF UNITED STATES AGRICULTURAL SURPLUSES

Following is the text of our very tentative draft of a letter to be sent to President Eisenhower by Mr. Howe as Acting Prime Minister. Text begins:

"Dear Mr. President,

"We in Canada have been watching with growing concern the increasing accumulations of agricultural surpluses in United States, and the mounting pressures to have these surpluses disposed of abroad on terms other than those that would be usual in normal commercial transactions. I know that the problems involved in this situation have caused you much anxious thought and I have read with interest of the efforts of your administration to formulate constructive measures to reduce the existing surpluses and to prevent them from recurring in future in their present volume.

"I am sending you this letter because we have been informed during the past few days that the Commodity Credit Corporation may be authorized to dispose of U.S. agricultural surpluses to friendly countries in return for local currencies or through barter deals, without regard to the effect of such transaction on normal commercial marketings. We are convinced that the implementation of such a policy would inevitably disrupt the ordinary marketing of wheat and other agricultural commodities throughout the world. To Canada that would be particularly serious since our trade in wheat is vital to our economy and to the welfare of the Canadian people. Last year exports of wheat and flour accounted for approximately 17 per cent of our total exports. (Our calculation is based on the figures for calendar 1952 and would have to be brought up to date with figures available in Ottawa.)

"As you are aware, the first meeting of the Joint U.S.-Canadian Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, which was established as the result of conversations Mr. St. Laurent had with you last May, is to be held in Washington on the 16th of March. Among the items that have been provisionally agreed for inclusion in the agenda are "U.S. and Canadian agricultural policies and their relations to international trade", and "methods of disposing of existing surpluses and those which may be expected to accumulate within the immediate future". I would urge that no irrevocable decisions, either of general policy or with respect to particular transactions, should be taken in the United States until the Joint Committee has had an opportunity to consider the whole set of interrelated problems that are involved and, in particular, to give full weight to the likely effect on Canada's trade of measures that you may adopt." Text ends.

Dear Mr. Heeney:

I enclose two copies of a report on discussions in which I participated regarding United States agricultural policy, on February 15, 16 and 17. Originally I had intended to prepare a briefer report to put on the wires; hence the form in which the report is drafted. When it grew to six pages, I thought that it might be better simply to mail you a copy. If you, Doug LePan, Guy Smith or Bert Hopper wish to make any additions or changes, these might take the form of a supplementary report which could be circulated amongst the interested departments.

I have given a copy of this report to my Minister, Mr. Howe, and to the Department of External Affairs.

Yours sincerely,
M.W. SHARP

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

*RapportReport*REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS IN WASHINGTON REGARDING U.S.
AGRICULTURAL POLICY, FEBRUARY 15, 16 AND 17

When Mr. Howe and Sharp were in Winnipeg for discussions with the Canadian Wheat Board, the contents of telegram No. WA-249 were telephoned to Winnipeg from Ottawa. After discussion with the Minister, Sharp made certain suggestions for changes in the draft letter from the Acting Prime Minister to the President and informed Isbister that the Minister was reluctant to agree to such a communication until the significance of the information from the State Department had been investigated.

It was decided that McNamara and Sharp should go to Washington immediately to inform the U.S. Department of Agriculture about certain changes that had been decided upon in the pricing policy of the Canadian Wheat Board. While there, Sharp was to make enquiries to ascertain whether the fears expressed by the State Department to External Affairs⁸³ about U.S. surplus disposal plans justified the sending of a letter to the President as proposed.

When he returned to Ottawa, the Minister called on the United States Ambassador and enquired whether the reports received from Washington were well founded. Stuart expressed scepticism and made enquiries at the White House.

Monday morning McNamara informed the Department of Agriculture of the proposed changes in Wheat Board pricing policy involving the establishment of a multiple pricing system based on Vancouver, Fort William and Churchill. The Americans were not surprised and lowered prices at Atlantic and Gulf ports simultaneously with the Canadian action.

Sharp spent Monday and Tuesday consulting with the Ambassador and his staff and calling on various officials of Agriculture and State Departments. Sharp and McNamara visited the Under-Secretary of Agriculture, True Morse, and were introduced while there to McConnell the new appointee from the Grange⁸⁴ who will be in charge of surplus disposal operations of the Department of Agriculture. McConnell is friendly to Canada and, as a New Englander, particularly friendly to imports of Canadian oats. McNamara pointed out that the Canadian Wheat Board had now sold virtually all of the oats that can be delivered under the limitation accepted by Canada,⁸⁵ and expressed the opinion that the United States because of its continuing need for Canadian oats would be asking Canada to relax the limitation.

⁸⁵ Voir/See Volume 19, Document 863.

Sharp and McNamara also met Clayton Whipple, Acting Director of O.F.A.R. who will be a member of the official team coming to Canada to prepare for the meeting of the joint committee. In Whipple's view the United States will continue to be an exporter of agricultural products for years to come. Productivity has increased even more rapidly in agriculture than in industry since pre-war. The normal production of wheat, for example, had risen from 800 million bushels pre-war to 1,000 million now.⁸⁶

At these discussions and others, Sharp invariably enquired about the direction of surplus disposal policy. Morse categorically denied that the commercial interests of friendly countries would be ignored under the new plans. U.S. policy remained as declared by the President in his recent messages to Congress. Others said the same thing. All, however, made it clear that a new and more aggressive policy was in the making.

LePan and Sharp met Waugh of the State Department according to appointment Tuesday at 4:30. The interview was brief and mysterious. Waugh did not wish to anticipate what Sherman Adams would say to us tomorrow. He hinted, however, that Adams would be "reassuring".

The Ambassador and Sharp called on Sherman Adams at the White House, Wednesday, at 12 noon. The Ambassador explained that Sharp was in Washington for the purpose of having discussions with the Department of Agriculture about changes in the pricing policies of the Canadian Wheat Board. These discussions had been satisfactory. He was taking advantage of Sharp's presence in Washington to enquire about the significance of information given to us by the State Department in the course of usual consultations regarding proposed sales of commodities under Section 550. The information was to the effect that a major change was contemplated in the United States policy affecting the disposal of agricultural surpluses. We had been informed, for example, that sales of wheat were to be made to Yugoslavia and Brazil without regard to the effect upon the commercial marketings of friendly countries. There had also been reference to a Cabinet decision. The Canadian Government had hesitated to believe that these reports were founded in fact. We relied upon recent statements by the President that the United States did not intend to follow practices harmful to the interests of friendly countries. The Canadian Government had very much appreciated the way in which the United States Administration had consulted with Canada before any wheat had been disposed of under Section 550. We hoped that this close consultation would continue. We didn't intend to come around "belly-aching" whenever the United States wanted to sell wheat or butter and the Ambassador expressed the hope that Adams would realize that we were not calling on him to complain about lack of co-operation. Our visit arose solely out of the information that had been conveyed to us in the course of our continuing consultations with the State Department.

Adams replied that while there was no fundamental change in policy, the United States was determined to reduce the agricultural surpluses now owned by the United States Government which were costing $500,000 a day for storage alone. Plans were in preparation for the disposal of these surpluses in an orderly fashion. A new interdepartmental co-ordinating agency is to be created. One of the principal officials of the Swift Company has been approached to be the Director and Sam Waugh will represent the State Department as a member of the agency.

It is impossible yet to say just how the surpluses will be disposed of under the new plan. The possibilities run all the way from ordinary commercial sale at market prices at the one end, to sale at subsidized prices to unfriendly countries at the other. There have been some proposals that surpluses such as butter might be exchanged for strategic items such as manganese to be put into U.S. stockpile. While Adams did not believe that there would be any fundamental change in policy that would result in the sale of surpluses without regard to the interests of friendly countries, the Canadian Government should be on notice by this time that the United States did intend to adopt an aggressive policy.

When the Ambassador asked whether any irrevocable decisions would be made before the meeting of the Joint Trade and Economic Committee on March 16th, Adams replied that while the appointment of a new Director might be made before that time, he thought that there would be an opportunity for discussion between the two countries before any policy decisions were made.

Sharp confirmed that the Canadian Government was grateful for the way in which the United States had consulted with Canada about proposed sales under Section 550. Canada did not follow a policy of selling wheat for soft currencies or on barter terms. We sold wheat at market prices for dollars. Therefore, if the United States Administration were to make sales for local currencies without regard to the commercial marketings of friendly countries, Canada's reaction could only be to lower prices in order to capture a larger share of ordinary commercial markets which were prepared to pay in dollars. Canada did not think that it would be in the interest of either of our two countries to precipitate a price war of this kind.

At the conclusion of the meeting Adams suggested that we should call on Sam Waugh who would fill in the details.

This we did at 3:15 Wednesday afternoon. LePan and Hopper accompanied Sharp. Present with Waugh were Armstrong, Horsey, and Schaetzel. Sharp outlined the discussion with Adams and got the impression that the State Department had not been completely informed about the latest developments but, of course, this impression may have been wrong. The interview did not produce very much additional information except with respect to the legislative plans that are under consideration. A Bill is being drafted to create the interdepartmental agency and providing authority and funds for the program of disposal. The Bill will apparently ask for approval of an appropriation of $1,000,000 to be spent over a three year period.⁸⁷ In answer to questions by LePan and Sharp it developed that there is an unresolved dispute as to whether or how far this new authority would replace appropriation eventually & annually [auteur inconnu/author unknown]

existing authority, for example, under Section 550 of the Mutual Security Act. It is also uncertain whether C.C.C. has the authority or will be given the authority to sell for local currencies. We got the impression that the State Department is putting up a vigorous fight to retain those safeguards which would avoid conflict with the interests of friendly countries and that they had passed along the information about the new plans in order to provoke us into making timely representations.

Sharp's impression of these interviews with Adams and Waugh and of his previous soundings in the Department of Agriculture is that there has been no fundamental change in policy with respect to the disposal of wheat. Since the results of efforts to dispose of wheat under various programs have so far been very disappointing, we must, however, expect much more aggressive selling. Adams remarked at one point in our conversation, that a direction not to interfere with the commercial marketings of friendly countries is very vague and general and is subject to varying interpretations. So we have learned, particularly in the consultations regarding Yugoslavia and Norway. It does seem clear that there will be a vigorous campaign both to reduce further accumulations and to dispose of surpluses of perishables. The decision to reduce the support price for butter to 75% of parity is highly significant. From remarks made by various officials in the Department of Agriculture, there have already been consultations with several governments for co-operation in measures to raise the consumption of perishables like butter in their countries. Countries depending largely upon the export of perishables probably have more to fear from the new aggressive disposal plans of the United States than has Canada. It seems to be widely accepted in U.S. Administrative circles that the demand for wheat is highly inelastic and that too aggressive efforts by the U.S. to push sales for local currencies could easily precipitate a price collapse.

UNITED STATES SURPLUS AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Following for M.W. Sharp, Esq., Associate Deputy Minister, Department of Trade and Commerce from Smith, Begins: Today Porteous and representatives from Australia and the Argentine attended a meeting at the State Department at which Linville and Highby outlined three possible outlets for surplus United States agricultural products.

(1) Brazil—It has been proposed that the United States Barter 100,000 tons of wheat for strategic materials from Brazil. If this deal is consummated, the wheat will be shipped soon? But the strategic materials would be shipped over a much longer period of time. The details of the transaction have not been cleared up completely. It is expected that some specialists from the United States will leave here next week to look over the strategic materials which would be received in return for the wheat. It has not yet been decided if the money will be provided by the commodity credit corporation or some other government agency.

As justification, Linville pointed out that, while the United States has a history of selling considerable quantities of wheat to Brazil, this year practically nothing had been sold.

(2) Indonesia—There has been some discussion of trying to arrange a section 550 Barter deal involving the exchange of rubber for United States flour. The rubber in turn would be supplied to Yugoslavia under an United States aid programme. The value of the flour would amount to about $850,000.

It should be pointed out that, whereas the Brazilian deal is nearly completed, the Indonesian deal is in the preliminary stages of discussion.

(3) Libya—Sometime this year, it is expected that Libya will be asking for more United States aid. The preliminary figures being discussed at present indicate that Libya would like to get an amount of wheat larger than a year's normal imports because

(i) stocks were badly depleted last year and

(ii) they expect to have a short barley crop.

Linville said there was nothing formal about the Libyan deal. However, since he had together representatives from Australia, the Argentine and Canada, he took the opportunity to warn us that such a deal may be contemplated in the future.

2. The State Department would like our comments as soon as they can be made available. Ends.

UNITED STATES SURPLUS AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

1. We are surprised at this proposal for a large scale barter deal on wheat with Brazil. We are apprehensive of the possible consequences in general for the normal marketing of wheat by the United States and Canada if the proposal should be implemented. In the agreed communiqué issued at the conclusion of the recent meeting of the United States-Canadian Joint Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, it was stated:

"The ministers of both countries recognized that if surpluses were to be disposed of without regard to the impact of normal trade, great damage might be done not only to the commerce of Canada and the United States but also to the world economy. The ministers reaffirmed that it is the continuing policy of their respective governments, in disposing of agricultural surpluses abroad, to consult with interested countries and not to interfere with normal commercial marketings. They stated that it is their settled intention that any extraordinary measures that might be adopted to reduce surpluses should result in greater consumption and should augment, and not displace, normal quantities of agricultural products entering into world trade."

These meetings took place so recently that it should hardly be necessary to remind the Americans of the careful attention that was devoted by their Secretaries and our Ministers to the formulation of this passage in the agreed release.

2. In the past we have been ready in particular instances to recognize exceptions to this general pattern of marketing of wheat. In the case of Japan and Spain, for example, we agreed on the existence of very special circumstances, which justified extraordinary measures of assistance. In such instances we have shown our understanding of the U.S. position.

3. In the case of Brazil, however, such conditions are not present and we feel that the suggested program would be a most disturbing influence in an area which has been a substantial commercial market for both the U.S.A. and Canada, to say nothing of Argentina. The Brazilian system of calling for tenders has permitted the normal and desirable freedom of straight commercial trading. Canada and the United States have been impressing upon Brazil the desirability of returning to multilateral trade practices. Both of our governments have pointed out the disadvantages and restrictive aspects of bilateral trading arrangements. To introduce now the barter aspect suggested would be a retrograde step and would introduce the restrictive, uneconomic aspects of barter trading into a market which, since the war, has been of commercial importance to both the U.S.A. and Canada. We suggest that, if strategic materials are needed, they can be bought for dollars with which Brazil can in turn purchase wheat on a commercial basis and without disturbing normal purchasing and selling methods.

4. Linville's argument that the lack of current sales by U.S.A. to Brazil is justification for the barter proposal appears to us to be a radical and dangerous departure from previous policy. Never before has the U.S. used the lack of business with a particular country as justification for give-away or barter proposals. The U.S.A. had the same opportunity as any other supplier to sell wheat to Brazil on the commercial tender procedure which has been followed. To create the prospect or implied promise in the minds of buyers that, if wheat is not purchased on a regular commercial call for tenders, it will later be available on some special type of arrangement, would be the surest method of interfering with the normal commercial wheat trade.

5. With respect to Indonesia and Libya, we have no particular comment to make. Confidentially, we assume that Australia will make representations with respect to Indonesia which has been an important Australian flour market.

6. You will appreciate that we regard this as a serious matter. Would you please convey these views to the State Department at an appropriate level.

UNITED STATES SURPLUS AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Please repeat to: M.W. Sharp Associate Deputy Minister Dept. of Trade & Commerce (Important), Begins: We met with Clarence Nichols, Acting Director of the Office of International Materials Policy; Francis Linville of the Agricultural Products Staff; Bramble, Acting Chief, Metals and Minerals Staff; Turnance, International Finance and Development; and Fidel, Economic Matters Relating to the Commonwealth and Northern Europe; all of the State Department, late yesterday afternoon to present the points contained in your teletype EX-738 of May 4, with reference to the proposal to supply 100,000 tons of wheat to Brazil and accept strategic materials in payment.

2. Nichols, who was the senior official present, expressed surprise that Canada should object to the proposal which he thought has the features of a commercial transaction. He said that Brazil had approached the United States to purchase wheat which that country needs immediately and, being short of dollars, requires credit. The United States, having wheat to sell to any country wishing to buy, is prepared to grant the necessary credit and accept strategic materials over the next eighteen months in liquidation of the debt. The Office of Defense Mobilization needs these minerals, and will pay the Commodity Credit Corporation in dollars as they are received. If the minerals desired are not available to completely satisfy the requirements of the debt, Brazil will pay off the balance in dollars.

3. The wheat contract, which involves 100,000 tons, has not yet been consummated but will likely be concluded soon, as Brazil is in urgent need of wheat. Brazil's further wheat requirements, which are large, will, Nichols thought, be supplied by other countries. Conclusion of the minerals contract will be delayed until after United States minerals experts visit Brazil.

4. Nichols stated that, in his opinion, the proposal does not violate the agreement recently announced between Canadian Ministers and United States Secretaries, with respect to the disposal of surplus commodities. He thought the extraordinary measures mentioned in the agreement apply only to special legislation, such as section 550 and bills which have been introduced in this session to provide for the disposal of surplus commodities for local currencies, sales on concessional terms, gifts, etc. We indicated that, in our opinion, the present proposal is an extraordinary measure and, therefore, was in conflict with the declaration agreed to by ministers on both sides, since there is no increase in consumption and "normal" quantities would be displaced.

5. We remarked that we had not been informed at the earlier meeting that the initiative have been taken by Brazil, but that fact did not appear to us to invalidate the barter aspects of the proposal which, for a number of reasons, are most undesirable.

6. We reiterated the other arguments in opposition to the proposal which were contained in your message but they seemed to make little impression.

7. On the point that, if the United States needs Brazilian minerals, why are they not purchased for dollars which would permit Brazil to buy wheat on a regular commercial basis, State officials said that Brazil needs the wheat quickly but the strategical materials cannot be supplied by that country except over a considerable period of time.

8. We expressed our concern that the proposed deal with Brazil might be the beginning of many similar or other types of arrangements for selling wheat which would not be in conformity with normal commercial practices. Nichols remarked that many ideas are being advanced for the disposal of surplus commodities because the United States Government holds such large quantities which must be moved into consumption. He suggested that our fears on this score were without foundation since not many countries could offer domestic goods in such measure to support proposals similar to the Brazilian one. We insisted, however, that this was a retrograde step since it was accepting a proposal by Brazil that turned back that country along the road of bilateralism. Further, we still believed other countries would be tempted to try to negotiate similar deals on their normal exports to the United States.

9. Nichols stated further that he was pleased to have had our comments but we came away with the impression that we will not hear anything further from the State Department on this case.

10. When asked if there would be any reasons why we should not discuss the proposal with Brazilian authorities, Nichols said he did not think there would be any objections. He supposed that Canadian officials are in constant touch with the Brazilian Government with respect to the purchase of wheat. However, we do not think it would be desirable to approach the Brazilians on this subject.

11. We informed the State officials that we would report to Ottawa the substance of our discussion and we might have further comments to make.

12. We were informed this morning by Linville that the proposal to sell flour to Indonesia has been dropped.

13. With further reference to wheat for Brazil, Linville informed us that Brazil is interested in obtaining an additional 200,000 tons from the United States on some basis and this matter is under consideration, but no proposals have been made to the Brazilian authorities with respect to this quantity and, if a transaction is concluded, it will not be on the basis of the proposed exchange of wheat for strategic materials.

14. In a later message, we will give you some ideas which may contribute to your thinking on what further representations should be made to the State Department in respect to this Brazilian deal, as well as the broader aspects of disposal methods which are under discussion here. Ends.

UNITED STATES SURPLUS AGRICULTURE COMMODITIES

Please repeat to: (Important) M.W. Sharp, Associate Deputy Minister, Department of Trade and Commerce, Begins: Further to our 790 of May 6, we believe the United States will proceed with their plans to sell the 100,000 tons of wheat to Brazil in exchange for strategic materials, regardless of any protest we may make. Since the United States has not sold any wheat this year to Brazil, we are convinced that to attempt to block this deal would be impolitic and might alienate the good-will of a harassed State Department. We were relieved, therefore, to know that you may also be thinking along these lines.

2. At the same time, we believe our vigorous intervention of Wednesday has had the effect of impressing the State Department of the fact that we take very seriously our belief in the principle of non-interference in normal trading and in the desirability of enticing weaker sisters away from the rosy glow of bilateralism. In these circumstances, we believe it would be a mistake not to follow up our first intervention with an aide-mémoire expressing our dislike of this type of operation and alarm at the trend that seems to indicate a change in the United States thinking, which was so recently enunciated at the meeting of Ministers. We would not in the aide-mémoire make any reference to our agreement or non-agreement to this specific sale of wheat to Brazil, but we would propose in presenting the aide-mémoire to say that we do not wish to oppose this actual sale on the grounds that we fully understand the difficulties created by surpluses and that we certainly do not wish to claim any exclusive right to the Brazilian trade.

3. In conversation with agricultural officials today, they again expressed their conviction that there would not be many more of these sort of barter deals for strategic materials because the stockpile for most strategic materials is nearing completion and, therefore, the range is strictly limited. They emphatically stated that it was government policy not to consider any deals of this type that were not based on strategic materials required for government stockpiles. However, while this may be some reassurance, we do not think that it is sufficient to make it unnecessary for us to make a statement of our position as suggested above.

4. In the immediately following teletype, we have put together a suggested aide-mémoire on which we would welcome your comments and amendments. Ends.

DISPOSAL OF UNITED STATES AGRICULTURAL SURPLUSES

Our immediately following telegram contains the text of the aide-mémoire which we left yesterday afternoon at the State Department with Kalijarvi, the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs. We were represented by LePan, Smith and Hopper. I decided to hold my own fire for the representations that we will clearly have to make very soon on the Tariff Commission's recommendations to the President concerning groundfish fillets. As you will see, the aide-mémoire follows almost exactly the text contained in your teletype EX-814† although we took advantage of the latitude granted to us over the telephone by Mitchell Sharp to amend slightly the opening sentences.

2. We were gratified to find that there was little disposition on the part of most of the State Department officials who were present to defend the deal with Brazil. Kalijarvi argued that the quantity of wheat involved was not very large and stressed that this was an isolated and special case. He said that he assumed that we were worried more by the possibility that deals of this kind might become common than by the Brazilian deal itself. When we agreed (although adding that the importance of this particular deal should not be minimized) he went on to say that he and others in the State Department would also be very concerned if this transaction were to set a pattern for future trading. In fact, the whole tenor of what he and the other State Department officials had to say was that this deal was "only a little one".

3. Turnage, the Deputy Director of the Office of Financial and Development Policy, mildly contested the sentence in the memorandum objecting to the deal on the grounds that it would not result in increased consumption. It was hardly reasonable, he argued, to expect that wheat for which Brazil would be paying with other commodities should result in increased consumption; that principle would be applicable only in cases where the United States would be disposing of agricultural surpluses, either wholly or in part, as grant assistance. To that we replied that, in our view, this sale of wheat to Brazil would not be a normal commercial transaction. In any case, what worried us most about it was that it came very close to being a straight barter deal. If any large proportion of the trade of the free world were to become tied up in that way, the objectives in the field of foreign economic policy towards which the United States and Canada had been working would become impossible of achievement.

4. The only official present who was prepared to dissent at all from the way we had characterized the proposed deal was Nichols, the Acting Director of the Office of International Materials Policy, who claimed that it was an unobjectionable commercial transaction. Even he admitted, however, that if the levels for the United States stockpile were raised substantially, and if the new requirements were filled by swapping agricultural surpluses for strategic materials, the effect on world trade would be very serious. All in all, his remarks were considerably more subdued than they had been when we called on him at the State Department on May 5. Yesterday he seemed to appreciate that his views were not popular with his colleagues and superiors in the State Department.

5. In explanation of our worries about what the future might hold, we referred to the remarks made by John Davis, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, in testifying before the House Agricultural Committee on April 27, when he said that a significant part of any increased stockpiling objectives involving foreign produced materials might be obtained through barter for agricultural surpluses. Kalijarvi conceded that there was considerable support within the United States Government for exchanging United States perishables for strategic commodities. But he gave us the impression that there was reasonable confidence within the State Department that there would not be many deals in which non-perishables would be traded in exchange for materials needed to build up the stockpiles. He also reminded us that the American Farm Bureau Federation, which is now the most influential farmers' group in the United States was opposed to inter-governmental deals involving agricultural commodities, and he suggested that this would tend to curb any policy of bartering agricultural products.

6. Linville, Chief of the Agricultural Products Staff in the Staff Department, at that point interjected that there would be an automatic external check on further deals of this kind. Countries which believed that the United States wanted to buy strategic commodities which they had to sell would insist on being paid for them in dollars. If the pressures in this country to dispose of agricultural surpluses became more extreme, the United States might be willing to take in exchange strategic commodities which it might not otherwise have purchased, he admitted; but there was certainly no thought of following such a policy at present. Turnage also pointed out that the kind of deal now being made with Brazil was unlikely to be repeated often, if only because of the time and trouble involved in working out the details.

7. All in all, we thought that our representations were useful in reminding the United States authorities of the dangers of the path on which they would now seem to be taking a few first hesitant steps, and in reinforcing the worries that are already obviously felt by Kalijarvi and others in the State Department.

DISPOSAL OF UNITED STATES AGRICULTURAL SURPLUSES

Following is the text of the aide-mémoire which we left at the State Department yesterday. Text begins: The Canadian Government wishes to refer to a proposal to sell 100,000 tons of wheat to Brazil for immediate delivery and accept strategic materials in payment over a period of one to two years.

While the Canadian Government appreciates being informed of this proposal, it finds it necessary to express grave concern regarding the use of an arrangement which is in essence a bilateral barter transaction. It is particularly disturbing at this time since Brazil has recently taken a number of important steps to reinstate multi-lateral trade practices. In fact, purchases of wheat by Brazil have been on an open tender basis for some time and traders of any country could make offers against such tenders. The Canadian Government, therefore, believes that to introduce a tied-bilateral type of barter arrangement can only be regarded as a retrograde step, away from the goal of non-discriminatory international trade which is the ultimate objective of the governments of both the United States and Canada.

It is considered that acceptance by the United States of this sort of operation will encourage potential buyers to refrain from normal commercial purchases in the hope that wheat will later be made available to them through some special type of arrangement. In short, such a development can hardly fail to affect the normal commercial markets of both United States and Canadian wheat.

In the agreed communiqué issued at the conclusion of the recent meeting of the United States-Canadian Joint Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, it was stated:

"The ministers of both countries recognized that if surpluses were to be disposed of without regard to the impact of normal trade, great damage might be done not only to the commerce of Canada and the United States but also to the world economy. The ministers reaffirmed that it is the continuing policy of their respective governments, in disposing of agricultural surpluses abroad, to consult with interested countries and not to interfere with normal commercial marketings. They stated that it is their settled intention that any extraordinary measures that might be adopted to reduce surpluses should result in greater consumption and should augment, and not displace, normal quantities of agricultural products entering into world trade." Ends.

JOINT UNITED STATES-CANADIAN COMMITTEE ON TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS — GATT

The wind seems to be blowing so strongly here against GATT at the present time that we still think it would be wise for the Canadian Government to make formal representations without delay, pointing out the importance we attach to the General Agreement.

2. We have had a further talk on this subject with Ray Vernon, Acting Director of the Office of Economic Defence and Trade Policy in the State Department, and are now in a position to provide a little more information about the way in which the State Department is reacting to the recommendation contained in the report of the Randall Commission.⁸⁸ Shortly after the report was submitted to the President, a tactical decision was taken in the State Department not to challenge the recommendations made by the majority of the Commission, but instead to concentrate on pointing out ambiguities and inadequacies in the recommendations and on interpreting them in as liberal as possible a way. In keeping with this decision, the State Department have circulated to other agencies a memorandum examining the recommendation on GATT.⁸⁹

3. They have argued that beneath the surface of the passage in the report on GATT lie two anxieties shared by congressional members of the Commission.

(a) The congressional members objected to United States participation in GATT under the present arrangements because of the lack of any clear delegation of power by Congress to the President which would authorize the Executive to carry out the obligations of a contracting party.

(b) Congressional members were also concerned over the possibility that the provisions of this international instrument might be altered to affect adversely the interests of the United States without the United States Government concurring in the alteration.

4. The State Department's memorandum points out that no recommendation was made by the Commission to meet the second difficulty and that the recommendation made with a view to removing the first objection is inadequate. Agreeing that the Executive should be explicitly authorized to carry out the responsibilities of a contracting party, the memorandum goes on to consider how far the powers vested in the President by the existing Trade Agreements Act constitute sufficient authorization. The conclusion is reached that, although the existing Act does grant to the Executive some of the authority it needs to participate fully in an effective international trade organization, other powers that would be necessary are not granted to it by the present Act. The memorandum then goes on to propose that, to fill this gap, the existing Trade Agreements Act should be substantially amended when it comes up for reconsideration by Congress this spring. We have not been able to learn what amendments are being proposed by the State Department to make the Trade Agreements Act serve as adequate authorization for United States participation in GATT.

5. From this you will see that State Department officials are struggling in the coils of an unwelcome and embarrassing recommendation. They, and others within the Administration who are convinced of the importance of GATT, will need all the help they can get if they are to prevent the recommendation in the Randall Commission's report from resulting in a presidential proposal to Congress which would seriously weaken the agreement. Vernon, therefore, very much hopes that you will see your way clear within the next few days to instruct us to deliver a note drawing attention to the uncertain meaning of the recommendation and expressing once again the interest of the Canadian Government in preserving the usefulness of the General Agreement. He particularly hopes that such a note might point out that nothing is said in the recommendation about the rules of commercial conduct that are incorporated in the agreement and might stress their value in the eyes of the Canadian Government. You will recall that this is the point on which we tried to focus attention, without much success, at the briefing which Randall gave on the 22 of January.

6. On the other hand, Vernon was somewhat apprehensive about relying on a discussion within the Joint Committee as a means of influencing opinion within the United States Administration on GATT. In the first place he thought there was still a possibility that the original timetable might be met and that the President's message to Congress on foreign economic policy might be completed by the 15 of March. Further, he said that the Secretary of Commerce was opposed to GATT and that the Secretary of the Treasury was skeptical about it, while the Secretary of State had shown very little interest. If this account of the attitude of United States Cabinet Ministers towards GATT is accurate, we are rather inclined to think that that might be a further reason for the Canadian side initiating a serious discussion of this issue when the Ministers meet. A statement, for example, by Mr. Howe of Canada's interest in GATT would certainly have some salutary effect.

7. Looking again at the problem in the light of the further information provided by Vernon, we are still disposed to stick to our original recommendation. We would revise it only to the extent of suggesting that it might be advisable to tone down a little the reference we proposed to the first meeting of the Joint Committee, since there seems to be more likelihood than we had thought when we despatched our telegram No. WA-277 of the 17 of February† that the President's message to Congress on foreign economic policy may have been completed before the Committee meets. We still think, though:

(a) that a note on GATT should be presented to the State Department within the next few days;

(b) that attention should be drawn to the obscurity of the recommendation in the report of the Randall Commission;

(c) that the importance attached by the Canadian Government to GATT should be reiterated;

(d) that the value of having an international code of commercial conduct should be emphasized;

(e) that questions should be asked about the views of the Administration on the future of GATT; and

(f) that it should be suggested that the meeting of officials in Ottawa on the 4 of March, and the meeting of Ministers in Washington on the 16 of March, would provide suitable opportunities for further discussion of this subject.

JOINT UNITED STATES-CANADIAN COMMITTEE ON TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS — GATT

Your message has been discussed inter-departmentally, and it has been agreed that a note should be presented to the State Department before the meeting with U.S. officials. Following is a draft note which is under consideration here. Its purpose is primarily to set the stage for a possible substantive discussion on the GATT on March 4th and on March 16th. We would intend that the note should be presented to the State Department on the afternoon of March 1. Meanwhile any comments you may care to make on the draft text would be welcome.

Text begins.

The Canadian Government has examined with interest the recommendations of the Commission of Foreign Economic Policy relating to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

In view of the close association of the United States and Canada in building up the General Agreement as an effective instrument for promoting satisfactory international trade relations, the Canadian Government would naturally regard with concern any course which might have the effect of weakening that Agreement. There appears to be some doubt about the meaning of certain of the recommendations of the Commission on this subject but the Canadian Government notes that they might be interpreted as contemplating a substantial curtailment of the scope of the General Agreement.

In this connection, the United States Government will be aware that a comprehensive review of the General Agreement is envisaged within the next few months. In this review, the role of the United States Government is likely to be decisive in setting an example to other principal trading countries throughout the world. In the judgement of the Canadian Government, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade has made a major contribution to world trade and to international relations in general by providing a code of commercial conduct which has been increasingly recognized by participating Governments in the formulation of current trade policy. It would be the hope of the Canadian Government that the result of the forthcoming review would be an improvement and strengthening of the commercial policy provisions of the Agreement. The present world situation would seem to favour a forward move in this constructive enterprise.

Since the provisions of the present General Agreement reflect a balancing of the diverse interests of many countries, any weakening of the Agreement would tend to start a process of disintegration the final consequences of which for the United States and Canada and for the conduct of international trade generally cannot be foreseen.

In view of the importance which the Canadian Government attaches to this subject, and in view of the uncertainty concerning the implications of these particular recommendations of the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy, it has seemed desirable that these observations should be brought to the attention of the United States Government at this stage. The Canadian Government would expect that an opportunity for a discussion of this subject would be provided by the meeting of the Joint U.S.-Canadian Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs on March 16 and by the preparatory meeting of officials on March 4. U.S.-CANADIAN JOINT COMMITTEE

Attached is a very rough first draft of a summary record of the discussion at the Joint Committee meeting.⁹¹ It is not intended to produce an agreed record with the U.S. Rather, the thought is that each side might let the other have its informal record for any comments or corrections which may seem desirable. Our record will not be sent along to the U.S. Joint Secretary until after it has been examined further by those who were present at the meeting on the Canadian side.

2. This summary record contains no mention of the reference by Mr. Dulles to the invitation from the Caracas meeting for Canada to participate in the activities of the Organization of American States.⁹² The reason for this omission is that it was not clear at the time that Mr. Dulles had, in fact, been instructed to extend such an invitation or that he meant his rather bantering reference to the subject to be taken seriously.

[Ottawa], March 18, 1954

Mr. Dulles opened the meeting by welcoming the Canadian Ministers and saying now important he thought the meetings of this Committee could be in assisting the United States and Canada to move in step in economic matters. He was sure that it would be desirable to keep the meeting as informal as possible in order that Ministers would feel free to say exactly what they had in their minds. He hoped that the conversation would be as frank and open as if they were sitting around chatting after dinner. In order that their talks might follow some pattern, he suggested that they might discuss the topics which seemed of interest to both sides in the following order:

⁹¹ Aucun autre compte rendu de cette réunion n'a été trouvé./No other record for this meeting was located.

- (a) the work of the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy;
- (b) progress on international trade and payments problems;
- (c) United States and Canadian agricultural policies and their relation to international trade;
- (d) methods of disposal of existing agricultural surpluses and those which may be expected to accumulate in the future.

2. In reply, Mr. Howe said how glad the Canadian Ministers were to have this opportunity to meet with their opposite numbers from the United States and how appreciative they were of the hospitality received from their U.S. hosts. He indicated that the agenda proposed by Mr. Dulles was quite agreeable to the Canadian side. He then made an introductory statement along somewhat the following lines indicating the main points which the Canadian Ministers had in mind in connection with the various subjects to be discussed.

*Agricultural Surpluses*⁹³

Mr. Howe recognized the problems created by the accumulation of large agricultural surpluses in recent years, particularly in the United States, but expressed the hope that whatever had to be done to deal with such surpluses would be done in a manner which would not have an upsetting effect on the economies of other countries throughout the world. He thought there was a real danger of setting off a world-wide depression if surpluses were to be released in a hasty or indiscriminate fashion.

In the case of wheat especially, he doubted that devices which had the effect of directly or indirectly lowering prices would result in any substantial increase in consumption or sales. He appreciated the willingness which the United States had shown to consult with Canada and other interested countries on disposals under Section 550 of the Mutual Security Act or under other special arrangements which the United States had contemplated from time to time.⁹⁴ In general, he was considerably worried by the proposals for selling wheat in return for local currencies, particularly if such sales were to be made to countries which are members of the International Wheat Agreement.

Mr. Howe observed that many of the existing agricultural surpluses may turn out to be temporary and the problems associated with them may disappear. To a considerable extent, the present surpluses are the result of exceptionally good harvests in the United States and elsewhere and of the fact that many consuming countries had been holding down their purchases from abroad by drawing on stocks. These factors would not continue to operate indefinitely, and it might well be that shortages would develop in some commodities where "burdensome" surpluses now exist.

Import Restrictions

Mr. Howe referred to the concern which was felt in Canada at the restrictions which the United States had imposed on goods coming in from other countries.⁹⁵ In addition to the economic consequences of such import restrictions, it should be recognized that these restrictions tend to have psychological effects abroad which may be out of proportion to the real importance of the trade affected. He referred to the pressures which were being experienced in Canada to curtail imports of U.S. products. When exports to the United States of such commodities as flaxseed, dairy products and oats were being restricted (and when there were rumours of impending restrictions on rye), it was hard for many Canadians to see why Canada should not in turn curtail trade in certain U.S. products. Referring particularly to the action which the Tariff Commission had recommended on rye imports, Mr. Howe wondered whether the effects of the relatively small shipments of Canadian rye into the United States could really be so serious that the U.S. Administration should run the risk of the kind of reaction which might be expected from Canada. He pointed out that only some $9 million seemed to be involved (that is, the difference between current imports of $12 million and the proposed limit of some $3 million). He doubted that the keeping out of this amount of imports from Canada would be worth the shock which the imposition of such a quota would give to the Canadian people.

International Trade and Payments Situation

Mr. Howe noted that Mr. Abbott would be saying more on this subject at a later stage. He himself was pleased to observe the progress which had been made in recent years. He regarded the Randall recommendations as constructive and felt that their adoption would speed up the process of improving the international trade and payments position.

Customs Administration and Simplification

Mr. Howe referred to the many difficulties, quite apart from the level of the tariff, which were being experienced by many Canadians who were selling — or trying to sell — in the United States market. He noted that the Jenkins Bill which was now before Congress would improve the situation considerably at least in respect of the method of valuing goods for customs purposes.⁹⁶

General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade

Mr. Howe referred to the forthcoming review of the provisions of this Agreement.⁹⁷ He hoped that in this international review countries would not endeavour to subtract from the obligations which they have undertaken to reduce barriers to trade. From his own experience at meetings of the Contracting Parties to the GATT, he knew what an important role the United States and Canada could play in giving a lead to other countries.

A problem of very great importance which would have to be faced fairly soon was that of absorbing Japan into the GATT. Mr. Howe remarked that, for its part, Canada was hoping to conclude an agreement with Japan within the next few days which would give Japanese trade the benefit of Canada's relatively low most-favoured-nation rates of duty.⁹⁸ He observed that the United States tariff on the types of goods exported by Japan was still very high, and he doubted that the tariff reduction authority envisaged in the Randall Report would be sufficient to permit of the kind of negotiations that would be required to enable Japan to come into the GATT effectively. He enquired whether, in addition to the tariff negotiating powers recommended by the Randall Commission, the U.S. Administration might seek to have the authority in the present Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act continued as well. Mr. Howe then indicated what a useful and businesslike mechanism the GATT had proven itself to be over the past several years. He considered it most important that the effectiveness of this agreement should not be weakened.

3. Mr. Dulles welcomed these general remarks from Mr. Howe which the members of the Committee would wish to have very much in mind in the subsequent discussion of the various topics which they were to consider. He suggested that the Joint Secretaries should give some thought to the lines which the press communiqué might take, and he proposed that they produce a draft over the noon hour which could be discussed at the end of the afternoon meeting. Mr. Dulles then proposed that the Committee should proceed to discuss the particular items on its agenda.

I. THE WORK OF THE COMMISSION ON FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY

4. Governor Adams described the character of the Randall Commission. He emphasized that it represented a cross-section of United States opinion.

5. Mr. Hauge, in commenting on the recommendations which had been made by the Commission, observed that they did not involve a "Repeal of the Corn Laws". The Commission had recognized that the process of developing a suitable commercial policy for the United States would have to be gradual and would involve a good deal a serious discussion in Congress and elsewhere. To a considerable extent, the first round of this discussion had taken place within the Commission. Other rounds would now have to follow.

6. Mr. Hauge stated that the tariff reduction authority proposed in the Randall Report was intended to replace the powers provided by any existing laws. It was recognized that, in those cases where the scope for tariff reductions under present legislation had not been exhausted, adoption of the Randall Recommendations might reduce rather than increase the President's authority to bring tariff rates down.

⁹⁸ Voir/See Document 815.

7. With reference to the Jenkins Bill, which contained important provisions relating to valuation and currency conversion for customs purposes, Mr. Hauge was fairly confident that this legislation would be enacted. In its further consideration of this measure, Congress would doubtless be influenced somewhat by the nature of the rest of the President's foreign economic programme. Mr. Hauge remarked on the rather surprising fact that some of the members of Congress who were most opposed to changes in tariff rates (e.g. Congressman Reed) were often very much in favour of improvements in customs practices.

8. Mr. Hauge described the Buy American Act as a hangover from depression days and felt that some action might be taken on it.

9. Concerning metals and minerals policy, Mr. Hauge indicated that the Randall Recommendations would be considered along with the Report of the President's Committee on Minerals Policy which is likely to be available later this month.

10. Regarding the observations in the Report on agricultural price supports, Mr. Hauge remarked that these recognized the connection between domestic policies and international trade. During recent years, the U.S. price support programme had tended to suck in imports from abroad in excessive amounts. In order to avoid undue interference with imports, and for other reasons, it was necessary to revise this programme. Mr. Hauge observed that, in those instances where the Randall Report was at variance with the President's agricultural message, the latter would govern.

11. On the subject of convertibility, Mr. Hauge remarked that the Randall Commission had not envisaged any "dash to the tape" and had emphasized the importance of having favourable conditions for any moves which might be made. He thought that, on balance, the Randall Commission had displayed a sympathetic attitude towards proposals for convertibility of the major currencies.

12. Mr. Hauge also referred to the recommendations in the Randall Report regarding investments and mentioned that a new lending policy for the Export-Import Bank had been announced at the Caracas meeting.

13. Concerning other recommendations of the Commission, Mr. Hauge observed that those relating to anti-trust matters, standards of labour, etc. would not require legislation, but could be given effect where appropriate by administrative action.

14. In summary, Mr. Hauge expected that the President's message would generally convert the recommendations in the Randall Report into requests for legislation. He thought that some seven or eight pieces of legislation would be required:

- (a) a Trade Agreements Act;
- (b) the Jenkins Bill on customs valuation, etc.
- (c) a measure authorizing the Administration to start work on customs simplification (including classifications);
- (d) amendments to the Buy American Act;
- (e) a Bill relating to metals and minerals (following the submission of the Report of the President's Committee);
- (f) certain tax measures which are already before Congress;
- (g) Foreign Aid legislation.

15. Governor Adams referred to the political factors affecting the President's foreign economic policy. He noted that the Republican Party had a tradition of protectionism dating back to the period of industrialization in the United States. He thought that this policy had served the country well during that period. This attitude was now undergoing a considerable change. He felt that this change was partly due to the increased influence of the farmer on the Republican Party. The interest of the agricultural producer in maintaining and increasing foreign markets was now being reflected in the Party's outlook. Governor Adams thought that most of the recommendations in the Randall Report could be legislated. In any event, every resource of the Administration will be used to bring recommendations on those lines into effect.

16. Mr. Howe remarked that the U.S. and Canadian members of the Committee seemed to think alike on the importance of the Randall recommendations. He was convinced that if those recommendations are carried out effectively it will represent a considerable step ahead.

17. Mr. Abbott then enquired concerning the timetable for action on the President's foreign economic programme.

18. Governor Adams replied that the President's recommendations would probably go to Congress this week. The House of Representatives should be able to take them up in a matter of some four to six weeks. The Senate might be somewhat slower in starting action as it has a pretty full calendar already. Governor Adams was hopeful that action could be taken during this Congress on all of the foreign economic measures to be submitted by the Administration.

19. Mr. Pearson said that he would like to hear rather more of the plans of the Administration relating to the GATT. The Canadian Government was impressed with the important part which this Agreement had already played in international economic relations and felt that its role would be increasingly important with the sharpening of competition among countries which was now taking place. Mr. Pearson considered that, from the point of view of its general relations with other countries, the United States might find it very desirable to have an international agreement and an international forum of the kind now represented by the GATT. Mr. Howe referred to the remarks which he had made earlier on this subject and said that it would be useful to know what the intentions of the U.S. Administration were.

20. Mr. Hauge recalled the apprehension which had found expression in Congress on numerous occasions in the recent past (especially in connection with the Bricker Amendment) concerning the respective powers of the Administration and Congress relating to international commitments. The general position of the Randall Commission (and apparently of the Administration) was that:

- (a) multilateral trade negotiations and agreements are still necessary;
- (b) some internationally-accepted rules are also required to protect concessions secured under such agreements;
- (c) no executive agreements in this field should be so broad as to cover any subject matter on which the President's rights are questionable;

(d) during the course of an agreement there should be no change in the rights or obligations of the United States without the concurrence of the U.S. Government;

(e) multilateral trade agreements involving tariff rates should not have to go to Congress. (Mr. Hauge emphasized that no member of the Commission had wanted rate setting to be performed by Congress);

(f) in the agricultural field, there was no prospect of getting away from Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. (Mr. Hauge referred to this as a "sticking point");⁹⁹

(h) certain aspects of the rules in the GATT (especially those relating to limitations on state trading, the use of export controls, etc.) were clearly in the interests of the United States.

21. Governor Adams observed that the President's recommendations will be aimed at carrying out the spirit if not the letter of the Randall Report.

22. Mr. Weeks remarked that the incorporation in a statute of some basic standards and procedures would make it a little easier to secure acceptance of the President's programme. Mr. Hauge agreed with this view and noted that, if action on the lines now contemplated were to be taken, the opponents of the President's objectives would at least be deprived of procedural grounds for criticizing the programme.

23. Mr. Pearson asked whether in the forthcoming negotiations on the GATT the U.S. Government was likely to seek a relaxation of the agricultural provisions affecting the United States and a tightening up of the balance of payments provisions affecting other countries.

24. Mr. Hauge said that no change was envisaged in Section 22 of the A.A.A. It had been difficult enough to limit Congress last year to amendments which permitted action by the Administration against agricultural imports prior to the receipt of the Tariff Commission's recommendations in particular cases. So far this power had not been used. He could not imagine Congress weakening the obligations imposed on the President by the present version of Section 22. This situation would have an effect on the attitude of the United States in any GATT discussions.

25. Mr. Howe referred back to the question of Japan and asked whether there was anything in the proposed legislation which would make it possible to bring Japan into the GATT.

26. Mr. Hauge expressed the view that the authority which would be sought by the President would generally constitute enough to warrant another round of tariff negotiations. He recognized, however, that Japan presented special problems. In the Randall Report there was no thought of making an exception of Japan. If anything were now to be done in that direction, it would presumably be on the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

27. Mr. Dulles observed that the Japanese economy had been artificially supported for sometime and that, with the cessation of the Korean war, the economic outlook for Japan was rather dismal. He attributed Japan's economic difficulties in part to the lack of any austerity programme of her own. He referred to the possible easing of restrictions on trade with Communist China, but felt that the potentialities of this trade were not very substantial. He considered that some developments in southeast Asia (including those in Indo-China, Malaya and Indonesia) might add to the economic dangers confronting Japan since the countries in that area constitute important sources of supply and important markets for the Japanese economy. He did not think, however, that the fall of Southeast Asia should be assumed or that calculations should be made on that basis. There appeared to be substantial possibilities of increasing trade with such countries as the Philippines, Malaya and so on, and these might be adequate if the channels of trade could be re-opened. In this connection, he noted the strong anti-Japanese sentiment in some of these countries and the claims which some of them were pressing on Japan for reparations. These considerations complicated the prospect considerably. He did not think that the United States was a proper market in the long term for Japan. Neither did he think that Japan should draw a large proportion of its supplies of raw materials from the United States. In the long term, Japanese exporters would have to depend on markets in the populous areas where low quality goods were required and were much in demand. Similarly, Japan might be expected to seek sources of supply in that part of the world.

28. Mr. Dulles emphasized that it would be a major disaster affecting the whole position in the Pacific if Japan were to fall under Communist control. He recognized that special measures of a temporary character might have to be taken to keep this from happening. He was aware that the facilities under the Randall recommendations would not go very far to ease trading conditions for the Japanese. Japan might have to be dealt with as a special case.

Metals and Minerals

29. Mr. Howe suggested that this subject might be given particular attention in connection with the first agenda item.¹⁰⁰ It was one to which great importance was attached in Canada. Canadian producers had been dissatisfied on many occasions at finding themselves in the position of "marginal suppliers" to the United States. He would hope that sources in Canada could be treated on the same basis (except, of course, for customs duties) as sources in the United States. He referred particularly to the case of aluminum. He indicated also that there were certain matters relating to the nickel position which he might discuss separately with those concerned.

30. Mr. Weeks said that there was every disposition in the U.S. Administration to look on Canada and the United States as more or less one package in any discussions on metals and minerals. He referred to the Cabinet level committee which was considering these matters and observed that, in the case of aluminum, it had been decided to regard Canada and the United States as one unit for practical purposes. Where the United States had to go abroad for metals and minerals, he was confident that first thought would be given to Canada. He assumed that the United States would find a reciprocal attitude in Canada. If the United States were to depend on Canada, he assumed that the United States would find a reciprocal attitude in Canada. If the United States were to depend on Canada, he assumed that Canada would be a dependable source of supply. At an earlier stage in the discussion, Mr. Dulles had also referred to the dependence on Canada as a source of critical materials and had said that he thought the United States should not attempt to duplicate sources of supply which already existed in Canada. He would expect that, in turn, Canada would be able to give some assurance about the availability of such supplies in an emergency. Mr. Howe felt that the United States could be assured that Canadian supplies would be available when needed, and he referred to the experience of the second World War and of the Korean conflict which had shown the kind of co-operation of which Canada was capable.

31. In commenting on the observations by Mr. Weeks, Mr. Abbott thought that if the United States wished to count on Canadian supplies she would have to do more than look to them only on those occasions when she found it necessary to go abroad for supplies. He thought that Canadian suppliers should have a fair crack at the United States market at all times. Mr. Pearson remarked that what the United States apparently wanted was an assurance of the availability of Canadian supplies in times of emergency. What Canada wanted was an assurance of the availability of the United States market in times of non-emergency.

32. Mr. Weeks thought that Canadian suppliers were being given opportunities in the United States market and referred in particular to a letter which had been sent to the Bureau of the Budget requesting the suspension of the $400 a ton duty on copper for a further two years. He remarked that the position with respect to lead and zinc was more difficult. Mr. Weeks also referred to proposals which had apparently been made by the United Kingdom that nickel might be removed from the list of controlled materials and might be allowed to enter into East-West trade.

33. Mr. Dulles mentioned that, if Canada considered itself a marginal supplier, he had gathered from his conversations in Caracas that many Latin American countries considered themselves in an even more marginal position.

34. Mr. Weeks reported that the stockpiling programme of the United States was being revised and new targets were being considered which, if adopted, would substantially increase some of the goals. He thought this development should be encouraging to Canada. He mentioned particularly that the goal for copper would be raised very considerably.

35. Mr. Howe observed that one of the points involved in the nickel problem was that such large quantities were being ordered into stockpile that stainless steel production and other commercial uses were being curtailed. From the viewpoint of the longer term prospect for nickel, he hoped that the stockpiling of this metal might be slowed down.

II. PROGRESS ON INTERNATIONAL TRADE AND PAYMENTS PROBLEMS

36. Mr. Abbott said that he had been encouraged by the remarks of Governor Adams and Mr. Hauge concerning the Administration's intentions. While the recommendations of the Randall Commission and the Administration's foreign economic policy programme might be regarded as modest, they did represent a move forward. Mr. Abbott thought it important that the economic policies of the United States should be suited to that country's position as the world's most powerful creditor.

37. Mr. Abbott then remarked on the difference in attitude and determination which he had detected over the past seven years at the various international meetings which he had attended where trade and financial policies had been discussed, including the successive meetings of Commonwealth Finance Ministers.¹⁰¹ He felt that up until about two years ago declarations of support for the objectives of convertibility and freer trade and payments had been lacking in conviction or enthusiasm. He thought that this was not so today. Mr. Butler, in particular, seemed to be genuinely committed to this objective. It should be appreciated, however, that even Mr. Butler would not find this an easy path. On the one hand, there were very substantial groups in the United Kingdom who favoured a type of planned economy which appeared to require a continuation of prohibitions, quotas, exchange restrictions and other controls. On the other hand, and within Mr. Butler's own Party, there was a fairly large element which favoured a strengthening of "Imperial" trading relationships at the expense of any larger trading system. Mr. Butler has so far been able to gain rather widespread acceptance of his policies and objectives, primarily for the reason that those policies are apparently getting results. Not only in the United Kingdom but also in the other Sterling Area countries, there seemed to be a greater willingness than in the past to proceed towards a freer system of trade and payments. Some at least of those countries were overcoming their earlier worries about the risks involved in freeing exchange rates and about the "dangers" from sharper competition.

38. Mr. Abbott saw no economic reason why non-resident Sterling could not be made convertible now. He observed that the time when a thing is done may be as important as the thing itself. In this particular case, one very good reason for acting soon would seem to be that, once restrictions have been removed, they are unlikely to be restored. Clearly, the decision as to when a move should be made has to be taken by the governments which bear responsibility for the currencies concerned. There was a lot to be said, however, for encouragement from other countries which shared this objective. Mr. Abbott felt that such encouragement would be supplied by effective action on the Randall recommendations (including the recommendation that an adequate amount of the Fund's resources be made available and that some stand-by credits be provided through the Federal Reserve system). Mr. Abbott repeated that he thought there was a real danger of the present opportunities being lost if advantage is not taken of them now. If this chance is missed, the political and economic relations among the countries of the West may be subjected to very serious strains.

¹⁰¹ Voir/See Document 385.

39. Mr. Dulles recalled that at the time of the Eden-Butler visit to Washington, the "collective approach" was regarded as premature. If convertibility was to be attempted, it was important that the underlying conditions should be satisfactory.

40. Mr. Abbott remarked that in the interval since that visit a good number of the countries involved have taken important steps to put their houses in order.

41. Mr. Humphrey expressed his general agreement with Mr. Abbott's views and said that the undertaking of a convertibility operation for sterling had now about reached the point where the only remaining questions related to timing and details. He thought Mr. Butler understood very well that, whenever the United Kingdom was prepared to move, it would receive a sympathetic response from Washington. Mr. Humphrey felt that, when the Sterling Area is prepared to go ahead, North America should be ready to come in to support them. He thought that they were holding back at the moment in order to see what was going to happen to the United States economy. Meanwhile, the United Kingdom in particular was taking gradual, but not unimportant, steps in the direction of convertibility. He referred particularly to the opening of various commodity markets.

42. On the question of financial support, Mr. Humphrey indicated that the United States would be prepared to have the Fund drawn on; provided that was done in a manner which would not start a run on the Fund. He thought that the Fund might yield something like $2 to 2 1/2 billion for this purpose. If some supplement was necessary, the questions which Mr. Humphrey would wish to consider are: how large would that supplement have to be; should it be provided by the United States and Canada acting jointly; and how would the pooled resources be controlled? Mr. Butler had spoken of a scheme of sliding scales, but Mr. Humphrey seemed to be doubtful about this proposition and suggested that more effective sanctions would be required.

43. Mr. Abbott stated that the Canadian dollars at the disposal of the Fund could probably also be used to bolster Sterling convertibility.

44. Mr. Abbott noted the relationship between the European Payments Union and any action to make Sterling convertible. He pointed out that the EPU had been intended as a transitional arrangement, and he thought that it should still be regarded as such. He hoped that the members of EPU would not defer convertibility until the weakest participant was prepared to go along. He observed that the EPU was already undergoing certain strains and stresses as a result of the different payments positions of the various members.

45. Mr. Humphrey then expressed the view that the time when the United Kingdom might decide to undertake convertibility could very well be close at hand. If the United Kingdom was confident that U.S. trade policies would not move back and if it was satisfied that the United States economy was not going to decline, it might decide to embark on this course in a matter of months.

46. Mr. Hauge said he thought it fortunate that a tendency had developed on the part of the pessimists in Europe and the Sterling Area during the past couple of years to refer back to 1949 and to take the conditions of that year as representative of what could be expected of the United States in a recession. Those pessimists were now somewhat at a loss and might become somewhat discredited, since this time there has been only a very slight decline in commodity prices and in the earnings of the Sterling Area despite a fall of some ten per cent in the production index.

47. Mr. Weeks then asked Mr. Abbott what the prospects were for an eventual "washing out" of imperial preferences. Mr. Abbott remarked that this might happen eventually, although — as in the case of any liberal U.S. commercial policies — the reduction of preferences was a plant of rather slow growth. In any event, he thought there was no likelihood of an increase in preferences.

III. UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN AGRICULTURAL POLICIES AND THEIR RELATIONS TO INTERNATIONAL TRADE

48. Mr. Benson began his description of the new agricultural programme of the United States by recognizing the importance for both countries of maintaining opportunities to export agricultural products. He said that the U.S. Administration was fully aware of the need to have regard for the interests of other countries, if only for the reason that those countries were actually or potentially major markets for the products of the United States. The farmers of the United States were substantially interested in international trade policies generally since they were faced with so many restrictions at present on their trade abroad.

49. Mr. Benson then outlined the agricultural programme. He declared the aims of that programme to be:

(a) the achievement of more flexibility in price supports, while at the same time maintaining a rather firm floor;

(b) the expansion of outlets for U.S. agricultural products at home and abroad;

(c) the encouragement of better balanced production by permitting effective demand to exercise a greater influence; and

(d) the improvement of farm management.

50. Mr. Benson referred briefly to the present surplus problem noting that the increased borrowing authority proposed for the Commodity Credit Corporation was no more than enough to take it through the coming year and declaring that the Administration had been able to find no alternative to the "setting aside" of a substantial part of the existing CCC stocks with a view to insulating them from commercial markets.

51. Mr. Benson stressed the thoroughness of the preparations and country-wide discussions which had preceded the formulation of the new agricultural programme. Concerning the Congressional prospects for this programme, he was hopeful that Congress would take the necessary action. He observed that, even if no legislation were to be passed, the major part of the programme could be brought into effect, since, in the absence of specific legislation to the contrary, the earlier legislation which contained some elements of the new programme would become operative automatically. With respect to Section 22 of the AAA, Mr. Benson reported that there was considerable sentiment in Congress for the re-enactment of something along the lines of the compulsory restrictions of Section 104 of the Defence Production Act.¹⁰² He indicated that he did not himself favour this course since he thought that Section 22 could be effective. He hoped and guessed that new restrictive legislation would not be passed by this Congress.

52. Mr. Benson then referred briefly to the rye situation.

(The meeting adjourned at this stage in order to allow the members of the Committee to attend a luncheon which President Eisenhower was giving at the White House.)

53. Mr. Benson described the present stock position for rye, noted that the anticipated carry-over was likely to be very large, and observed that current production was expected to increase as a result particularly of the diversion of land from other crops to rye following on the acreage reductions imposed on those other crops. In these circumstances, he was convinced that the Administration had no alternative but to refer the case to the Tariff Commission. In this connection, he understood that Canada had been consulted and had indicated that it would not object to some action on rye.

54. Mr. Howe interjected at this point that what he had said when this matter was mentioned to him in Ottawa last December was that he would not take a complaint about rye to the GATT, but he did not intend to imply that Canada would have no objections to restrictions on rye.¹⁰³ He observed that there could scarcely be any "peril" involved for the U.S. in admitting the quantities of rye which were now coming in from Canada. While these quantities fluctuated considerably and might have been fairly high in the past twelve months, they were relatively insignificant in comparison with the total trade in grains within the United States. Mr. Howe reminded Mr. Benson that there were substantial pressures in Canada for import restrictions on certain U.S. products. He mentioned particularly textiles, refrigerators and fruits and vegetables. These pressures would be particularly difficult to resist if the U.S. appeared to be acting against Canadian goods when no substantial injury was being done to U.S. interests. He asked whether it was worth encouraging these pressures for a mere $9 million. He added that the present situation was probably temporary, whereas there was a tendency for any quotas which might be imposed as a remedial measure to become permanent (as appears to have happened in cases such as flaxseed and wheat). Whatever the intention may be when such quotas are imposed, it had to be recognized that there are great political difficulties in withdrawing such quotas especially if a terminal date is not specified in advance.

55. Mr. Hauge said it was true that the Tariff Commission does not tend to confine its recommendations to a set period. Their position is that they cannot judge whether the proposed remedies would be effective within a particular time. The President, however, in acting on the Tariff Commission's recommendations, may specify a definite and limited period of time if that seems warranted.

56. Mr. Howe stated that restrictions on rye would not be as objectionable if they were made applicable for only a short period. He hoped that, in cases such as these, the U.S. would recognize the value of having informal consultations with Canada before taking any action. He noted that where there had been such consultations (e.g. in the case of oats) it had proved possible to work out arrangements which were less objectionable than direct action by the U.S. (Mr. Dulles remarked that while in Caracas he received rather vigorous complaints from the Argentine Minister of Foreign Affairs who alleged that the United States had acted illegally in this instance).

57. Mr. Howe remarked that wherever restrictions on trade were unavoidable, it was desirable that they should take the form which would do the least damage and be least likely to provoke unfortunate reactions. He referred again to the position of U.S. fruits and vegetables in the Canadian market. At this point, Mr. Benson enquired whether Canada was not already restricting imports of U.S. fruits and vegetables. Mr. Howe replied that what was being done at present represented a generally accepted practice and merely involved certain seasonal tariff increases for short periods in the year. Mr. Abbott added that it would be a mistake to think of this very moderate protection as the limit to which Canadian restrictions on fruits and vegetables might go if the pressures became extreme as a result of U.S. treatment of Canadian products. He recalled that restrictions of quite a different order had been imposed by Canada during part of the period of exchange control and remarked that those restrictions had been felt not only by Canadian consumers but also be producers and traders in fruits and vegetables all over the United States.

IV. METHODS OF DISPOSAL OF EXISTING AGRICULTURAL SURPLUSES AND THOSE WHICH MAY BE EXPECTED TO ACCUMULATE IN THE FUTURE

58. Referring more particularly to the plans of the Administration for disposing of some of the present agricultural surpluses, Mr. Benson re-iterated that it was the intention of the U.S. Government not to affect normal marketings.

59. Mr. Howe welcomed this re-affirmation of U.S. policy in this matter. He thought, however, that recent developments had shown the difficulty of carrying through disposal operations on special terms without disturbing ordinary commercial sales. In the case of Japan, it had proved possible to work out certain arrangements, and Canada would now have no objection to the United States going ahead with its projected deal in wheat and barley with that country.¹⁰⁴ Reported proposals for sales of wheat to Spain in return for local currency seemed considerably more unsatisfactory. While Canada had normally only a relatively small place in the Spanish market, Australia and some other countries had traditionally sold substantial quantities to Spain. In Mr. Howe's view, the most worrying proposal of which he had heard was that for a special deal with Western Germany. This proposed transaction with a member of the International Wheat Agreement could have a very upsetting effect on Canadian sales and on those of other wheat producing countries.

60. Mr. Benson explained that the arrangements with Spain had been made in order to permit of the financing of the local costs of airfields and other military facilities in that country. With respect to the proposal for West Germany, Mr. Benson's understanding was that no deal had yet been completed. Mr. Benson then went on to point out that the sales of the United States outside the International Wheat Agreement had been extremely limited, while Canadian sales had been increasing.

¹⁰⁴ Voir/See Document 817.

61. Mr. Howe observed that Canada's portion of the world wheat trade appeared to be about the same this year as last. Canada had sold very little outside the I.W.A. except to our traditional market in the U.K. In part, the maintenance of Canadian sales was due to the fact that importing countries required a certain proportion of high protein wheat to mix with the quantities of soft wheat which they were securing from other sources. Any decline in the U.S. share of the world market would appear to have benefitted Argentina and certain other producers rather than Canada.

62. Mr. Benson noted that, if wheat prices in the United States reached a more reasonable level as a result of the Administration's agricultural programme, a good deal of the excessive wheat acreage in the eastern part of the United States might go out of production.

63. Governor Adams reminded the Committee that the surplus problem had been with the Eisenhower Administration since the beginning. In fact, it had existed previously. In these circumstances, it could hardly be said that the present Administration had not moved slowly and carefully. Governor Adams emphasized, however, that the U.S. Government would be moving more aggressively in promoting sales of agricultural products abroad in the immediate future. While the size of present surpluses might be at the basis of some of the concern which was evident throughout the United States, the Administration was more worried about the deterioration of some of the stocks and about the high storage charges (of rather more than half a million dollars a day) involved in holding present stocks. The Administration still proposed to move carefully and in consultation with other interested Governments, but effective action would have to be taken. In this connection, he referred to the establishment of an inter-agency committee on this subject within the U.S. Administration including participants from the Department of Agriculture, the State Department, the Foreign Operations Administration, the Bureau of the Budget, and the Department of Defence. Governor Adams also mentioned that Mr. Clarence Francis of General Foods had been appointed with particular responsibility for organizing the sale and disposal of U.S. agricultural products. Mr. Francis was not moving impetuously. He had decided to carry through a sixty or ninety day study before making up his mind on the right course of action. Upon the completion of this study and after consultation with the U.S. agencies concerned, Mr. Francis will present a report to the President. Governor Adams thought there would probably then be consultation with the various countries concerned.

64. Governor Adams thought there was considerable scope for useful disposal of agricultural surpluses within the United States and that these possibilities had not yet been exhausted.

65. Mr. Howe noted that there was some uneasiness in Canada about present Canadian surpluses. In the case of butter, the quantity involved was already very substantial, and in the case of wheat Canada's surplus was about $\frac{3}{4}$ as large as that of the United States. In connection with the latter figure, it was to be appreciated that the domestic market in Canada was only a fraction of the size of the large U.S. home market.

66. Mr. Benson also expressed the view that there was a good possibility of bringing about a long term increase in the feeding of wheat to livestock and poultry, etc.

67. Governor Adams declared that in the handling of its surpluses, particularly wheat, the United States would avoid undue price cutting. Mr. Benson added that there was no disposition on the part of the United States to disrupt markets by dumping or anything like that. Price-cutting would be as injurious to the United States as to Canada.

68. Mr. Abbott returned to the point made earlier about the real possibility of a decline in wheat and related prices (including rice prices) setting off a world-wide depression.

69. Mr. Benson referred to the trade missions which the United States would be sending off shortly to Latin America, Europe and the Far East. When asked whether these missions would be working out special deals for local currencies, etc., Mr. Benson replied that the missions themselves would not be able to make any particular offers.

70. There was then some brief discussion on the possibilities of increasing consumption of wheat abroad by changes in diet, methods of cooking, etc. It was generally felt that a reduction in the price of wheat would not greatly increase total consumption.

71. Mr. Howe felt that there were advantages in viewing the disposal of existing wheat surpluses as a North American problem. He thought it would be in the general interest if those concerned with the difficulties involved were to talk them over. He mentioned that, if worries developed about price trends, there might usefully be some discussion on that subject. He referred to the recent occasion when Canada had informed the United States in advance of its intention to equalize the prices for wheat from eastern and western Canadian ports. He hoped that both countries would keep out of the "give-away" field and that they would, so far as possible, handle their wheat on a commercial basis.

72. Mr. Benson was sure that the U.S. authorities would be glad to keep closely in touch with their Canadian opposite numbers. He then asked what the views of Canadian Ministers were on the dairy situation.

73. Mr. Howe observed that Canada was not as worried about perishables as it was about wheat and some other commodities. Mr. Abbott added that, of course, some other countries were very acutely interested in the international trade in dairy products.

74. Mr. Benson reported that there was some pressure from U.S. cheese producers concerning recent importations of Canadian cheese.

75. Mr. Gardiner thought that the quantities of Canadian cheese entering the United States were not very substantial. He then described the various informal devices which were used in Canada to encourage or discourage the production of particular agricultural products. He indicated that the consultations among the Federal and Provincial authorities and the agricultural groups in Canada in 1942 (accompanied by certain payment arrangements) had been effective in curtailing the production of wheat and that consultations in the subsequent period had been successful in restoring production, although the acreage had been kept below the level of 1942. Mr. Gardiner then referred to the importance of the trade between Canada and the United States in certain commodities. He noted that in the case of potatoes Canada now buys almost as large a quantity from the United States as it sells to the U.S. market. Mr. Gardiner emphasized the continuing importance for Canada of sales of cattle to the United States. Apples also were a commodity which depended almost entirely on the existence of a United States market. Since Canadian farmers had been fairly well persuaded to reduce their production of perishable foodstuffs, Canada's interest in export markets for these products was not substantial, and the Canadian Government would be prepared to discuss particular cases with the United States authorities.

76. Mr. Howe observed in general that, if the flow of agricultural products in one direction across the Border was to be curtailed, it was very likely that the flow the other way would also be disturbed. It was not conceivable that the United States could add brick upon brick to the wall on its side without interrupting the flow of trade in both directions. Mr. Howe hoped that the Administration would do its best to avoid using Section 22 or restricting imports in other ways.

77. Governor Adams observed that the future actions of the Administration depended very much on the success achieved in getting acceptance of the President's whole foreign economic policy programme.

78. Mr. Dulles concluded by saying how important the new Administration had regarded the original conversations on economic policies with Mr. Eden and Mr. Butler. While the United States might not be as mature in economic affairs as in political and military matters, Mr. Dulles indicated that this should not be taken as reflecting any lack of recognition of the vital importance of economic relations.

79. The Committee then proceeded to discuss the draft communiqué.¹⁰⁵

82. At the conclusion of the meeting, various Ministers expressed their satisfaction with the discussions which had taken place.

83. As Mr. Abbott indicated in the course of the meeting, the Canadian position paper† on trade and payments was left behind with the U.S. Joint Secretary for circulation to the U.S. members of the Committee. With Mr. Howe's concurrence, the position paper† on metals and minerals and the memorandum on rye were also given to the U.S. Joint Secretary for circulation to the U.S. Ministers with the summary record of the meeting. A copy of the memorandum on rye is attached. Copies of the other two papers were included in the documentation for the meeting.

Washington, March 31, 1954

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

As you know, action has just been taken by this Government limiting the importation of rye into the United States. Since this measure so largely concerns your country, I want you to know that under existing law there was no alternative for me but to approve the unanimous findings and recommendations of the United States Tariff Commission in this matter.

I approved this course of action reluctantly, not only because of my own determination to work for freer rather than more restricted trade, but more especially because the action affects Canada, our staunch friend and valued customer. In order to minimize the need in the future for this type of measure, I am seeking from the Congress authority to remove some of the rigidities from our agricultural program and to advance further the cause of liberal commercial policy.

I was glad, however, to adopt the suggestion put forth informally by your Minister of Trade and Commerce and Defense Production at the recent economic and trade talks in Washington that if any quota action on rye were taken, it be limited in time.¹⁰⁶ The action just taken is limited to the period ending with the next full marketing year, June 30, 1955.

I was happy to have the opportunity to visit with your Ministers when they were here recently. The discussions were highly rewarding from our point of view and I believe the Canadian representatives felt likewise. I am certain that visits of that kind between old friends on a continuing basis will reinforce the strong ties that now bind us together. It is in that spirit that I am dispatching these personal lines to you.

Sincerely,

DWIGHT EISENHOWER

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

GROUNDFISH FILLETS

Cabinet has now approved a note on groundfish fillets which is reproduced below. I should be grateful if you could arrange to have this note presented to the State Department at a high level as soon as possible, preferably this afternoon. You should also ensure that a copy of this note reaches a senior officer (possibly Governor Adams) at the White House. It would be desirable for you to keep in touch with Mr. Mitchell Sharp in connection with these representations:

2. Following is the text of the note:

The Canadian Ambassador presents his compliments to the Secretary of State and has the honour to refer to the recently completed investigation by the U.S. Tariff Commission into the trade in groundfish fillets.

2. The Canadian Government has been informed that the majority of those members of the Tariff Commission who were present during the preparation of the report have now recommended certain tariff and quota actions against imports of groundfish fillets from Canada and other countries. Under the terms of the Agreement governing trade relations between the United States and Canada, the Canadian Government would, of course, expect to be consulted well in advance of any final decision if it were intended to implement these recommendations. Meanwhile, the Canadian Government desires to submit its views on certain aspects of this subject to the United States authorities.

3. The Secretary of State will recall that a note was presented by the Canadian Ambassador on July 20, 1953 pointing out that exports from Canada of groundfish fillets are of traditional importance to Canadian trade with the United States and stressing that restrictions on imports of this commodity would have serious consequences not only for trade but for other aspects of relationship between the two countries.

4. In re-affirming the view expressed in that note, the Canadian Government wishes to draw to the attention of the Secretary of State certain special features of the long-standing cooperative arrangements existing between Canada and the United States with regard to the fishing industries. These arrangements are indeed of a unique character. The two countries acting jointly have led the world in fisheries conservation and have established numerous commissions on both coasts to develop and protect the stocks of fish.

5. The long-established history of joint conservation in certain Pacific waters, because of the intermingling of stocks and fishing operations, has made it scarcely practicable to segregate the operations and administration of the two countries' fisheries in that area; a fact which is clearly asserted and recognized in the international fisheries treaty between Canada, the U.S. and Japan. On the Pacific coast special port privileges are granted by each country to the other and U.S. vessels are permitted to land fish in bond at Prince Rupert and ship it direct to the mid-west markets of the U.S. Unrestricted passage through British Columbia coastal waters has always been granted the U.S. fishing fleets moving between the State of Washington and Alaska. U.S. vessels have been permitted to fish in Hecate Straits between the Queen Charlotte Islands and the mainland coast of British Columbia.

6. On the Atlantic coast as well there is a degree of cooperation not equalled elsewhere in the world. U.S. fisherman are given privileges accorded no others in Newfoundland, the Magdalen Islands and along the Labrador coast. Since 1888 Canada has unilaterally given United States fisherman additional privileges in Atlantic ports not enjoyed by fishermen of other countries.

7. Artificial interference with the marketing of fish would not seem to be consistent with the purposes of these joint conservation activities.

8. The tariff treatment of groundfish fillets has long been the subject of negotiation and agreement between the U.S. and Canada. The present rates of duty have been in force for many years. They were established in the trade agreement of 1938 and were subsequently incorporated in the tariff schedules to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Those rates along with the other GATT tariff rates continue to be bound.

9. The trade which has taken place in these products under these long-standing arrangements has contributed significantly to the development of sound economic relations between the U.S. and Canada. The fisheries of the Canadian Atlantic Coast have been adapted to meet the requirements of this trade and have become heavily dependent on it. This is particularly true of Newfoundland. The implementation of the recommendations of the Tariff Commission would result in damage and disorganization of the industry in these sections of Canada, which have to rely on this trade for much of their livelihood.

10. The trade in groundfish fillets is governed by the general undertaking in GATT not to impose quantitative restrictions or to take similar measures except in very extraordinary circumstances when "as a result of unforeseen developments and of the effect of the obligations incurred by a contracting party . . ." the product is being imported "in such increased quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers . . . of like or directly competitive products."

11. The Canadian Government thinks it necessary to place on record that it is not satisfied that the actions now proposed by the Tariff Commission are in keeping with the requirements of the "escape clause" of GATT referred to in the preceding paragraph. It questions whether an examination of all relevant factors would justify the conclusion that the traditional customs treatment of these products has resulted in imports in quantities which cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers. It appears to the Canadian Government that any difficulties which the industry in the U.S. has been experiencing during the past few years are more correctly attributable to numerous complex circumstances including interruptions of activity in the industry and the necessity for the fishing fleet to go farther and farther afield as nearby fishing grounds have become depleted. So far as the effects of imports are concerned, however, sections of the industry in the U.S. have in fact benefitted substantially from the availability of imported raw materials.

12. It is assumed that the President will take into account not only all the factors affecting the position of the domestic industry but also the international obligations of the U.S., the importance of relations with the areas involved outside the U.S. and the particularly close cooperation which exists between the United States and Canadian fishing industries. The Canadian Government recalls that the United States and Canadian members of the Joint Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs at their first meeting, after noting that the flow of trade between Canada and the United States is greater than that between any other two countries, agreed on "the desirability of avoiding any action which would interfere with this trade from which the two countries derive such great benefits."

13. The trade in groundfish fillets is not only important in itself but is also widely regarded in Canada, in the light of the various considerations referred to in this note, as exemplifying the economic cooperation from which both countries have derived such substantial benefits. Consequently, the United States Government will be aware that any restrictions on this trade would have repercussions which would inevitably extend beyond this particular field and which would have an undesirable effect on relations between Canada and the United States. The Canadian Government expects it would be afforded a full opportunity for consultation on this matter, as provided in our trade agreement, if there is any likelihood that the recommendations of the Tariff Commission may be implemented, but is confident that the President will not take the actions recommended by the Commission after these have been reviewed in the light of the wider considerations involved.

RECENT RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

This morning Mitchell Sharp, accompanied by LePan, called on Gabriel Hauge, Administrative Assistant to the President for Economic Affairs, to discuss with him recent recommendations by the United States Tariff Commission of interest to Canada. Sharp explained that he was in Washington primarily to confer with officials of the United States Department of Agriculture about the marketing of wheat and feed grains; but, in addition, he had been instructed by Mr. Howe to express to officials in the White House the grave concern felt in Ottawa about the recommendations for increased protection for groundfish fillets, lead and zinc, and alsike clover seed, and to outline some of the consequences if these recommendations were accepted by the President. Since the Canadian Government had not yet had time to give careful thought to the implications of the recommendations on lead and zinc and alsike clover, most of his remarks would apply particularly to the recommendations on groundfish fillets.

2. Sharp made it clear that very serious injury would be done to the fishing industry in Canada, and particularly in Newfoundland and the Maritime Provinces, if the recommendations for import quotas and higher rates of duty were adopted. He referred to the efforts that have recently been made to modernize fishing operations in Newfoundland, and said that they would be dealt an almost mortal blow if the growing market in the United States for frozen fillets was curtailed by Presidential action pursuant to the recommendations.

3. The Canadian Government, he went on, had been disturbed by United States action to limit imports of oats¹⁰⁷ and rye. But it was realized in Canada, as well as in the United States, that there were special problems involved in agricultural production and that, so long as agricultural prices were maintained at artificially high levels by price supports, some limitation of imports might become almost inevitable. The recommendations now before the President, however, were in an entirely different category. They were based on enquiries undertaken in accordance with the "escape clause" of the Trade Agreements Act rather than section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and their purpose was purely and simply to protect United States producers rather than to safeguard price support programmes designed to help United States farmers. Moreover, the problems in Canada of making adjustments would be infinitely greater. In particular, it was very difficult to see what could be done to assist fishermen in Newfoundland and the Maritime Provinces, many of whom had extremely small cash incomes, if the President decided to accept the Tariff Commission's recommendations on groundfish fillets.

4. After studying the report on groundfish fillets, the Canadian Government had come to the conclusion that it was almost unthinkable that the President would accept the majority recommendations. A number of reasons had contributed to this optimistic view. In the first place, the minority report seemed a much more accurate statement of the reasons why New England fishermen were in difficulties and provided cogent reasons why the President should refuse to take action. Secondly, there had, in recent months, been an important development within the fish trade in the United States which would lead many interests in this country to oppose any increase in the level of protection against imports of Canadian fillets. Sales of fish sticks had risen sharply, and many of the processors depended for their raw material on frozen blocks imported from Canada. They would certainly object to this source of supply being choked off. Finally, it had seemed inconceivable to the Canadian Government that the President would be willing to take action that would do serious injury to three areas of such strategic importance to the United States as Newfoundland, Iceland and Norway. The lease by the United Kingdom of bases in Newfoundland to the United States had left scars that were by no means entirely healed. Sharp, who had recently been in Newfoundland, cited a number of incidents to show how easy it would be for feeling in Newfoundland arising out of the bases deal to become inflamed if the United States were to take measures flagrantly at variance to Newfoundland's economic interest. Although he could not speak for Iceland and Norway, he imagined that the economic and political effects in those two countries would be equally serious.

5. Within the next few days a formal note would be presented by the Canadian Embassy to the State Department Sharp said. The note had been drafted on the optimistic assumption that the President would reject the Tariff Commission's recommendations. If that assumption could not be relied on, however, the Canadian authorities would like to know so that they could modify the text of the note accordingly. In particular, he wondered whether it would be useful to Hauge and his associates in the White House in resisting pressure from United States fishermen if the Canadian note were to mention the likelihood that the Canadian Government would make compensatory withdrawals of concessions previously granted to the United States, should the recommendations be accepted. It was far from the wish of the Canadian Government to become involved in retaliatory action of that kind. But the Cabinet had carefully considered it and had come to the conclusion that it would be virtually unavoidable in the event that the recommendations on groundfish fillets were put into effect. The concessions negotiated with the United States on groundfish fillets had been paid for by matching Canadian concessions so that, if they were withdrawn, the Canadian Government would be almost compelled to proceed, without rancour but without hesitation, to take answering measures against some United States imports. For example, United States quotas against Canadian groundfish fillets might be met by Canadian measures against imports of California and Florida oranges. Similarly, higher tariff duties on lead and zinc might be countered by increases in the Canadian rates of duties levied on cotton textiles coming from the United States. Such measures would not be palatable either by the Government or people of Canada. It was hoped that the President, by firm action, would make them unnecessary. But if there was a possibility that the recommendations on groundfish fillets might be accepted, the Canadian authorities would like to know, so that their note could be drafted in a way that would take that possibility into account.

6. The thread of these remarks was broken only once when Hauge interrupted to say that he had received a number of letters from processors of fish sticks in Detroit urging that the supply of groundfish fillets from Canada should not be restricted. He indicated, however, that the contrary pressures from New England fishermen and their Senators and Congressmen were considerably stronger and he allowed it to be inferred that their pleas would be considered in the White House to be more relevant than the appeals of the processors of fish sticks.

7. When Sharp had completed his remarks, Hauge began by saying that the bias of all those in the White House was to reject, if at all possible, recommendations of the Tariff Commission for higher levels of protection. This bias would continue to operate when it was being decided how to deal with the recommendations on groundfish fillets and lead and zinc. It should also be remembered that the President's record in rejecting recommendations by the Tariff Commission under the "escape clause" procedure provided considerable grounds for confidence.

8. Turning to the specific question that Sharp had asked, Hauge expressed the tentative and personal opinion that it would be useful if the Canadian note on groundfish fillets was to mention the possibility that acceptance of the recommendations might be followed by compensatory measures to be taken by the Canadian Government. The White House would almost certainly be under strong contrary pressure from Senators and Congressmen and he could imagine occasions on which the President, or members of his staff, would think it advisable to put it into their minds that the Canadian Government might feel obliged to retaliate. He remembered, for example, that, after his visit to Ottawa last December to discuss oats with Mr. Howe and Mr. Pearson, he had warned Senator Knowland that, if the United States imposed a quota on oats, Canada might retaliate by imposing quotas on United States fruits and vegetables. On the other hand, he hoped that any reference to such a possibility in the Canadian note would not be too categorical or inflexible. He was afraid, for example, that an outright threat to retaliate, if by any accident it became public knowledge, might well produce the reverse effect to what was hoped.

9. It was noteworthy that Hauge admitted that the President's performance in dealing with recommendations from the Tariff Commission was now under scrutiny as never before. The White House was anxious, he said, to maintain at least the degree of latitude that it had under the present Trade Agreements Act and would be extremely reluctant to see such authority lapse. His clear implication seemed to be that it might be necessary to pay something in return for securing from Congress a one-year extension of the present act without amendments. As an example of the dangers he had in mind, Hauge alluded briefly to the Hunter Bill, which, in effect, would restore to Congress full authority over the United States tariff. He also disclosed that, at the President's regular meeting on Monday morning, the 24th of May, with Republican leaders in Congress, Senator Millikin had drawn it to the President's attention that he had not once during his term of office accepted recommendations by the Tariff Commission under the "escape clause" procedure for higher duties or for quantitative restrictions. Senator Millikin warned that, if the present practice continued, he did not see how Congressional action could be avoided to clip the President's existing powers over the United States tariff. This disclosure, we believe, throws considerable light on the report contained in our telegram No. WA-912 of the 25th of May† of the meeting held on Monday afternoon in the State Department to inform interested governments of the recommendations of the Tariff Commission on lead and zinc. If we were forced to guess, we would predict that, in the upshot, the President would reject the recommendations on groundfish fillets, although that cannot be taken for granted. On the other hand, we feel reasonably sure that a decision has been taken in the White House that the Republican protectionists in Congress must be appeased by some decision by the President concurring in recommendations by the Tariff Commission for increased protection, if an extension of the Trade Agreements Act for a further year is to be obtained without crippling amendments. We also suspect that lead and zinc may already have been selected as the case on which the President will be prepared to bow to the wishes of the Tariff Commission and Republican protectionists in Congress.

10. After our meeting this morning with Hauge, we doubt whether much weight need be attached to the various alternative explanations we mentioned in our telegram No. WA-929 of today's date for the haste with which the recommendations on lead and zinc are to be considered. Hauge had not yet heard of the recommendations on alsike clover seed and stated that the White House had not asked for expedited consideration in that case, as he implied it had done in the case of lead and zinc. No general decision had been taken, he said, that all recommendations of the Tariff Commission must be processed as quickly as possible. However, he did stress again that it was essential that interested governments which had received copies of the reports should be careful to prevent possible leaks. He told us that Senator Watkins (Rep.-Utah) had written to the President asking for copies of the report on lead and zinc. Hauge had just replied in the President's name refusing his request; but he added that it would be impossible for the White House to maintain its policy of secrecy if leaks occurred through the negligence of foreign governments. In his opinion, it was of the greatest importance that the present policy be maintained, since the alternative would be to have individual cases tried in the United States press before the President could take a decision.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES; RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

27. The Minister of Trade and Commerce reported that recent developments in trade relations with the United States were not satisfactory. Recommendations to the President had been made by the U.S. Tariff Commission to restrict imports and raise duties on groundfish fillets and to raise duties on lead and zinc and on alsike clover. There was also a possibility that adverse recommendations on barley would be made. Some alternative arrangement might, however, be worked out with the U.S. Department of Agriculture on the latter product.

It was proposed to send a note to the U.S. State Department concerning groundfish fillets. Consideration should also be given to the sending of separate notes on zinc and lead and on trade relations generally. Separate draft notes on groundfish fillets and zinc and lead had been prepared. The first would say that Canada expected to be consulted in advance of any decision if it was intended to implement the recommendations of the Tariff Commission. It would also refer to the unique relationship that existed between Canada and the U.S. in regard to the fishing industries, the importance of the tariff treatment of this product and the contribution which had been made in the fisheries field to the development of sound economic relations between the two countries. Reference would also be made to the position of the U.S. industry, including both producers and processors, and to recent statements made at the meetings of the Joint Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs in Washington. In concluding, the note expressed the hope that the President would not take action as recommended by the Commission. Alternatively, the note might conclude with a statement that the Canadian government would be obliged to give immediate consideration to measures which it might have to take in the circumstances if the Tariff Commission recommendations were adopted.

The note on lead and zinc included an expression of hope that the President would not act on the Commission's recommendations. It would say that an increase in the bound rates of duty would do serious damage to trade between Canada and the U.S. and would be a disappointing indication to the rest of the Western world that the economic policies of the U.S. government had reverted to protectionism and the discouragement of trade. The note would go on to refer specifically, to the unfortunate effects on the lead and zinc industry which would flow from an increase in duties. Finally, it would conclude with a reference to the improved price positions of the two metals and say that Canada reserved its rights under the terms of the G.A.T.T.

28. In the course of discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) The imposition of quantitative restrictions and increased duties on groundfish would have most serious consequences for the Canadian industry. If the recommendation were accepted it would mean that Canadian exports would be substantially reduced with serious results for the Maritime provinces, and particularly for Newfoundland, whose fisheries development programme depended, in large part, upon the increased export of fish fillets and blocks.

(b) The Tariff Commission did not fully understand the implications of its proposed action for the U.S. fishermen and processors. The industry there was becoming increasingly dependent on Canada for its raw material for the production of fish sticks, which were now becoming very popular.

(c) Many special privileges had been granted to the U.S. fishing industry, including unrestricted passage through B.C. coastal waters for the American fishing fleets moving between Washington and Alaska, and the use of Canadian ports for purchasing bait and supplies. A threat to withdraw these privileges, which were valuable to U.S. operators, might deter the U.S. government from taking action on groundfish fillets.

(d) It might be desirable not to conclude the groundfish fillets note in a threatening tone but, rather, at the time the note was delivered state orally the view that, if the Tariff Commission recommendations were adopted, public opinion in Canada and particularly in the fishing industry would not allow the continuance of the special privileges afforded to U.S. fishermen.

(e) In the note on fish, a reference should be made to the unrestricted passage granted to U.S. vessels proceeding from Washington to Alaska, and that it should be reiterated near the end of the note that Canada expected that an opportunity would be afforded for consultation if there was any likelihood that the recommendations of the Tariff Commission would be implemented.

(f) it seemed possible that the President of the United States would reject the recommendations with respect to the groundfish fillets but might well accept those for lead and zinc.

(g) The character of the note on fish should be considered in relation to the notes which might be sent on lead and zinc and on U.S. trade policy generally. Separate notes should be sent, however, if all the matters were dealt with in one paper, there was a danger that, rather than dealing with each item on its own merits, the President might affect a compromise in an endeavour to satisfy Canada and U.S. domestic interests.

(h) Insofar as the note on lead and zinc was concerned, Canada should not appear to speak on behalf of the western world. The word "war" should be eliminated, and generally speaking the first part of the note toned down.

29. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and agreed,

(a) that a note be dispatched immediately to the U.S. State Department, a copy of which should also be delivered to the White House, about possible U.S. restrictions on imports of groundfish fillets; the note to be revised in the light of the discussion and to be supplemented on delivery by a verbal observation that, if the Tariff Commission's recommendations were adopted, public opinion in Canada and in the fishing industry particularly might not permit continuance of the special privileges in Canada which had been afforded to the U.S. fishing industry thus far;

(b) that the note respecting possible increases in tariffs on lead and zinc be revised in the light of the discussion;

(c) that a draft note on U.S. trade policy, generally, be prepared for consideration; and,

(d) that the possibility of making an arrangement with the U.S. Department of Agriculture with respect to exports of barley be studied.

REPRESENTATIONS TO THE STATE DEPARTMENT AND WHITE HOUSE
ON LEAD AND ZINC

We are reproducing below the present draft of a note which Ministers are considering for possible submission to the U.S. Government. We shall let you know as soon as possible of any changes which Ministers may make in this text and of their views on the time at which the note might be presented. If Ministers decide to use the stronger alternative version of the ending of the groundfish fillets note, the ending of the note on lead and zinc would, of course, be altered in the same manner.

2. The following is the text of the present draft.

The Canadian Ambassador presents his compliments to the Secretary of State and has the honour to refer to the recommendations made recently by the United States Tariff Commission to increase the customs duties on lead and zinc.

2. The Canadian Government wishes to express its confident hope that these recommendations will be rejected by the President as a result of his own appraisal of the national interests of the United States. The present rates of duty were negotiated and bound in a trade agreement with Canada. To increase those rates would cause great damage to relations between Canada and the United States, to say nothing of the other countries which produce and export these metals. To implement these recommendations would tend to disappoint hopes that the United States Government will be prepared to pursue constructive commercial policies as the essential basis of international cooperation. Moreover the implementation of these proposals would in the judgement of the Canadian Government detract from the military and strategic strength of the United States itself.

3. Since the late 1930's the United States has had to depend increasingly on foreign sources of supply, to the extent of well over one-third of its requirements of lead and zinc. Even with a very high level of protection of domestic producers the dependence of the United States on outside sources will almost certainly increase both for ordinary peacetime requirements and in the event of any future emergency.

4. In recent years, with the encouragements of the Government, Canadian producers have expanded their output of lead and zinc and thereby have contributed to the combined strength of the United States and other allied countries. The tariff concessions negotiated with the United States have provided a basis for this expansion. At the present time these metals are regarded by the United States, Canada and many other countries as being of such strategic importance that they are subject to export restrictions to countries of the Soviet Bloc. In these circumstances, the Canadian Government and Canadian producers would consider the imposition of increased tariffs on this product to be contrary to the interests of the United States as well as Canada.

5. If the United States Government were to accept the present recommendations and were later to require increased supplies of these metals on an emergency basis, Canadian producers would at best find it difficult to meet those needs, quite aside from the understandable hesitation to strain their resources once more in order to satisfy such temporary requirements. They might feel that they had been relegated to the position of marginal suppliers, welcome enough when they were needed, but to be curtailed at other times. If there was no assurance of stable access to the United States market on reasonable terms, the availability of Canadian lead and zinc to the United States would be curtailed by reason of some discouragement of mineral development and by the re-direction of Canadian export trade elsewhere. This would hardly provide a sufficient basis for a rapid expansion of production for the use of the United States in the event of an emergency.

6. The application of the lead and zinc industry of the United States for increased protection against imports arose out of circumstances in which prices of these commodities had been greatly reduced. The lead and zinc industries in Canada and other countries have been adversely affected also and numerous mines have been closed down. However, there has recently been appreciable improvement both in consumption and prices. It would be especially unfortunate if the United States Government were to take adverse action in this matter, with the damaging effects, which have been noted, just at a time when there is reason to hope that the worst conditions in the lead and zinc industry have been left behind.

7. Further, and quite apart from strategic considerations or market developments, the Canadian Government wishes to recall the basic conditions under which trade between Canada and the United States has risen to its present high level, far exceeding the trade between any other two countries, and the important place which commitments on lead and zinc occupy among these conditions. Canada and the United States have led the world in the pursuit of liberalized trade policies and have made mutually beneficial trade concessions to each other and to other countries. A sensitive and delicately-balanced structure of trade relationships has been built up. It is recognized that so-called escape clauses exist in these agreements, but it cannot be emphasized too strongly that, if these escape clauses are used by a leading commercial nation in circumstances other than those of extreme urgency and on the basis of arguments other than those of compelling cogency, the whole structure will be seriously undermined. The agreed tariff arrangements relating to lead and zinc are regarded in Canada as one of the cornerstones of commercial arrangements with the United States.

8. As indicated in its earlier representations concerning groundfish fillets the Canadian Government expects that it would be afforded a full opportunity for consultation in the present case, as provided in our trade agreement, if there is any likelihood that the recommendation of the tariff commission may be implemented. It is confident however that the President will not take the actions recommended by the Commission after these have been reviewed in the light of the wider considerations involved.

REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING LEAD AND ZINC

Please prepare note on the lines indicated in our telegram No. EX-900, revising the last paragraph to read: "As indicated in its earlier representations concerning groundfish fillets, the Canadian Government would expect that it would be afforded a full opportunity for consultation in the present case, as provided in our Trade Agreement, if there was any likelihood that the recommendations of the Tariff Commission would be implemented. The Canadian Government is confident that the President will not take the actions recommended by the Tariff Commission after those recommendations have been reviewed in the light of the wider considerations involved."

2. Ministers are anxious that this note be presented this afternoon if at all possible. Accordingly, you should endeavour to arrange to present it at a sufficiently high level at (or after) 5 o'clock this afternoon unless you hear from us to the contrary in the meantime.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS ON GROUND FISH FILLETS

We delivered the note this afternoon at 2:00 o'clock to Kalijarvi, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs. We would have preferred to underline its importance by delivering it to Waugh, the Assistant Secretary; but unfortunately he is out of town for a few days. Our representatives were LePan, Hopper and Allen. We will be forwarding the exact text of the note, as we presented it, in the earliest possible bag. It was identical with the text contained in your telegram under reference except for the minor changes introduced to the final paragraph by the Prime Minister and transmitted to us over the telephone by Ritchie.

2. Before handing Kalijarvi the note, we gave him an oral exposition of the reasons for the great importance attached to this matter by the Canadian Government, and also explained the grounds for the confidence felt in Ottawa that the President would reject the recommendations. For this we had the advantage of having listened to Mitchell Sharp go over the same ground yesterday in his talk with Gabriel Hauge. We began by stressing that, if the recommendations were put into effect, great damage would be done to the fishing industry in Newfoundland and the Maritime Provinces. Strenuous efforts were now being made in Canada to modernize fishing operations on the Atlantic Coast, and their success was largely dependent on continued access to the expanding United States market for groundfish fillets.

3. For a number of reasons, we went on, it had been assumed in Ottawa that the President would surely reject the recommendations. This assumption had been based on the following grounds:

(a) The President had maintained an unblemished record of rejecting recommendations made by the Tariff Commission for increased protection under the "escape clause" procedure of the Trade Agreements Act.

(b) The minority report, signed by Commissioners Edminster and Ryder, provided a more convincing explanation of the troubles being experienced by the New England fishing industry than any to be found in the majority report.

(c) There was a rapidly increasing market in the United States for fish sticks, and manufacturers in the United States of this new product relied on imports of frozen blocks from Canada for their raw material.

(d) Three of the areas whose economies would be adversely affected if the recommendations were put into effect were of great strategic importance to the United States — Newfoundland, Iceland, and Norway.

4. After this preliminary exposition, we handed the note to Kalijarvi, with copies for Corse and Southworth, who were with him. In reading it, Kalijarvi stopped at the phrase in para 12 concerning the "particularly close co-operation which exists between the United States and Canadian fishing industries". By enquiring what significance was to be attached to that phrase, he gave us an opportunity to dilate a little on the close co-operation there has been between Canada and the United States in working out arrangements for fisheries conservation, both in the Atlantic and the Pacific, and on the special privileges that have been accorded United States fishermen in Canadian ports and Canadian territorial waters. We added that, if the Tariff Commission's recommendations were implemented, one effect might be that opinion within the Canadian fishing industry, and among the Canadian public generally, might make it impossible to continue to extend some of these special privileges.

5. After Kalijarvi had finished reading the note, he asked us if there were any further oral observations we wished to make. In reply, we drew his attention to the indication in the second para of the note that "the Canadian Government would, of course, expect to be consulted well in advance of any final decision, if it were intended to implement these recommendations." This referred, we explained, to the obligation to consult contained in Article XIX of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which also provided for compensatory withdrawal of concessions. The Canadian Government had carefully considered the possibility that concessions now being enjoyed by the United States in Canadian markets might have to be withdrawn if these recommendations were accepted, and had come to the conclusion that such action might well become unavoidable. Consideration was also being given, we added, to the introduction of legislation in the Canadian Parliament which would enable concessions to be withdrawn, if need be, even when Parliament was not in session.

6. Carl Corse, who had just returned from the GATT meetings in Ottawa, at one point in the discussion enquired what evidence there was for the belief that some elements in the domestic industry here would be opposed to the recommendations. In reply, we referred him to the material contained in the minority report and also drew his attention to a recent article in the Wall Street Journal describing the great increase in United States production of fish sticks — an increase based on frozen blocks imported from Canada. We also passed on to him what Hauge had told us yesterday about the representations he had received from fish processors in Detroit.

7. Few comments were made by the United States officials either on the text of the note or on our oral observations. Before we left, Kalijarvi, summing up, said that, in making his decision, the President would, of course, be under strong domestic pressures. However, it was appreciated that this was a matter of great importance to Canada and all the members of the administration, from the President down, were keenly conscious of the necessity of maintaining good relations between the two countries. He felt sure that that necessity would be fully taken into account in reaching a decision. In extenuation of the rather perfunctory nature of his comments, it should be remembered that he has been a much harried man today, who has had to sit patiently under a hail of notes concerning the Tariff Commission's recommendations on lead and zinc. Van Roijen, for example, the Netherlands Ambassador, was waiting in the ante-room to say his piece as we came out.

8. After returning from the State Department, we despatched a copy of the note by special messenger to Hauge at the White House, under cover of a brief personal letter from LePan.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS
ON LEAD AND ZINC

At 4:30 this afternoon we returned to the State Department to deliver our second note of the day to Kalijarvi, the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs — this time on lead and zinc. For this appearance we had changed our cast slightly and were represented by LePan, Allen and Chappell.

2. In order to avoid any impression that we were attaching less importance to the representations on lead and zinc than to the representations on groundfish fillets, we decided that the presentation of the note should be prefaced by some oral observations, so that we would be following the same practice in both cases. For this purpose, we arbitrarily selected for special emphasis three points in the excellent note you had transmitted to us.

3. We began by recalling some recent history which we urged was relevant in consideration of this issue. Late in 1951, the Canadian Government had been pressed by the United States authorities to do whatever it could to increase production of lead and zinc and to make it available to the United States at a time of critical shortage. These appeals had been heeded and, not only had Canadian production been increased, but it had been diverted to the United States from more profitable markets elsewhere. It was against that background that Canadian producers would read of any decision by the President to increase duties against lead and zinc. The United States was heavily dependent on foreign sources of supply, and we believed should avoid action that might make it more difficult to obtain increased quantities from Canada, and other countries, in an emergency.

4. We also read out to Kalijarvi the sentence in the note which states that, "to implement these recommendations would tend to disappoint hopes that the United States will be prepared to pursue constructive commercial policies as the essential basis of international co-operation". Opinion in Canada, we ventured to add, had been disappointed by the recent decision of the President not to press for a three-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act in an amended form, although there was a lively appreciation in Canada of the difficulties under which the President was labouring. It was realized that the task of adjusting the trade policies of the United States to its position as the world's greatest creditor could not be accomplished overnight. But, on the other hand, Canadians could not avoid watching carefully the successes and failures of the administration in this field and calculating whether the plus signs were sufficient to cancel out the minuses. It was essential that movement, however slight, should be maintained in the right direction; and the decision to be made by the President on lead and zinc would become a part of the total calculation.

5. We also drew attention to the final para of the note with its indication that "the Canadian Government would expect that it would be afforded a full opportunity for consultation in the present case, as provided in our Trade Agreement, if there was any likelihood that the recommendation of the Tariff Commission would be implemented". As we had done a few hours earlier, we explained that this referred to the possibility that the Canadian Government might be obliged to decide on compensatory withdrawals of concessions. Going a little further than we had at the previous meeting with Kalijarvi, we mentioned as examples (which we stressed were to be taken as merely illustrative) that, if the President were to accept the recommendations of the Tariff Commission on lead and zinc, the Canadian Government might be obliged to raise the barriers against imports into Canada of United States textiles. Similarly, if the President were to accept the Tariff Commission's recommendations on groundfish fillets, it might become necessary to restrict imports into Canada of California and Florida oranges.

6. By this time Kalijarvi was limp and could merely murmur that the Tariff Commission's recommendations raised a serious and difficult problem which would have to be studied carefully. In the meantime, he was grateful to us for submitting our views. We have since learned that, during the day, he was subjected to representations on lead and zinc from Australia, Belgium, The Netherlands, South Africa, Mexico and Peru.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY

In the light of the events of the past few weeks, it has become increasingly difficult to resist the conclusion that the President's foreign economic programme is coming apart at the seams.

2. Most seasoned observers here have for some months been doubtful whether the President would be able at this session of Congress to obtain a three-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act with new negotiating authority. However, they had expected that, by putting up a fight for that part of his programme, he would have been able to secure at least a one-year extension of the present Act without amendment and also to get safely through Congress most of the other measures he was seeking to have passed at this session, notably the Customs Simplification Bill, a bill to reclassify the tariff, a revision of the "Buy-American" legislation, and a bill to increase from $500 to $1,000 duty-free exemption for returning United States tourists. What troubled and dismayed those in Washington who are interested in freer trade about the President's decision not to press for a three-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act at this session, was that he received nothing in return for this concession to protectionists in his own party, and that, in the process, he showed an evident disinclination to join battle with those who do not share his view that some liberalization of United States trade policy is necessary. This has led to an expectation that further surrenders are to be expected.

3. In his letter of the 20th of May to Charles H. Percy announcing this decision not to seek enactment of the Kean Bill¹⁰⁸ this year, the President described "extension of, and amendment of, the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951"¹⁰⁹ as the heart of his foreign economic programme. On purely economic grounds the accuracy of that statement can perhaps be questioned. Yet we believe that the President's description is sound, since the Trade Agreements Act for a variety of reasons has assumed a symbolic importance in excess of its real economic effects. In any case, it would seem to follow from the importance the President has attached to the Trade Agreements Act, that he will now feel obliged to secure from Congress at all costs a one-year extension of the present Act without amendment. That deduction has been confirmed by conversations we have had with Gabriel Hauge in the White House and with officials in the State Department. So the question arises what the price may be of a simple one-year extension.

4. Let us take a charitable view and say nothing about the President's ability and will to exercise leadership in this field. It is enough to point out that, in the negotiations a few weeks ago with Republican leaders in Congress which led to his decision not to press for a three-year extension of the Act at this session, the President clearly did not feel that he was negotiating from a situation of strength. It is difficult to be sure what contributed most to the weakness which the President apparently felt. One circumstance that he would certainly have had in mind is the surplus labour situation now prevailing throughout most of the United States. Another, of course, would have been the prospect of the November elections. Even more ¹⁰⁸ Le 15 avril 1954, le représentant Robert W. Kean (Républicain—New Jersey) a présenté la US House Resolution 8860 portant la prorogation du pouvoir du président de conclure des accords commerciaux en vertu de l'article 350 de la Tariff Act de 1930.

On April 15, 1954, Representative Robert W. Kean (Republican—New Jersey) introduced U.S. House Resolution 8860, providing for extension of the President's authority to enter into trade agreements under Section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

¹⁰⁹ La Trade Agreement Extension Act de 1951 autorisait le président à conclure des accords sur le commerce extérieur jusqu'au 12 juin 1953. Le 7 août 1953, ces pouvoirs ont été prorogés pour un an, par la Loi du Congrès (Act of Congress), jusqu'au 12 juin 1954.

The 1951 Trade Agreements Extension Act authorized the President to conclude foreign trade agreements until June 12, 1953. These powers were extended by Act of Congress on August 7, 1953 for one year ending June 12, 1954.

important, in all probability, would have been his awareness of the split in the Republican Party caused by the septic wedge thrust into it by Senator McCarthy's brutal obstinacy. Whatever the reasons may have been, it can be taken for granted that the President is not likely to feel in any stronger position when he is negotiating for a one-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act. And we believe he is determined to obtain that, come what may.

5. The fact would seem to be that Republican protectionists in Congress have now tasted blood with the President's decision not to seek enactment of the Kean Bill at this session, and we suspect that they will not grant even a one-year extension unless they are appeased with further concessions. These could take the form either of a promise not to use the negotiating authority contained in the present Act, or of acceptance by the President of some of the Tariff Commission's recommendations for increased protection, or of a decision to drop some of the President's legislative proposals from the calendar for action at this session. Already, as Hauge has told us, it has been decided not to ask for amendment of the "Buy-American" legislation. Officials in the State Department, and elsewhere, still profess to be confident that the Jenkins Bill for customs simplification, and probably a bill to consolidate and simplify the tariff schedules, will be passed by Congress this year.¹¹⁰ But it is by no means impossible that these two measures will also be thrown to the wolves. If they are, it will be a very empty sleigh that will drive up at the end of the session. In addition, of course, to the question of what further tid-bits may be sacrificed, one cannot avoid wondering whether anyone is holding the reins.

6. So far, we have been considering chiefly the legislative prospects. But any calculation of what is likely to be brought safely home must also include some forecast concerning the action likely to be taken on the large number of recommendations that have now been submitted to the President by the United States Tariff Commission for restrictive quotas or for higher duties. There is no need to remind you of the recommendations on groundfish fillets, on lead and zinc, and on alsike clover. Within the last few days there has also been a report submitted on watches and watch movements. We do not know what it contains, but the fact that it has been sent to the President means that it recommends increased protection. As we have indicated in previous messages, we consider it virtually certain that the President will feel obliged to implement some of these recommendations. When Senator Millikin, as Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, cracked the whip on the morning of the 24 of May by warning the President that, unless he accepted some of the recommendations of the Tariff Commission under the "escape clause" procedure,¹¹¹ he was unlikely to obtain from Congress even a one-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act, the White House and the State Department visibly jumped. Only a few hours later interested governments were told that they must submit within a week any observations they wished to make on the recommendations on lead and zinc. Although it is conceivable that the President will prove our fears groundless by rejecting all the recommendations now before him for increased protection, we think that highly unlikely. We still are of the opinion that the administration has taken Senator Millikin's warning very much to heart and is disposed to accept at least one or two of the Tariff Commission's recommendations with a view to obtaining a one-year extension to the present Trade Agreements Act without amendment.

¹¹⁰ Un projet de loi piloté par le représentant Thomas A. Jenkins (Républicain—Ohio) pour simplifier les procédures douanières américaines.

A bill sponsored by Representative Thomas A. Jenkins (Republican—Ohio) to simplify American customs procedures.

7. In previous forecasts of probable developments in the field of foreign economic policy, we have taken the mildly optimistic view that, when all the returns were in, it would be possible to say that, on balance, some slight progress had been registered this year. It now looks, however, as though such modest legislative advances as may be made will probably be outweighed by protectionist moves in other sectors.

8. For Canada, such a result would be all the more serious coming at a time when the placing of United States defence contracts in Canada is drying up; when a new United States stockpiling policy is laying increased stress on domestic procurement; and when ever-mounting United States agricultural surpluses are threatening to curtail our sales in overseas markets. Many other countries in the free world will be equally concerned, in spite of the fact that it now appears that the course of the recession here has been checked, in part at least through governmental, or quasi-governmental, action.

9. If the misgivings we have expressed in this telegram are shared in Ottawa, we think we would do well to make them known to the administration, and at a high level. There are a number of possible ways in which this could be done. We could submit another note to the State Department. A letter could be written by the Prime Minister to the President. Or I might be instructed to make representations to the Secretary of State and perhaps also to leave an aide-mémoire at the end of my conversation. In my view, it is the third of these possible methods that should be adopted. The usefulness of diplomatic notes as a means of influencing United States policy can easily be overestimated, it seems to me, although, of course, they are often indispensable as a way of putting our views on record. A letter from the Prime Minister to the President would carry more weight and be more heeded. But

Section 7 of the 1951 Trade Agreements Extension Act provided that, if the U.S. Tariff Commission found that an article upon which a tariff concession had been granted was being imported in such increased quantities as to cause or threaten serious injury to a domestic industry, the Commission must recommend the withdrawal or modification of the concession, or the establishment of import quotas.

I am inclined to think that in this rather nebulous but worrying situation the main burden of our concern about the drift of events in the field of foreign economic policy might best be expressed by oral representations rather than in writing.

10. It is our impression here that the Secretary of State is considerably more alive to the importance of economic matters than he was even a few months ago. If I were to be instructed to discuss this matter with him, it might be possible to make him realize the very unfortunate consequences that would ensue from any further backsliding by the United States. In such an interview I would propose, if you agree, to point out how difficult it would be for the Canadian Government to resist pressure to withdraw tariff concessions now enjoyed by the United States if the President were to accept the recommendations of the Tariff Commission either on groundfish fillets or on lead and zinc. This possibility would be used, however, chiefly as an example of the almost inevitable consequences of any drift by the United States into a policy of higher protection. Perhaps Dulles' main preoccupation at the moment is with keeping the Western alliance together. The imposition of new trade barriers throughout the free world, together with the mutual recriminations with which that would certainly be accompanied, could be expected to make his task even more difficult. It could also, of course, be expected to lead to pressure for more untrammelled trade with the Soviet Union and its satellites, and with Communist China. Besides drawing these dangers to the Secretary of State's attention, I might also remind him once more that Japan's trade problems would probably prove insoluble in such circumstances. These are, of course, to be regarded merely as very tentative suggestions for what I might say in such an interview.

11. I should be grateful to learn in due course whether you agree with the analysis contained in this telegram, and whether you would wish me to call on the Secretary of State to express our concern about the way the tide seems to be setting in United States foreign economic policy.

U.S. TARIFF COMMISSION REPORT ON ALSIKE CLOVER SEED

I am transmitting in this message the text of a note for the State Department which I should be grateful if you would present at the earliest opportunity. In doing so you might remark that in addition to what is said in the note about this particular case we would also regard acceptance of the Commission's recommendations as unfortunate for some of the general reasons which are stated in our recent notes on groundfish fillets and lead and zinc. Moreover, the Tariff Commission's recommendations in this case are all the more disturbing coming as they do on top of the other recent recommendations.

Text of Note begins:

The Canadian Ambassador presents his compliments to the Secretary of State and has the honour to refer to the recommendations made recently by the United States Tariff Commission pursuant to Section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951, as amended, to increase the customs duties on alsike clover seed.

The Canadian Government wishes to make clear the importance it attaches to the marketing of this crop in the United States. This trade has been built up over a considerable number of years. Any increase in the United States tariff on this commodity, which would reduce returns to Canadian clover seed growers, would be regarded as a serious matter adversely affecting the livelihood of Canadian producers.

The tariff rate affected is bound to Canada in the existing trade agreement. The Canadian Government is not aware that circumstances exist which would justify the United States Government resorting to the escape provisions of our trade agreement.

The Canadian Government takes note of the expressed willingness of the United States Government to consult other interested governments in this matter. Because of its substantial interest in this trade and because of the contractual obligations assumed by the United States in connection with the tariff on this product, the Canadian Government would wish to be consulted by the United States Government in advance of any possible action by the President to accept the recommendations of the Tariff Commission. Text of note ends.

LEGISLATION TO PERMIT OF COMPENSATORY ACTION BY CANADA WHEN OTHER COUNTRIES ALTER CONCESSIONS UNDER TRADE AGREEMENTS

I am attaching the latest draft of a brief memorandum† relating to a possible amendment to the Customs Tariff to permit of emergency action by Canada in circumstances such as those which might be created by some of the "escape clause" recommendations which President Eisenhower now has under consideration. I understand that this draft amendment has not yet been approved by the Minister of Finance, but I think it desirable that you be familiar with its contents at this stage in case it comes up for discussion in the near future. Mr. Plumptre advises that Mr. Abbott has now given his approval. This draft was examined at a meeting of the Inter-Departmental Committee on External Trade Policy yesterday, and, although some members of that Committee were worried about the uses to which such a provision might be put and about the impression which it might create abroad, all members of the Committee appeared to be convinced that, on balance, it would be desirable to introduce legislation along these lines at an appropriate time.

2. It was recognized that the Government might be somewhat reluctant to bring in new legislation on this subject, but it was generally felt that the existing legislation (i.e. Section 4(1)(f) of the Customs Tariff) was unsatisfactory and too rigid, since it would merely permit the Governor-in-Council to substitute the higher General Tariff rates for most-favoured-nation tariff rates. There might well be cases where the right course would be to increase duties by less than the full General Tariff. There might also be cases where it would be desirable to go further than the General Tariff rate. The present law would not allow either of these possibilities. The law would be particularly ineffective in those numerous instances where goods are duty free under the General as well as the most-favoured-nation tariff, and, therefore, the use of this provision would not result in any change. The present law would also not permit of the imposition of quantitative import restrictions which might be the cleanest and most appropriate device in certain situations.

3. In the drafting of the proposed amendment, officials in the Department of Finance have attempted to incorporate as many limitations and safeguards as could be reconciled with an effective measure for countering the kinds of injurious actions which other countries might take. The conditions in which the provision might be used are described in terms similar to those employed in the "nullification or impairment" article (Article XXIII) of the GATT. The amendment also envisages that any orders or regulations which might be made under the amendment could be continued beyond a certain time only if Parliament took positive action in the particular case. The opening paragraph of the amendment would also make it possible for the Government to refrain from acting in any instance on the grounds that it did not consider resort to this provision to be "in the public interest".

4. As originally drafted by Finance officials, the amendment provided for duties or restrictions on exports as well as on imports. In the discussion in the Inter-Departmental Committee, it was generally the view that the use of such a power might have damaging repercussions for Canada (e.g. if employed in the case of nickel, it might encourage the use of substitute materials; if used in the case of aluminum, it might result in the U.S. proceeding with the expansion of its domestic industry; and if resorted to in the case of newsprint, it might produce a great variety of unfavourable reactions). The inclusion of such a power, even if it were not to be used, might make our legislative action look rather aggressive and might detract from the impression which we will doubtless wish to create that we are merely preparing ourselves to act in self-defence. Following on the discussion in the Inter-Departmental Committee, Finance has now dropped these tentative proposals regarding Canadian exports.

5. No one, I believe, is particularly happy at the prospect of having to amend the Customs Act in the directions suggested on the attached sheet. It is realized that, if this amendment is made, there will be very great pressure to use the powers contained in it for protective purposes and not merely for the purpose of redressing the balance of a trade agreement which had been impaired by another country. It is also recognized that some groups in Canada (e.g. certain elements in the textile industry) might endeavour to have the provision used against the trade of the U.K. and some of the European countries whose import restrictions are doubtless affecting the value of tariff concessions received from them. It is appreciated as well that the introduction of this legislation, or even any announcement that the Government intended to introduce it, might help to discourage other countries which have been considering embarking on more liberal trade policies and might give aid and comfort to groups in those countries which are opposed to any thought of convertibility and freer trade (e.g. the Imperial Wing of the Conservative Party and influential members of the Labour Party who have been resisting Mr. Butler's efforts.) It might be represented that even Canada had given up hope of U.S. commercial policies and was certainly not expecting the United States to adopt "good creditor policies." Some might go on to suggest that Canada was going in for a little protection on her own (a suggestion to which some weight might also seem to be given by the recent reference of the woollen textile item to the Tariff Board) and that, therefore, other countries less fortunately placed should feel free to intensify their protective arrangements. It might even be surmised by some elements abroad that Canada will shortly have moved to a position where it will be less reluctant to consider closer cooperation with one or another regional or preferential group.

6. These are all no doubt very real worries. At least to a certain extent, it would appear that some of them might be overcome by the timing and manner of any Parliamentary action here and, in particular, if it is emphasized that the Government intends to use these powers only in the most exceptional circumstances.

7. Although the expression "or otherwise" (the inclusion of which seems unavoidable) in the first paragraph of the amendment might open the way for the possible use of these powers against exports of countries other than the United States, it would seem doubtful), in fact, that the clause could be invoked against import restrictions maintained by other countries consistently with the GATT on balance of payments grounds. If those countries are retaining such restrictions for purely protective reasons, it may well be desirable for them to think that we might act against their exports. The knowledge that we had such power in reserve might be helpful in inducing those countries to hasten the removal of restrictions no longer required on balance of payments grounds. While it is not possible to be confident as to the interpretation which the U.K. and others might place on the taking of such powers by the Canadian Government, it is quite conceivable that even those who are interested in promoting liberal commercial policies would welcome, and would be strengthened by, this evidence that we were doing our part to persuade the U.S. of the disadvantages in the course on which they appear to be embarking. Since it had always been basic to our attitude on convertibility and non-discrimination that these were things which other countries should do in their own interests and without too much regard for the policies of the U.S. or others, and since it is assumed that it is because of their own self-interests that certain countries are now contemplating more liberal policies, we might reasonably expect and encourage them to continue towards this objective, even though it appeared that we were admitting a certain lack of confidence in the prospects for the foreign economic policies of the United States.

8. In our relations with the United States, it would appear that, on balance, the introduction of this legislation (if it is done in the right way and at the right time) would be likely to have a wholesome effect. Even if it does not deter them from "escape clause" actions which hurt us, it may at least help us to get some compensation from them in return for any concessions which they may nullify or impair. As a last resort, it would enable us to demonstrate to them that we attach value to the benefits which we had given to them in return for the concessions affected by their actions and that we were not prepared to let them continue to enjoy those benefits for nothing. Quite apart from the immediate situation, there would seem to be advantage in having the powers envisaged in the proposed amendment in connection with any future tariff negotiations in order that we might be able to negotiate from a position of equality with the United States.

9. Although it is not known when the President will reach his decisions on the escape clause cases now before him, and although no one can be sure exactly what his decisions will be, the best guesses (and I would emphasize that these are entirely guesses) at the moment are that he will decide these cases within the next week or so, that he will probably wish to announce his decisions on all three of the present batch together, and that he is likely to reject the recommendation on groundfish, accept the substance of the recommendation on lead and zinc, and probably accept the recommendation on clover. The question of timing, therefore, assumes considerable importance.

10. If, before actually reaching his decisions, or at least before announcing them publicly, the President is moved by our notes on groundfish and base metals to inform us of his intentions, and if those intentions are adverse to Canada in any major respect, it might be considered by Ministers that the proposed legislation should be introduced immediately. That would seem to be a reasonable and almost unavoidable course in those circumstances.

11. If the President's decisions in these cases are announced before we are advised, and if they generally go against us, it might be considered that the legislation should then be introduced at once, even though it obviously could not influence the decisions already taken, and even though it might appear to be a prelude to retaliation. In those circumstances, the introduction of the legislation would strengthen our hand in the consultations which the United States would be expected to have with us under the GATT concerning compensatory actions to be taken by them or by us. In that case, I assume that we would not plan actually to implement the legislation until such consultations had taken place with the United States and we had learned what, if anything, they were prepared to offer in compensation.

12. If the President's decision is deferred somewhat, and even though we have no definite information on his intentions, there may be some temptation to introduce this amendment in the meantime just to be on the safe side. I doubt that there would be any advantage in this course. It would appear to run counter to the confidence which we have expressed in our notes that the President will reject the recommendations on fish and metals. It might look threatening before there was evidence that a threat or warning was appropriate, and it might unnecessarily provoke the United States to act against our exports, as the President would probably be anxious to demonstrate to Congress that he was not susceptible to threats from us or from anybody else.

13. There is always, of course, the remote possibility that all of the President's decisions will be favourable. Even then, there might be something to be said for having legislation of the kind represented by the proposed amendment on our Statute books to guard against possible developments in the future and for the purpose of subsequent tariff negotiations with the United States. In that event, the nature and timing of any legislation could be considered more leisurely and might even be discussed with the United States and other interested countries informally in order to avoid any possible misunderstandings.

14. Very briefly, my present views are that:

(a) something along the lines of the attached draft is likely to be found desirable;
 (b) any such amendment should not be introduced at this time in advance of some fairly definite indication that the President is likely to set against us;

(c) if we receive advance notice of the President's intention to decide against us on either groundfish fillets or lead and zinc, and there would therefore be no possibility of our action provoking him to do something against us which he would not otherwise have done, legislation of this kind probably should be introduced before the President's decisions are announced in case it might have some slight influence on him;

(d) if, without advance warning, the President announces that he has accepted the Tariff Board's recommendations in either of these cases, the legislation might then be introduced at once.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of May 27th, 1954, said a telegram had been received from the Canadian Ambassador to the United States suggesting that it might now be desirable to make known to the highest levels of the Administration in Washington Canada's concern about recent general developments in U.S. trade policy. This could be done either by the submission of another note to the State Department, by a letter written from the Prime Minister to the President, or by the Ambassador making representations himself to the Secretary of State and perhaps leaving an aide-mémoire at the end of the conversation. Mr. Heeney felt the third of these alternatives was preferable, followed possibly by a call on the President's chief advisors in the White House.

11. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on recent developments in trade relations with the United States, and agreed that the Canadian Ambassador in Washington, in the near future, make representations to the Secretary of State on U.S. foreign economic policy; the officials concerned in Ottawa to prepare, immediately, for consideration of Ministers, a draft aide mémoire and instructions for the Ambassador.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY

Following for the Acting Under-Secretary from the Ambassador, Begins: Although we think that the sooner representations can be made to the Secretary of State the better, we do not wish to suggest that the urgency is overwhelming. It would be soon enough, we believe for representations to be made some time in the first half of next week. The purpose of the representations would be to avoid one or a number of a whole cluster of possibilities including the following:

- (a) That the President might accept the United States Tariff Commission's recommendations on groundfish fillets;
- (b) That he might accept the recommendations on lead and zinc;
- (c) That he might agree not to make use of the negotiating authority still remaining in the Trade Agreements Act;
- (d) That he might decide not to press for enactment at this session of the Jenkins Bill for customs simplification.

No one can tell when any of these decisions may be taken, although we must assume that all these issues will come up within the next fortnight. It is, therefore, impossible to say that representations on Monday would be in time and that representations on Tuesday would be too late. I would merely hope that they could be made the middle of next week. It has occurred to us that we have perhaps unwittingly helped to create an unwarranted sense of urgency by marking our previous message as 'Most Immediate'. Our only reason for this was that the Minister had asked to have it in time for the Cabinet meeting last Thursday morning.

2. Although I fully sympathize with the Prime Minister's desire to consult further with his colleagues before instructions are forwarded to me, I can see no necessity for a firm decision to be taken as to whether or not the Government would withdraw compensatory concessions previously granted to the United States in the event that the recommendations either on groundfish fillets or on lead and zinc were accepted by the President. Indeed, I think that such a final decision would be undesirable at this stage since we do not want to be prematurely shackled to an extreme policy. You may then ask how it would be possible to frame a sentence or two about the possibility of Canadian retaliation without a firm Cabinet decision. It seems to me that that would not be too difficult. If the document now being prepared in Ottawa is to be regarded as a draft aide-mémoire, I think it might perhaps omit any reference to possible compensatory withdrawals. In the course of my oral remarks to the Secretary of State I should certainly refer to that possibility, I think, although in a very matter-of-fact tone and without any suggestion of conveying a threat. After we had finished our talk, I would say to the Secretary of State that, for his convenience, I had put in an aide-mémoire many of the points I had made orally. I could also draw his attention to the fact that the aide-mémoire made no reference to the possibility that the Canadian Government might be obliged to make compensatory withdrawals of tariff concessions and go on to explain that this omission should not be taken to mean that the possibility I had mentioned in my oral remarks was not to be regarded seriously.

3. To sum up, I think there would be no harm in delaying our representations for a few days until the Prime Minister could have a further opportunity of discussing with his colleagues the important issues involved; but, on the other hand I think it would be unnecessary and undesirable to wait until there is a Cabinet decision to retaliate if the President accepts the recommendations either on groundfish fillets or on lead and zinc. In other words, the representations we have in mind here would be a penultimate, and not of a final, kind.

4. This message will confirm what I said in our telephone conversation yesterday evening. We have now received your telegrams Nos. EX-962† and EX-968† of June 4 and will be commenting on Monday on the draft aide-mémoire.

POSSIBLE REPRESENTATIONS TO MR. DULLES CONCERNING U.S. COMMERCIAL POLICIES

I am attaching four copies of the revised version of the proposed aide mémoire which takes account of most of the suggestions made by Mr. Heeney. Copies of this revised draft have been sent to the officials concerned in Finance, Trade and Commerce, the Bank of Canada and the Privy Council Office.

2. From such conversations as I have had today, I would gather that the general views of officials (which I share) are about as follows:

(a) it would probably not be desirable to refer to possible compensatory action by Canada in any oral or written representations unless Ministers have considered the implications carefully and have come to the conclusion that action will be taken if the President accepts the main Tariff Commission recommendations;

(b) if such compensatory action is envisaged, the reference to it should be made in any written submission to the U.S. and not merely in any oral remarks;

(c) any such reference should be at least as definite as that contained in the version of paragraph 6 drafted by the Prime Minister in consultation with Mr. Abbott;¹¹²

(d) if something along the lines of that earlier draft of the paragraph is not to be included, there would seem to be little point in submitting a written memorandum or aide mémoire;

(e) if agreement cannot be reached on a reasonably effective aide mémoire, it would seem to be an open question as to whether a useful purpose would be served by oral representations (which almost inevitably would reflect the inability to reach definite agreement here on what precisely should be said to the U.S.)

3. You will doubtless wish to bring this revised draft to the Minister's attention on his return tomorrow in order that he might have any necessary discussions with the Prime Minister and Mr. Howe (and possibly Mr. Abbott).

4. All of these preparations may have been rather overtaken by developments today in the views of some Ministers. I understand from Plumptre that Mr. Abbott has had some talks with the Prime Minister (and I believe with Mr. Howe) and that they are now:

(a) pretty well determined not to introduce the kind of legislation which would be required to make it possible for Canada to take compensatory action of the sort contemplated in recent discussions;

(b) not inclined to have any further written submission made to the State Department on the commercial policy situation at this time; and

(c) doubtful that oral representations would be desirable in these circumstances.

5. Mr. Abbott appears to attach considerable significance to the Congressional elections in November and does not think it would be wise to add to (or appear to add to) the worries and difficulties of the Administration in the meantime. He is prepared to have officials go into the question of the kind of action which might be possible, and even to go further into the question of the type of legislation which might eventually be required, but he is not willing to contemplate anything more drastic for the time being.

Revision of June 8

The Canadian Ambassador has been instructed to inform the Secretary of State that the Canadian Government is seriously concerned at the danger that the commercial policy of the United States is turning in the direction of restricting rather than liberalizing world trade. The Ambassador wishes to draw the Secretary of State's attention to the consequences which, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, will follow if these apprehensions turn out to be well founded.

2. Acknowledgement has often been made by spokesmen both of the United States and Canadian Governments of the importance which has to be attached for both broad political and strategic, as well as for economic, reasons to a reduction of the barriers to international trade and exchange. The crucial role of the United States in determining whether the world is to move forward or backward on these matters has also been widely recognized. Canadian views were conveyed to the President by the Prime Minister during his visit to Washington in May, 1953, and were recorded in the memorandum left behind on that occasion. More recently, they were expressed by Canadian Ministers at the meeting of the Joint United States-Canada Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs held in Washington last March and were reflected in the statement in the joint communiqué that "few things would contribute more to the well-being and stability of the free nations of the world than a forward move towards freer trade and payments."

3. The reasons for the concern now felt by the Canadian Government will be familiar to the Secretary of State. The concern arises, in part, from deferment of a central element in the foreign economic policy of the Administration as that policy was outlined in the President's message to Congress on March 30, 1954. In part it arises from specific actions which the Administration has taken, or is understood to be considering taking, to place additional obstacles in the way of imports into the United States.

4. The recommendations of the Randall Commission represented, in the view of the Canadian Government, a modest but forward-looking programme. The vigour with which these proposals were commended to the Congress by the President in his message of March 30 encouraged the hope that the foreign economic policy of the United States would gradually develop along lines appropriate to the position of the United States in the free world. The later decision of the President not to press at this time for passage of the measure incorporating what he has characterized as "the heart of the programme", i.e., the revised Trade Agreements Act, therefore caused great disappointment in Canada. Inevitably, that decision has given rise in Canada to doubts about the prospects for timely action on other important elements in the Administration's programme.

5. Unfortunately, in addition to this absence of progress in the legislative programme, during the past few months the United States has placed restrictions on imports of rye and has obtained reluctant Canadian acquiescence in restrictions on movements of oats. At the present time Canada and other countries are faced with the possibility of additional barriers on U.S. imports of a number of other important commodities.

6. If the United States Government were to reach a decision adverse to Canadian interests on any of the important escape clause cases now being considered, the effect on public opinion in Canada would be most serious. Could Canadians be expected to acquiesce without action of some kind in the persistence of a situation where concessions granted by the United States as part of a bargain with Canada were being withdrawn? In order to safeguard the interests of third countries in the Canadian market, action taken by Canada would take the form of measures which would affect imports from the United States only, i.e., discriminatory measures. It must be obvious that the public discussion which would be provoked by the consideration of any such measures would be of a character which would place a most undesirable strain on relations between the two countries.

Alternative version of para 6: (If the United States Government were to reach a decision adverse to Canadian interests on any of the important escape clause cases now being considered, and were to withdraw concessions which had been secured by Canada as part of a negotiated bargain, the effect on public opinion in Canada would be most serious and would necessitate a re-examination of the trade policies that Canada has been following. From such a re-appraisal, the possibility that action would be taken affecting U.S. imports into Canada, and affecting them in a discriminatory manner, could not be excluded. It must be obvious that the public discussion that would accompany consideration of any such measures would be of a character that would place a most undesirable strain on relations between the two countries.)

7. It might be appropriate to add a word regarding the consequences outside Canada of developments along these lines, especially since the reactions of such other countries may depend in part on the interpretation given by them to any response by Canada to action by the United States. Canada, along with the United States, has been in the forefront of the movement for liberalizing the conditions of international trade and exchange. In the effort to persuade other countries that it was in their interests to give up trade restrictions and to move towards currency convertibility, Canadian representatives have frequently had to meet the argument that the underlying protectionist sentiment in the United States is so deeply entrenched that it is quite unrealistic to suppose that she will follow "good creditor policies" or that international balance can be achieved on a continuing basis without drastic import and exchange restrictions against the United States. Canadian representatives have continually taken a more optimistic position and, in recent years, their views have come to be widely shared in the sterling area and on the continent of Europe. If developments in the United States are such as to produce serious Canadian reactions, the changes in Canadian policies which this would bring about may well have a significant effect on the attitudes of other friendly countries. The forces in those countries which have consistently opposed cooperation with the United States and the elimination of dollar restrictions will be strengthened. Those who have advocated moves on a broad front towards a system of freer trade and payments throughout the free world will be weakened; indeed, projects of this character will be placed in jeopardy. So, too, will the hope that many countries will be able to accept trading arrangements affecting Japan which will enable that country to pay her own way through international trade and to play an effective role in Pacific security.

8. The Canadian Government fully appreciates the efforts which have been made by the United States Administration to avoid action under the escape clause procedure. Nevertheless, the series of developments in the United States over the past few months to which reference has been made is causing great apprehension in Canada and other countries lest the commercial policy of the United States may be moving in the direction of restricting rather than liberalizing trade. If this apprehension hardens into a conviction, it will halt progress in relaxing trade barriers in the Free World and will even result in the imposition of new trade barriers. Apart from the weakening economic effects of such developments, the mutual recriminations which would result will greatly increase the difficulties involved in keeping the Western Alliance together. In the opinion of the Canadian Government, the broad defence and political implications of present tendencies are deserving of most serious consideration.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY

Following for the Minister, Begins: On Wednesday evening, June 9, you telephoned me to say that, after discussion with the Prime Minister and Mr. Howe, it had been decided that no, repeat no, representations of the sort we had in mind should be made to the Secretary of State at this time. You told me that Mr. Howe had advised this course on the ground that the information available to him indicated that the President was likely to reject the recommendation of the United States Tariff Commission with respect to ground fillets¹¹³ and that the position regarding lead and zinc was not as gloomy as it had hitherto appeared.

¹¹³ Le 2 juillet 1954, Eisenhower a rejeté la recommandation de la Commission des tarifs concernant les filets de poissons de fond. Voir/On July 2, 1954, Eisenhower rejected the Tariff Commission's recommendation regarding imported groundfish fillets. See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXI, No. 788, August 23, 1954, pp. 166-167.

2. You already have such information and reports as we have been able to assemble on both these subjects. The best opinion here is that on fish we are likely to get the result we want; regarding lead and zinc, the position seems still very doubtful. For the moment, we have nothing to add on the probabilities concerning these specific items. You are aware of the position of the President's economic programme generally in the Congress.

3. We understand that you are now considering whether, in the circumstances, any opportunity should be sought to bring our views further to the attention of United States authorities and put our general position on record with them. We shall look forward to receiving your instructions on this point, and meantime will take no, repeat no, action. Ends.

ALSIKE CLOVER SEED

Please repeat to Dr. C.M. Isbister, Dept. of Trade and Commerce, Begins: We were asked this morning by John Evans to come as soon as possible to the State Department as he had something to convey to us about alsike clover seed.

2. Evans informed us that, as a result of a meeting held yesterday in Hauge's office, it is virtually certain that the Tariff Commission recommendations will be accepted by the White House. He said it would be difficult for the President not to take action in view of the unanimous decision of the Tariff Commission.

3. The United States alsike clover growers are pressing for an immediate decision so that they may know what to do about production and harvesting of their crops, and the White House would like to announce a decision within the next few days.

4. Evans said he was asked to enquire if, as an alternative to the proclamation of the Tariff Commission recommendations, Canada would wish to voluntarily restrict alsike clover seed exports to the United States and, if so, how would this be done.

5. He said that in the event that voluntary restrictions were looked on with favour by Canadian authorities, he would like to know what volume of exports we would desire. He said he had no instructions to suggest any particular quantities, nor was he pressing us to take action of this kind as an alternative to United States action.

6. We agreed to try and obtain a decision for him by tomorrow, but by Monday at the latest. Ends.

ALSIKE CLOVER SEED

1. You should reply to John Evans along the following lines.
2. The Canadian Government feels that it is not desirable to impose restrictions on export of alsike clover seed to the United States.
3. As indicated in our note of June 4, 1954, it is hoped that the President will not implement the Tariff Commission's recommendations. The trade in alsike clover seed has been built up over a considerable number of years and is regarded as important in Canada. Any increase in the United States duty would impair this trade and would be seriously regarded by the Government of Canada.
4. If the Government of the United States has decided, however, that it has no alternative but to introduce measures to protect domestic producers, we believe that such measures should not unduly disturb normal trade in alsike clover seed. To do so would not be consistent with the intent of the United States escape clause legislation. You should therefore suggest that the first 1,500,000 lbs. imported in any year should continue to enter at 2 cents per lb. Imports over and above this amount might be made subject to higher rates of duty. Such a measure would, we believe, permit a minimum amount of trade to continue under present conditions.
5. You may wish to leave an aide mémoire along these lines with John Evans since it might be desirable to have a written record of this approach.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS ON LEAD AND ZINC

Yesterday afternoon we were called to a meeting in the office of Sam Waugh, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, for a further discussion of the Tariff Commission's recommendations on lead and zinc. The present situation seems to be as follows:

(a) There is unanimity within the administration that some government action must be taken to come to the rescue of domestic producers.

(b) The proposal that the present rates of duty should be continued on concentrates but that the rates of duty on refined lead and zinc should be increased, has been rejected.

(c) There is a deadlock within the administration on whether the problem should be met by instituting some kind of subsidy scheme or by accepting, without modification, the Tariff Commission's recommendations for increased protection.

(d) The Treasury is strongly resisting the granting of subsidies; and the State Department is strongly resisting the raising of duties. While the argument has involved complicated and conflicting calculations concerning the likely effects on prices, production, and consumption, of the two rival solutions that are being advocated, we believe that it can be reduced, without substantial inaccuracy, to very simple terms. Mr. Humphrey is opposed to a subsidy primarily because it would necessitate large expenditures by the Treasury; while the State Department is opposed to increased duties primarily because they would cause trouble with foreign countries.

2. Waugh had not arrived when we appeared for the meeting. But Kalijarvi, his deputy, together with Nichols and Raynor, explained that Waugh intended to phone Mr. Howe and wanted to know, as precisely as possible, what had been said during the conversation on July 12 between Mr. Howe and Mr. Humphrey. Since Mr. Howe had been good enough to send me a personal and confidential letter† outlining the conversation, we felt little hesitation in trying to meet this request. Before doing so, however, we took the precaution of stressing that anything we might say would, of course, be subject to correction by Mr. Howe himself. We also reminded the State Department officials that the Canadian Government had hoped that it would not prove necessary for the United States to take any action to improve the competitive position of their producers of lead and zinc; the conversation between Mr. Howe and Mr. Humphrey should be set against that background, we explained.

3. With that preface, we then said that, according to our understanding, Mr. Humphrey had opened the conversation by telling Mr. Howe that consideration was being given in Washington to three alternative solutions:

(a) Acceptance of the Tariff Commission's recommendations;

(b) A domestic subsidy; and

(c) Continuing the present rates of duties on concentrates while raising them on refined lead and zinc.

We understood that Mr. Howe had told Mr. Humphrey very forcibly that the third alternative would be very distasteful to Canada, since it could do great damage to our refining industry. So far as subsidies were concerned, we gathered that Mr. Howe had indicated that this was a matter for decision by the United States Government; and if it was decided to institute a subsidy scheme, the Canadian Government would have no grounds for formal protest. In any case, Mr. Howe did not propose to grant subsidies to the Canadian industry. It was also our impression that Mr. Howe had suggested that Canadian exporters would not be too frightened about their position in the United States market even if their competitors in this country were being subsidized.

4. According to our information, Mr. Humphrey had then asked Mr. Howe what he personally would do if he found himself in a similar predicament and felt obliged to take some action. We understood that Mr. Howe had replied that it seemed to him the best solution would probably be to try to re-negotiate, within the GATT framework, the United States duties on lead and zinc, offering, of course, some concessions to other countries in return. Since we had the benefit of a conversation yesterday morning with Mitchell Sharp, we went a little further and explained that what we thought Mr. Howe had in mind was a re-negotiation in accordance with the terms of Article XXVIII of the General Agreement, which, as you remember, in its amended form extends the firm life of the present GATT schedules only until June 30, 1955. If, however, the United States authorities thought that they could not wait until next year to try to re-negotiate these items, we believed that the Canadian Government would not rule out the possibility of an earlier re-negotiation.

5. At this point, Waugh arrived and, at his request, we went over the same ground again. He explained that he had just come from a meeting with the Secretary of the Treasury, and had intended speaking to Mr. Howe afterwards. However, he had now decided that it would be enough for his purpose if he learned at second hand the views that Mr. Howe had expressed. Waugh was concerned that the remark of Mr. Howe's which had most stuck in Mr. Humphrey's mind was to the effect, "I don't believe in subsidies and there won't be any in Canada so long as I am in office." Apparently the Secretary of the Treasury had repeated this remark to Waugh on a number of occasions — somewhat to his chagrin, since it was he who had suggested in the first place that Mr. Humphrey speak to Mr. Howe and since he was not arguing for subsidies as the lesser of the two evils.

6. Waugh explained that there was no intention of raising the duties on refined lead and zinc while maintaining the present duties on concentrates, and he implied that this possibility had been struck from the list, in part at least, as a result of Mr. Howe's objections. The only two alternatives now being considered were acceptance of the Tariff Commission's recommendations as they stood or some form of subsidy. At the meeting he had attended yesterday afternoon, the Secretary of the Treasury had spoken of a subsidy of three cents per pound across the board to be granted to all production of lead and zinc in the United States. In earlier discussions consideration had been given to subsidizing the first X-100 pounds of lead and zinc from any given mine. However, this proposal was now taking second place to the idea of subsidizing all production. No decision had yet been taken on what degree of subsidy should be granted, if that alternative was adopted by the United States Government. The figures that had been mentioned had ranged from between one and a half cents per pound to three cents per pound. We could assume, Waugh thought, that the later figure represented the maximum subsidy that might be paid.

7. Nichols, the Acting Director of the Office of International Materials Policy in the State Department, said that, as he and his staff had worked out the probable effects of the increases in duty that had been proposed by the Tariff Commission, it would seem that they would not bring much succour to marginal producers in the United States. Waugh had used this argument in talking to the Secretary of the Treasury; but the Secretary apparently had countered by saying that, in his opinion, subsidies would do more damage to Canadian and Mexican producers than tariff increases. We were aware, from our conversation with Mitchell Sharp, that recent study in Ottawa of the comparative harm that might be done to Canadian commercial interests by United States subsidies or by higher rates of duty, had seemed to show that subsidies might be preferable. However we thought, on balance, that it would be unwise to mention that conclusion. Instead, when Waugh remarked that the United States authorities were anxious to consult with Canada on the choice now before them, we took the opportunity to enquire whether we might regard the meeting yesterday as an invitation to the Canadian Government to put forward in a more considered way any views that it might care to express on the alternatives now being considered in Washington. We thought that, in view of the further study that has been done in Ottawa and the somewhat altered situation here, you might wish to have one more chance of influencing the final decision. Waugh agreed very readily with our suggestion and said that any comments that the Canadian Government might wish to make would be warmly welcomed. We promised to have them, if possible, by early next week. You need not, of course, feel under obligation to comment if you think that would be inadvisable.

8. One further point needs to be recorded. When we were repeating with Waugh our earlier discussion of the possibility that the United States might seek to renegotiate its rates of duty on lead and zinc, he gave us to understand that they would not be able to wait until next year if they decided to accept the recommendations of the Tariff Commission. The reason he advanced was that any such long delay would queer the pitch for submitting at least the organizational provisions of GATT for Congressional approval early next year. From a remark made by Nichols, we also gathered that, if a decision were taken in favour of tariff increases, there would be great pressure on the President to put them into effect without delay and only afterwards to discuss compensatory concessions with other interested countries.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSIONS'S RECOMMENDATIONS ON LEAD AND ZINC

I am reproducing below the text of an Aide Mémoire, in reply to the questions which were raised by Mr. Waugh, which I should be grateful if you would present to the State Department.

In any oral explanation as to why we regard equivalent domestic subsidies as the lesser of the two evils you might give the following reasons:

(1) Adoption of Tariff Commission's recommendations would be a serious blow to the GATT and in the opinion of the Canadian Government would constitute a breach of the Trade Agreement with Canada, whereas a subsidy, though regrettable, would not constitute a breach of our Trade Agreement.

(2) Even though a domestic subsidy would encourage uneconomic production, it at least would have the advantage that it would not raise prices to United States consumers and hence would not discourage consumption or encourage the use of substitutes (in these respects, of course, it is unlike the agricultural price supports).

We have also had in mind the following further considerations although the State Department might not wish to mention these to the Treasury since they might be taken as confirming the latter's view that subsidies will be costly:

(1) In the case of a domestic subsidy, the cost of the protection is more readily apparent and the public is more conscious of the price which it is having to pay for the protection of these industries.

(2) There would be more opportunities for considering the removal of the subsidy since presumably appropriation would be required annually and any legislation embodying a subsidy would be more likely to have a terminal date.

We assume that the United States is not expecting any further views from us concerning our willingness to join in a renegotiation of the lead and zinc items in the event that they were to refrain at this stage both from raising tariff rates and introducing a subsidy. This is obviously something which would have to be considered if such a proposal were put to us. (Your paragraph 4 accurately reflects the thinking here at official level. You will appreciate that, particularly in view of our desire to keep unbindings of present schedules to a minimum, we would contemplate the renegotiation of such important items only with reluctance, even if significant counter-concessions could be found.)

Text of Aide Mémoire begins: The Canadian Government reiterates the views expressed in its Note of May 28 that any interference with the trade in lead and zinc which would hinder the continued development of adequate and efficient sources of supply and encourage uneconomic production in the United States would be against the interests of the United States and the free world generally. That Note also recalled that the present rates of duty on these items were negotiated and bound in a Trade Agreement with Canada and that they are regarded in Canada as one of the cornerstones of commercial arrangements with the United States.

The Canadian Government therefore holds to the view that the President should not accept the Tariff Commission's recommendation. This view is maintained notwithstanding the knowledge that the United States Government is considering subsidizing domestic production of lead and zinc as an alternative to an increase in the tariff rates on these commodities. It is assumed of course that the rate of any domestic subsidy which might be considered as an alternative would not be more than the increase in duty which has been recommended by the Tariff Commission.

Even though the payment of a subsidy on domestic production would be regrettable because it would tend to encourage uneconomic production, there is no clearly defined legal basis on which an outside country might object to the introduction of such a subsidy in the United States. Text ends.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATION
ON LEAD AND ZINC

We presented the aide-mémoire yesterday evening to Sam Waugh, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs. Our conversation with him was short and informal since it came at the very end of a day on which it had been announced that the President had accepted the Tariff Commission's recommendations on watches and watch movements. However, we thought it advisable to mention to him orally the first two of the reasons you listed for considering equivalent domestic subsidies as a lesser evil than tariff increases. We did not refer to the other two reasons for your preference.

2. Waugh told us that the aide-mémoire was just what the State Department wanted; and he gave us clearly to understand that he would be making immediate use of it in trying to avoid a decision by the President to accept the Tariff Commission's recommendations on lead and zinc. His only further comment related to the sentence in the second paragraph of the aide-mémoire in which the assumption is expressed "that the rate of any domestic subsidy which might be considered as an alternative would not be more than the increase in duty which has been recommended by the Tariff Commission". Waugh told us that, since we had seen him on the 21st of July, there had been a shift in opinion and that what was now being considered was a subsidy of two, three or four cents per pound on the first 200 tons produced each year in any given mine. The idea of a subsidy on all production of lead and zinc has apparently now been relegated to the background.

3. Although the President's decision on watches and watch movements, in our opinion, will be extremely damaging because of its inevitable effects on foreign public opinion, particularly in Europe, we nevertheless think that it may improve the chances of the President rejecting the recommendations on lead and zinc. We have several times expressed the view that the White House came to the conclusion last May that some recommendations of the Tariff Commission under the escape-clause procedure must be accepted in order to prove to Senator Millikin and his protectionist friends that the escape-clause has not become a dead letter. That has now been resoundingly demonstrated. In consequence, the President may not now feel under the same compulsion to elect to bring assistance to producers of lead and zinc in this country by raising the tariff. This is, of course, mere speculation. Nothing that Waugh said yesterday evening would give colour to it, and we may prove mistaken. The only certain thing is that no decision has yet been taken and that the battle between subsidies and tariff increases still goes on.

LEAD AND ZINC

At the meeting with Merchant reported in our telegram under reference we had asked how the stockpile figures indicated in the President's decision were arrived at. As you know, the main measure decided upon by the President is an expanded stockpiling programme and the President has stated that in this fiscal year the government could purchase up to 200,000 tons of lead and 300,000 tons of zinc.

2. Getzin of the Office of Materials Policy, State Department, has now given Chappell further information. He said that the figures represented roughly the difference between present stockpile holdings and the stockpile targets for the two metals. He explained that the "excess supply" of zinc at present held by American smelters and consumers was about 200,000 tons, i.e., 100,000 tons less than what the President had said the government could purchase in this fiscal year. He had no estimate of the corresponding "excess supply" of lead. When we asked him what he envisaged the situation would be should the increased stockpiling be insufficient, he replied that they hoped that with respect to zinc the forces of supply and demand would operate to maintain a balance once the 200,000 tons "excess supply" had been stockpiled. He could not be as specific concerning lead. He stated, however, that there is nothing permanent about stockpile targets and that they are subject to periodic review.

3. Concerning the mechanics of the stockpiling programme, Getzin said that his information was that ODM would issue directives to GSA to purchase on a monthly basis. The plan appears to be that monthly intakes into the stockpile will be closely linked to the demand supply positions obtaining at the time.

4. We cannot escape the impression that there is not much confidence on the part of officials that the President's measures will in fact solve the problem. At best the hope exists that the measures which the President has ordered will prove to be just sufficient to scrape through, assuming favourable conditions. But for how long this palliative might hold is not at all clear to us. One factor is the size of the stockpile which the Administration will be willing to accumulate. There can be no certainty that the stockpiling programme for this fiscal year will in fact mop up the domestic surpluses particularly if the programme brings about a rise in price which will encourage both greater domestic production and increased imports. (In this connection see August 23 issue of Journal of Commerce). On the other hand, the President places some hope on "the high rate of consumption which is indicated by the general economic outlook". But if the general level of business activity should decline in the coming months, then it seems fairly clear that the Administration will again come under pressure to take further action. In this connection, you will have seen that the President put himself on record on the question of the adequacy of increased tariff protection: ". . . I am convinced that a serious question exists as to the magnitude of the direct benefits that could be expected from the recommended tariff increases".¹¹⁴

¹¹⁴ Le 25 août 1954, Eisenhower a rejeté la recommandation de la Commission des tarifs concernant le plomb et le zinc. De préférence, il a accepté de constituer des réserves gouvernementales de 200 000 tonnes de plomb et de 300 000 tonnes de zinc. Voir: /

TARIFF COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS ON IMPORTS OF OATS

The Canadian Ambassador presents his compliments to the Secretary of State and has the honour to refer to the recommendation which has now been made by the United States Tariff Commission to the President of the United States to impose quantitative restrictions on imports of oats.¹¹⁵ In view of the many dangers inherent in the application of import restrictions, the Government of Canada earnestly hopes that the United States will not apply restrictions against the trade in oats.

2. In December of 1953 the Canadian Government entered into a short term interim arrangement, at the request of the Government of the United States, to limit Canadian exports of oats.¹¹⁶ It was the understanding of the Canadian Government that this restriction was to continue in force only for a short period and that the trade in oats would be restored to a normal basis, free of restrictions, as quickly as possible. It is therefore the hope of the Canadian Government that the United States will now remove its restrictions from the importation of oats.

3. In the view of the Canadian Government there is little likelihood of the United States Government's marketing plans for oats being upset during the forthcoming year because of imports of Canadian oats. The adoption of more flexible price support policies in the United States and the continuation of serious drought should considerably reduce the threat of a further large-scale accumulation of oats. In addition, according to the latest unofficial estimate the production of oats in the prairie provinces (which are the principal source of export oats in Canada) is likely to fall to 219 million bushels in the crop year 1954-55 and perhaps lower. This is substantially below the crop years 1952-53 and 1953-54 when production was 346 million bushels and 276 million bushels respectively. Furthermore, United States importers have always purchased Canadian oats because of high quality and heavy weight. This year there is no doubt that a low quality crop is in prospect.

4. The Canadian Government notes that the quota of 40 million bushels per annum recommended by the Tariff Commission is approximately the average of ¹¹⁵ Le 27 septembre 1954, la Commission des tarifs a recommandé l'imposition d'un contingent d'importation annuel de 40 millions de boisseaux, toutes provenances confondues.

The United States Tariff Commission recommended an annual import quota of 40 million bushels from all sources on September 27, 1954.

¹¹⁶ Voir/See Volume 19, Document 863.

imports during the preceding five crop years. Since the Tariff Commission apparently feels that this average is representative of normal trade and is in fact based on the actual trade in recent years, there seems to be little point in disturbing trade by the introduction of restrictions which, while seriously disturbing established channels of trade, may not, in fact, change its basic volume or character.

5. There is little doubt that the application of restrictions to imports of oats would seriously damage this trade. The Canadian Government is particularly disturbed by the fact that no time limit has been placed on the recommended restrictions. Since this is a matter which must be kept under continuous review as supply conditions change, it would have been reasonable to expect that a one-year limit would be attached to the recommendation. If the President does accept the recommendation for a quota on the import of oats, the Canadian Government strongly urges that the quota should be effective for not more than one year.

6. The United States Government negotiated a tariff concession on oats with Canada under the terms of the trade agreement which is presently in force between Canada and the United States. Any long-term impairment of this concession would be seriously regarded by the Government of Canada.

7. Although Canada has been the major supplier of oats to the United States, there is a distinct possibility that other countries whose crops mature at an earlier date might attempt to disrupt traditional patterns of trade by flooding the market with their product before the Canadian crop is ready for shipment. When the Canadian crop became available there would be similar tendency on the part of Canadian exporters. In order to minimize the disruption to markets which could result from these developments because of a sudden flood of imports, the Canadian Government would regard it in the interest of all concerned to allocate any quota amongst supplying countries on an historical basis.

U.S. TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS ON OATS

We have delivered to the State Department this morning the Canadian note embodied in your telegram EX-1786.

2. Early yesterday we learned from the State Department that a meeting was to be held at the White House that afternoon under the chairmanship of Gabriel Hauge, Administrative Assistant to the President for Economic Affairs. State Department officials said that they would be grateful to receive any Canadian comments on the Tariff Commission's recommendations before the meeting was held at the White House. Although your instructions had not yet arrived, we thought we should take advantage of this invitation, since otherwise our representations might come too late to have much bearing on the decision. We therefore called at noon yesterday on Carl Corse, Chief of the Commercial Policy Staff in the State Department. Wynne Plumptre was kind enough to come along in order to add weight to what we had to say.

3. After explaining that a note was on its way, we told Corse that we would like to anticipate its contents. Our remarks might not at all points coincide exactly with the line taken in the note. But we thought that, although we were speaking without formal instructions, we could nevertheless accurately represent the views of the Canadian Government.

4. The Canadian Government would find it very regrettable if the President should decide to accept the recommendations of the Tariff Commission, we stated. The restriction that had been proposed on oats would seriously interfere with the trade across the border which was of such great importance to both countries; and ministers both of the United States and Canada at the meeting of the Joint Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs had agreed last March on the desirability of avoiding such action. Pressures were accumulating in Canada for increased protection against imports from the United States, and these pressures would be harder to resist if the President accepted the recommendations on oats.

5. Such action would constitute an infringement of the existing trade agreement between Canada and the United States and as such could not be lightly regarded by the Canadian Government. In addition, a further demonstration that the United States administration was unable to bring its practice in the field of agricultural imports into conformity with Article XI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade would certainly make it more difficult to negotiate successfully a revision of the agreement at the forthcoming review session. These were the broad grounds which formed the basis for the hope of the Canadian Government that the recommendations might be rejected.

6. We then went on to provide some figures concerning Canadian production and export of oats in order to suggest that there was nothing in the present scene to threaten the market for oats in the United States. In this part of our remarks we based ourselves on the evidence given by George McIvor before the Tariff Commission on the 8 of September. The acreage under oats in the Prairie Provinces had declined sharply from its peak in 1943. In the last crop year the total production of oats in Canada had amounted to some 404 million bushels. But about a third of this total had been produced in Eastern Canada, which is a deficit area. Of the approximately 273 million bushels grown in the Prairie Provinces and the Peace River district, only some 90 million bushels had entered into commercial channels; and, of this amount, approximately 50 million bushels were required domestically. Exports of oats from Canada to the United States had varied considerably from year to year, but it did not seem to the Canadian authorities that the supply position in Canada need cause concern in this country. Moreover, this year there had been a poor harvest, which would result in a marked decline in oats production.

7. To sum up, we repeated that the proposed restriction could not fail to have unfortunate results on the trade between Canada and the United States and also on the GATT review. In the light of the supply position in Canada, it would also seem to be unnecessary. We therefore had no doubt that the Canadian Government would very much regret it if the recommendations were accepted.

8. If, contrary to our hopes, a quota was imposed, we strongly urged that it should not be for an indefinite period as the Tariff Commission had recommended but should be limited to one year. We recalled that the President himself, in his letter to the Prime Minister of the 31st of March 1954 concerning the restrictions imposed on imports of rye, had drawn attention to the fact that those restrictions were for a one-year period only. We hoped, at the very least, that the President would find it possible to put a similar limit on any quota that might be imposed on oats.

9. We also pointed out that the Tariff Commission had recommended merely a global quota and had said nothing about allocating the quota to various countries. Traditionally, Canada had supplied the bulk of United States imports of oats, with only comparatively negligible quantities coming from other countries. In order to avoid flooding the market, with the attendant damage that might be done to orderly marketing, we hoped that if the President accepted the Tariff Commission's recommendations, he would amend them in his proclamation by adding that the quota would be allocated among supplying countries on the basis of the import figures for some representative base period.

10. Plumptre then added some very effective remarks based on his experience as the official in the Department of Finance responsible for the Canadian tariff and on his activities in preparation for the GATT review. He mentioned some of the recent visits that he has received from Canadian manufacturers anxious to obtain higher protection against United States imports and added that, almost without exception, they complained that, while Canada was abiding by its obligations under the General Agreement, the United States was running up a growing list of infractions. If these fresh recommendations by the Tariff Commission were accepted by the President, the possibility of resisting pressures in Canada for increased protection would be further reduced. He also emphasized that Canadian officials have become more and more doubtful about the possibility of successfully negotiating a revision of the agreement, largely because of the inability of the United States to respect the agricultural provisions it contains at present. He felt sure that, if the action recommended by the Tariff Commission were taken, the risk of failure at Geneva would become even greater.

11. Corse had virtually nothing to say during the meeting. But he took careful notes of all our remarks (which were made rather more meticulously and pontifically than usual in view of the possibility that they might be the only Canadian representations that could be effective) and said that he would relay them fully and faithfully to the meeting that was to be held at the White House later in the day.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATION ON OATS

After speaking over the telephone to Mr. Howe on Thursday morning (September 30) I spoke to Sam Waugh, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, to stress at a higher level the importance we attached to having any quota that the President might decide to impose on oats limited to a duration of one year. Waugh admitted that he was not very familiar with this issue but promised to look into it and speak to me again. He has telephoned this morning to say that Gabriel Hauge, Administrative Assistant to the President for Economic Affairs is flying to Denver today to place concerted recommendations before the President. Waugh gave me to understand that although a quota would almost certainly be imposed, our desire that it be limited to one year would be met. We believe that the President's decision is likely to be released on Monday, October 4.¹¹⁷

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATION — BARLEY
AND BARLEY MALT

1. The immediately following teletype contains the text of the Note for transmittal to the State Department regarding the Tariff Commission's recommendation to increase the duty applicable to barley and barley malt.

¹¹⁷ Le 4 octobre 1954, Eisenhower a imposé un contingent d'importation global de 40 millions de boisseaux pour un an, dont le Canada a reçu 39 312 000. Voir/Eisenhower imposed a global import quota of 40 million bushels for one year on October 4, 1954. Canada was given an allocation of 39,312,000 bushels. See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXI, No. 801, November 1, 1954, pp. 657-658.

2. When presenting this Note you should emphasize in particular that, in the view of the Canadian Government, there is no justification for the imposition of any form of restriction against malting barley and barley malt. You should therefore indicate that we are confident that the President will reject this proposal. You should make the point, however, that if the President does not intend to reject this recommendation, Canadian authorities would wish to have an opportunity to discuss this matter again. (As a matter of tactics this may mean another trip to the State Department possibly as early as tomorrow).

3. For your own information if it becomes clear that an increase in the tariff is unavoidable, we would wish to have an opportunity to request that it be limited to one year and to explore the possibility of making some special arrangement (i.e. an exception) for malting barley. In addition, we would wish to request that imports of barley malt be exempted from the higher duties or failing this, that a separate tariff quota be established for this product, perhaps in the same manner as a separate quota was set up in 1941 for wheat flour as distinct from milling wheat. The trade in this product is small and contracts usually require monthly shipments over twelve months. Under the higher tariff there is the danger that this trade would be seriously disturbed in any scramble to fill the 22.5 million bushel quota at the lower rate.

4. In our proposed Note we have not mentioned the points set out in our preceding paragraph (with the exception of our offer in paragraph 6 relating to segregating feed and malting barleys), since we consider that by doing so or by revealing orally our "second preference" at the same time the note is delivered, we might compromise our stand that there are no grounds for the imposition of any restrictions. You are however authorized at your discretion to put these points to the State Department when and if it is clear that the President plans to accept the Tariff Commission Recommendation as it now stands.

TELEGRAM EX-1844

Ottawa, October 7, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

The following is the text of the note referred to in my immediately preceding teletype:

"1. The Canadian Ambassador presents his compliments to the Secretary of State and has the honour to refer to the Recommendation which has been made by the United States Tariff Commission to the President to impose an additional duty of 8 cents per bushel on imports of barley and barley malt in excess of 22.5 million bushels in each year beginning October 1. The Government of Canada is seriously disturbed by this recommendation, the implementation of which would not be in the interest either of Canada or of the United States. The Canadian Government therefore earnestly and confidently hopes that the President will reject this proposal to restrict trade by imposing a higher rate of duty against imports.

2. The trade in barley and barley malt which has been of substantial benefit to both Canada and the United States is well established and of long standing. It will be recalled that in order to facilitate the movement of barley, Canada and the United States negotiated a reduction in 1938 in the duty applicable to this product, a concession which was bound in the trade agreement which entered into force between the two countries in January, 1939. The item was again negotiated and rebound at Geneva in 1947. Thus the existing rate of 7 1/2 cents per bushel is at present bound under the GATT, which is the trade agreement currently in force between Canada and the United States. The rate of duty applicable to barley malt was also negotiated with Canada and is bound against increase under the GATT. Any impairment of these long standing contractual obligations would be seriously regarded by the Government of Canada.

3. In the view of the Canadian Government there is, in fact, no reasonable justification for imposing additional restrictions on trade in these commodities. Imports of Canadian barley into the United States have been used almost entirely for malting purposes. The demand for Canadian barley stems from the fact that high grade barley required for malting purposes is grown in Canada and that sufficient quantities of this type of barley are not produced in the United States to meet the requirements of domestic malting interests. To impose an additional duty of 8 cents per bushel on imports in excess of 22.5 million bushels will thus serve only to raise the price of good quality malting barley to United States maltsters without increasing domestic output.

4. The attention of the Canadian Government has been drawn to the fact that during the hearings before the Tariff Commission it was pointed out by United States malting industry that they have attempted to increase their purchases of malting barley from domestic sources but that they were not able to obtain sufficient quantities of the required quality. In this regard, they reported that they had carefully examined stocks held by the United States Government in the hope of obtaining additional supplies. In spite of these endeavours, domestic availabilities have fallen short of their requirements. It is the view of the Canadian Government that this might be taken as strong and indeed conclusive evidence that a shortage exists in the United States of good quality malting barley.

5. It is also important to take into account a number of new factors which are likely further to restrict the supply of malting barley. First, the adoption of more flexible price support policies in the United States is likely to reduce rather than increase production in the United States. Secondly, adverse weather conditions during the past crop year in Canada have seriously reduced the crop and lowered its quality. Under the adverse growing conditions which have prevailed in Western Canada, it is certain that an unusually high percentage of the barley crop will not be of sufficiently high grade for malting purposes.

6. While there may be considerable stocks of feed barley on hand, feed barley is a distinct and separate product from malting barley. Canadian exports to the United States of feed barley have been small and the Canadian Government could give assurance that they would not increase appreciably. The Canadian Government has already raised this point with the United States Government and is willing to discuss this proposal in further detail at any time.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS
ON BARLEY AND BARLEY MALT

This afternoon at the State Department we presented your note to Carl Corse, Chief of the Commercial Policy Staff. As you know, Sam Waugh, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, is in Ottawa. In his absence we would have preferred to make our representations to Kalijarvi, the Deputy Assistant Secretary. But he was not available this afternoon and we thought it would be unwise to defer submitting the note until tomorrow.

2. We began by telling Corse that, in the view of the Canadian authorities, no case had been made out for additional restrictions against imports of barley. Presumably the United States authorities were concerned over the problems connected with the production of feed grains in the United States. For the most part, shipments of barley from Canada had no bearing on these problems, since Canadian imports, with few exceptions, were not used for feed but were consigned to United States maltsters. The Canadian authorities therefore hoped and expected that the President would reject the recommendations of the Tariff Commission.

3. After making these oral remarks, we handed Corse the note. His attention fastened principally on the final paragraph about which he had the following questions to ask:

- (a) How could barley for malting purposes be distinguished from feed barley?
- (b) How could the Canadian authorities regulate the export of feed barley and ensure that malting barley was in fact used for that purpose after it had been shipped to the United States?
- (c) In the opinion of the Canadian authorities, what would be a suitable figure for shipments of feed barley during the coming year to the United States?
- 4. In reply to Corse's first question, Hopper explained that malting barley ordinarily commands a considerable premium over feed barley and is indeed a separable commodity. On the question of regulation and control, we said that the Canadian authorities felt confident that they could limit the shipments of feed barley to the United States in the same way as they had limited shipments of oats over the past year. So far as malting barley was concerned, the Canadian Wheat Board could require that its agents secure certificates from the importers to ensure that the barley in question was actually used for malting purposes. In reply to Corse's final question, we ventured the tentative opinion that an appropriate figure for shipments of feed barley to the United States over the next twelve months might be five million bushels.

5. When Corse showed some inclination to pursue these and other subsidiary issues, however, we said frankly that we did not want to blunt the force of our argument that there was no case for additional barriers against imported barley by being drawn off to consider minor issues. We thought that the President should reject the recommendations. What possibility was there that he would in fact decide to do so?

6. Corse replied that he did not know. But on the basis of the President's past performance in dealing with Tariff Commission findings made under Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, he saw little prospect that the President would entirely reject the recommendations. He also reminded us that the mid-term elections are now less than a month away. In the light of that reply, we suggested that the next step should be for him to report our representations as quickly as possible to the White House. If he, after consulting the White House, still thought that there was little or no chance that the President would decline to take any action, we would wish to make some supplementary representations. He agreed with that procedure and said that he would be getting in touch with us as soon as possible tomorrow morning.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS ON BARLEY MALT

The meeting between Mitchell Sharp and Gabriel Hauge which was held yesterday afternoon showed

- (a) That the administration still has an open mind on this issue;
- (b) That the White House is anxious to reach a compromise that might be reasonably satisfactory to the Canadian Government;

(c) That, in the view of the U.S. authorities, something must be done to implement at least a part of the Tariff Commission's recommendations, and

(d) That this problem is not regarded as one of such political urgency that precipitate action must be taken.

2. Sharp began by saying that the Canadian Government sympathized with the difficulties which had been created for the United States Administration by the price support policies it had inherited. This sympathy had been manifested by the action which the Canadian Government had been prepared to take last year to impose voluntary restrictions on exports of oats to the U.S. and by the comparatively mild Canadian reaction to the recommendation of the Tariff Commission this year that there should be an import quota on oats. Highly objectionable as were any increased restrictions on trade, the Canadian Government recognized that if they had been operating within legislation similar to that now on the books in the U.S., they probably would have felt obliged to prevent foreign imports from entering in any greatly increased volume to take advantage of the support prices. The barley issue, however, seemed quite different and the Canadian authorities could not see how further restrictions placed in the path of imports from Canada could ease the problem with which the U.S. Government was wrestling. Mr. Howe wanted it known that he would take a very serious view of action pursuant to the Tariff Commission's recommendations.

3. Malting barley must be considered as quite separate from feed barley, Sharp contended; and there was a strong consumer preference among U.S. brewmasters for Canadian barley. This trade had been deliberately and carefully developed by the establishment of special grades in Canada and by the development of strains specially adapted for malting. The Canadian Government could not believe that the U.S. authorities would wish to interfere with this growing trade which was based on a marked consumer preference. At an earlier stage the Canadian Government had suggested informally that they would be willing to limit exports of feed barley to the U.S. over the next twelve months and to require that exporters wishing to ship malting barley to the U.S. should furnish to the Canadian Wheat Board certificates from the importers to guarantee that malting barley would be used for that purpose. He was empowered, he said, to renew that offer at the present time.

4. Hauge opened his reply by saying that the comments of the interested agencies on the Tariff Commission's recommendations had not yet been received by the White House. The issue, therefore, was still open. He also remarked that one of his problems was to maintain the morale of the Tariff Commissioners, who had seen most of their recommendations rejected by the White House. He welcomed the observations that Sharp had made, but said that he had a number of questions to ask.

5. He first enquired about the reality of the consumer preference that had been attributed to U.S. maltsters. Although admitting that it had been widely maintained in the United States as well as in Canada that Canadian malting barley was preferred by the malting industry here, he said that this claim had been challenged; and he would be interested to receive further information on this point. Secondly, he was concerned over what would happen to barley produced in the United States that was rejected by the U.S. brewmasters in favour of Canadian barley. Surely such barley would then be used for feed or be offered to the Commodity Credit Corporation and so increase the difficulties of the Department of Agriculture in operating its price support programme. His third worry was over the problem of distinguishing between malting and feed barley. From such information as he had, it seemed to him that United States brewmasters could use very different types of barley. Finally, he wondered what was the possibility that, if Canadian supplies of feed barley were to be voluntarily limited in accordance with Sharp's suggestion, other countries might increase their shipments, as had happened in the case of oats.

6. The whole tenor of Hauge's questioning implied that the distinction between feed barley and malting barley was not so clear as had been suggested and, further, that United States and Canadian malting barley were, in fact, roughly interchangeable.

7. Taking up Hauge's first question, McNamara of the Canadian Wheat Board explained that the identity of carload shipments of Canadian malting barley was preserved until they reached their final destination. Purchasers of Canadian malting barley were required to pay to the producer a premium of 5 cents in addition to the premium paid by the Canadian Wheat Board. U.S. maltsters preferred Canadian barley because they could rely on its comparatively uniform quality and because it met their strict standards. McNamara also drew attention to the fact that high quality barley for malting purposes seemed to be grown each year in more and more northerly latitudes. This was true within the United States as well as within Canada and accounted, he believed, in large measure for the preference shown by U.S. maltsters for Canadian barley. One danger inherent in the recommendations of the Tariff Commission, he went on to say, was that Canadian exporters might rush to take up the proposed tariff quota with feed barley, so that most of the imported malting barley required in the U.S. would have to pay the additional 8 cent import fee.

8. Hauge listened intently to all of the arguments presented by Sharp and McNamara and said that he wished this problem to be sifted thoroughly. For that purpose he suggested that a meeting should be arranged in the Department of Agriculture at which all of the interested agencies could be represented. We will be reporting in a later message on what transpired at that further meeting.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS ON BARLEY
AND BARLEY MALT

Please repeat to: M.W. Sharp, Associate Deputy Minister, Department of Trade and Commerce, Ottawa, from Hopper, Begins: The meeting yesterday morning was held in the office of Earl Butz, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, who acted as Chairman. Others in attendance from the United States besides Butz, were McPhee of Dr. Hauge's staff, Whitesell of Customs, Corse and Southworth of the Department of State, and Burmeister, Scholl, Case, and Borton of the Department of Agriculture. Sharp, McNamara, LePan, and Hopper attended for Canada.

2. At Butz's request, Sharp presented the Canadian views on the Tariff Commission's report, emphasizing, as he had done at the meeting of previous day with Hauge, that the proposed restrictions on imports of barley would cut across the well-established trade with Canada in malting barley which, over the years, has provided United States maltsters with the kind of barley they required. It could be construed, he said, that the purpose of the restrictions is to force United States maltsters to take varieties of barley from the United States which they do not want. He said he did not think the United States Government wished to do this. The Canadian Government, he continued, is quite familiar with the departmental problems associated with price support policies in the United States and is sympathetic with the desire of the administration to carry out the wishes of Congress as contained in the price support legislation as it applies to feed barley. Malting barley, however, is quite a different product from feed barley and commands a higher price.

3. If the United States Government decides that something must be done to limit the imports of feed barley, Mr. Sharp informed the meeting that the Canadian Government would be prepared to recommend that the Canadian Wheat Board undertake to control feed barley exports to the United States during the next 12 months, which can be accomplished under the Wheat Board legislation. If this idea were acceptable to the United States, the Wheat Board, through its agents, could require that United States importers of barley for malting purposes provide certificates that the barley would be used only for malting.

4. The United States officials referred to the trouble which had developed with a third country when Canada voluntarily restricted exports of oats to the United States. In reply to this, Sharp said that if it were agreed that, as an alternative to the Tariff Commission recommendations, Canada limit exports of feed barley, and there were no restrictions on exports of malting barley, Canada would be prepared to take the risk that another exporting country might ship feed barley in substantial quantities to the United States, and would not ask for protection against that trade. United States imports of barley from countries other than Canada were briefly reviewed and it appeared that there is little likelihood of other large barley-producing countries increasing their sales of barley in the United States, but it was agreed that this possibility does exist.

5. Butz asked if it is not true that the proposed 8 cent per bushel fee above the existing duty, after 22.5 million bushels are imported, would not represent an obstacle of any importance to United States maltsters if they needed Canadian malting barley. On this point, Sharp observed that the 8 cent fee would represent a higher price for Canadian malting barley to United States maltsters. Any duty is an obstacle to trade, and under GATT there has been a series of negotiated reductions in United States duties which encouraged Canadian barley growers to grow barley of malting quality to meet the needs of United States maltsters. McNamara pointed out that the prices of premium barley had advanced since the time of the Tariff Commission hearing and these prices are now well above the support level.

6. Burmeister said the United States barley crop was much larger than last year, and a considerable part of it had been harvested before unfavourable weather had injured its quality, but he could not say how much was of malting grades. He thought, however, that a considerable portion of the United States crop was suitable for malting. His last statement was not, said McNamara, in accordance with the opinions expressed by the representatives of the maltsters who were witnesses at the Tariff Commission's public hearings.

7. The support price in the United States for barley is an average of feed and malting barley prices, said Burmeister. The commodity credit corporation will have to take much larger quantities of barley this year than in the past. Butz remarked that the ill-conceived price support legislation of the United States does not recognize the difference between malting and feed barley and, therefore, growers are not much interested in going to the extra trouble of selecting barley for malting purposes.

8. McNamara outlined the Canadian plan for the production of malting barley, and how it is kept separate from feed barley, as he had done during the meeting with Dr. Hauge. He said that the 5 cent per bushel, which is paid to growers for the extra work entailed in the production of malting barley, is in addition to the higher prices which malting barley usually commands in the market. McNamara said it was the general opinion that the production of barley for malting is moving northward; that Wisconsin, where once large quantities of malting barley were produced, no longer is considered a malting barley state. According to the United States maltsters, he continued, the climate and soil conditions in certain areas of the prairie provinces of Canada are particularly suitable for the production of malting barley which has characteristics desired by maltsters.

9. Butz remarked that he was personally opposed to barriers to trade, but Congress, he said, has given us a law to administer. He thought that price supports for barley would likely be lower next year and the present situation is somewhat of a temporary one.

10. Sharp and McNamara pointed out that the Canadian barley crop has suffered from unfavourable growing and harvesting conditions, and Canada will not have a large quantity of barley of malting quality to export. Therefore, they asked, why introduce restrictions in a year when they are likely to be unnecessary. The application of restrictions which would require United States maltsters to pay 8 cent more per bushel for Canadian barley after the proposed quota is filled will tend, they said, to disrupt a trade in a premium product which Canadian growers, after considerable effort, have developed over the years to meet the requirements of United States maltsters. Increased Canadian exports of malting barley have not been the result of the price support policies of the United States, but rather because of the high quality of Canadian barley.

11. The President believes that any import restrictions which are adopted by the United States should be for one year only, said McPhee. He wondered if this fact would not contribute to a solution of the problem which is being discussed.

12. McNamara brought out the point, which he advanced in the meeting of the previous day, that if the Tariff Commission recommendations are adopted it could mean that a substantial part of the 22.5 million bushel quota could be filled with feed barley, which the United States does not want and, as a result, United States maltsters would be deprived of that quantity at existing rates of duty. On the other hand, if the Canadian proposal of limiting feed barley imports by the Canadian Wheat Board to an agreed upon quantity, and requiring certificates from United States importers of malting barley were accepted, the danger that there would be large imports of feed barley would be avoided if other exporting countries did not increase their exports to the United States.

13. More restrictions on imports from Canada will not be well received by Canadians, and by the Canadian Government, Sharp warned, and why, he asked, adopt import restrictions which will not be to the advantage of either country but which are more likely to disturb the good relations which now exist. As a representative of the Canadian Government we are often asked, he continued, why Canada observes the principles of GATT when the United States does not. Both our governments are favourable to the liberalization of trade.

14. Butz thanked the Canadian representatives for their attendance, and for their frank expression of views. It appeared to the Canadian representatives that while the United States officials present at the meeting were willing to listen to the alternatives suggested by Sharp and McNamara, the officials of the Department of Agriculture, in particular, tried to answer each point which was raised. This seemed to indicate that they had already made up their minds that they were not ready to accept any modification of the Tariff Commission's recommendations, it should be borne in mind, however, that the Tariff Commission did not accept the recommendations of the Department of Agriculture which were presented at the public hearing. The Commission's recommendations were more liberal than were those of the Department of Agriculture, and perhaps it is understandable that the Department of Agriculture would not be prepared to accept any change in the nature of further concessions to a country exporting barley to the United States.

15. After the meeting closed, McPhee and Whitesall followed the Canadian representatives out of the room and in the outside office McPhee said he had an idea he would like to advance as an alternative to the proposals by Canada. He emphasised that it was his own personal idea and was not official. His suggestion was that the proposed tariff quota of 22.5 million bushels be increased by an amount equal to the amount of feed barley Canada would expect to export to the United States in the next 12 months, and that the Canadian authorities would undertake to control the exports of feed barley to the proportion agreed upon of the total quota. This plan would have the advantage to the United States of preventing any country from flooding the United States with barley and would assure United States maltsters of obtaining the major part of the quota in the form of malting barley from Canada at existing rates of duty. Moreover, it would be a compromise, he thought, that was not very different from the Tariff Commission's recommendations, but would be a concession which might be acceptable to Canada. McPhee's suggestion was left over for later consideration by the United States and Canadian authorities. Ends.

ON BARLEY AND BARLEY MALT

A meeting was held in Carl Corse's office in the State Department this morning to enable us to transmit the reactions of the Canadian authorities to the two compromise solutions that had emerged during the visit of Sharp and McNamara to Washington.

2. To avoid any misunderstanding, we began by outlining the alternative solutions.

(a) Under the first alternative, the Canadian authorities would voluntarily restrict exports of feed barley to the United States to a limited number of bushels over the next twelve months, on condition that shipments of malting barley, duly certificated, should be allowed to enter freely without any tariff quota being established by the United States.

(b) Under the second alternative, the Canadian authorities would voluntarily restrict exports of feed barley to the United States to a fixed number of bushels, on condition that the tariff quota proposed by the Tariff Commission was increased by the same figure. The tariff quota would be allocated among supplying countries on the basis of some historical period so as to ensure that Canada would receive almost the whole of the quota. Moreover, the tariff quota would run for only one year. We then reported that Mr. Howe had said that he did not have any preference as between these two possible compromise solutions. Subject to agreement being reached on the quantity of feed barley to be shipped to the United States, he would be willing to accept either of the two solutions and defend it publicly.

3. When we had completed these opening remarks, Corse said that he thought there was some misunderstanding about the proposal which had been informally advanced by McPhee of Hauge's office in the White House. The Department of Agriculture thought that what was being suggested was not a somewhat enlarged tariff quota but an absolute quota. We replied that we felt sure that Mr. Howe's comments related to a tariff quota and we thought this point should be cleared up before the discussion went any further. We then withdrew and Corse consulted both McPhee and the Department of Agriculture over the telephone.

4. As a result of these consultations, Corse said, when we were called in again, that the United States authorities would like consideration to be given in Ottawa to three possible solutions.

(a) The first solution was the one suggested by Sharp at the meeting in Hauge's office on the 11th of October. It is set out in sub-paragraph 2(a) above.

(b) Under the second possible compromise, the Canadian authorities would restrict exports of feed barley to X-million bushels on condition that the tariff quota of 22.5 million bushels recommended by the Tariff Commission was increased by the same X-million bushels.

(c) Under the third possibility the Canadian authorities would restrict exports of feed barley to the United States to X-million bushels and the United States would impose an absolute quota of 22.5 million bushels increased by the same X-million bushels and by an additional Y-million bushels. Our only comment of the third possibility was that it seemed to run counter to the Tariff Commission's recommendations and we doubted whether it would prove attractive in Ottawa. However, we agreed to report it to you at once and seek your reactions.

5. You may be interested to know that Corse told us that the Department of Agriculture is still standing firm for the recommendations of the Tariff Commission and is opposed to each and all of the compromises listed above. For any one of them to win acceptance, the Department of Agriculture would have to be overruled by the White House. Corse also said that the Department of Agriculture was opposed with particular tenacity to the compromise that had been suggested on the Canadian side because they were apprehensive about the risk of increased shipments from third countries which they would not be able to control. He, therefore, was personally inclined to doubt whether this solution would be ultimately accepted by the White House.

6. There was one minor point which he hoped we would be able to clear up. If the United States imposed a tariff quota on barley and if, concurrently, the Canadian authorities gave a voluntary undertaking to restrict exports of feed barley to the United States, would this restriction be absolute? We replied that we felt sure that was your intention. In other words, Canada would be limiting not only the quantity of feed barley to enter the United States within the tariff quota but all feed barley crossing the border. However, we agreed to seek confirmation of this point.

7. Finally, you should know that we were told by Corse that the White House would like to be in a position to take whatever United States action may be necessary by this Saturday, the 16th of October, at the latest.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS
ON BARLEY AND BARLEY MALT

After we had been informed by Mitchell Sharp at noon today of the conversation earlier this morning between Mr. Howe and Mr. Stewart, we telephoned Corse at the State Department to let him know what Mr. Howe had told the United States Ambassador. Mr. Howe had said, we reported, that he had not understood that the United States authorities were giving consideration to an absolute quota. However, he could appreciate that an absolute quota might seem, from the United States point of view, to have some advantages over a tariff quota. He would be willing to accept an absolute quota provided it were larger than the increased tariff quota that had been under consideration. To be precise, he would be prepared to give an undertaking to limit Canadian exports of feed barley to the United States to five million bushels over the next twelve months, if the United States Government would agree to increase the proposed tariff quota to 27.5 million bushels or, alternatively, to establish an absolute quota of not less than 30 million bushels. As between those two alternatives he had no preference.

2. At 2:30 this afternoon we were again called to the State Department, where Corse told us that the United States authorities would prefer an absolute quota. The figure he proposed for the absolute quota was 27.5 million bushels. The quantity of feed barley to be exported by Canada over the next twelve months should be restricted to 3 million bushels. The United States quota would run for one year only and would be allocated so that Canada would receive 99 percent of the total.

3. When we enquired about the status of this proposal, Corse said that it was to be regarded as being put forward "by the United States Government". In other words, it had been cleared both with the White House and with the Department of Agriculture, although the latter agency had agreed only very reluctantly, he said.

4. On the figures mentioned by Corse we made only two observations. We said that since the figures proposed on the Canadian side had been chosen by Mr. Howe himself, we felt that it would be improper for us to enter into negotiations to revise them downwards. We also recalled that there had been a poor barley crop in Canada this year, with the result that there would probably be comparatively less malting barley for export and comparatively more feed barley. We promised that we would report the United States counter-proposal at once and transmit your comments as soon as they became available.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS
ON BARLEY AND BARLEY MALT

We met with Corse at the State Department at noon today to let him know the Canadian reactions to the United States counter-proposal. Following the instructions we had received over the telephone from Mitchell Sharp, we began by saying that the Canadian authorities were grateful for the time and trouble that had been taken by officers of the United States Government in considering the Canadian representations. It had been hoped in Ottawa that if an absolute quota were to be established, it would be for 30 million bushels. However, if the proposal transmitted to us yesterday at the State Department was the best that the United States Government could do, the Canadian authorities were not inclined to make any further representations. In any case, they were grateful that it had proved possible for the United States Government to go some distance towards meeting the Canadian views. The Canadian Government would be prepared to give an undertaking that it would voluntarily restrict shipments of feed barley to the United States to 3 million bushels over the twelve month period beginning on October 1, 1954, and this undertaking would be embodied in a letter to the State Department.

2. Corse then told us that after meditating on what we had said yesterday concerning the proposed quantity of feed barley to enter the United States from Canada, the United States authorities had decided that the figure could be raised to 3.5 million bushels. In reply, we said that we felt sure that this amendment to the United States proposal would be received with satisfaction in Ottawa.

3. Gabriel Hauge will be seeing the President to discuss imports of barley either tomorrow or on Monday; and it is hoped that the United States release can be issued by Monday afternoon at the latest. According to present intentions, the United States release will take note of the unilateral restriction by Canada of shipments of feed barley. Corse has assured us that we will be shown the United States draft release in time to comment on it. Since it will not be easy to agree on what should be said in the United States release concerning Canadian action until the Canadian letter to the State Department is available, at least in draft, there is very considerable urgency attached to the preparation of a letter. We understand that you are preparing a draft in Ottawa, and we will be glad to receive it as soon as possible.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS
ON BARLEY AND BARLEY MALT

Our immediately following telegram contains the text of the third person note we delivered to the State Department this morning. It had been cleared over the week-end by telephone with Mitchell Sharp. Our immediately following message also contains the text of the State Department's reply.

2. Both the Canadian and United States note will be issued as annexes to the United States press release announcing that the President has proclaimed restrictions on imports of barley under Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Hauge is seeing the President at 11:00 o'clock this morning on this matter; and it is expected that the release will be issued this afternoon at 4:00 p.m.¹¹⁸

3. The United States press release will include the following brief passage on the action being taken by Canada:

"Concurrently with the President's action, the Canadian Government, in an exchange of notes with the United States Government, has indicated that it will take voluntary action during the period of the proclamation to limit exports to this country of feed barley to 3.5 million bushels. Other Canadian exports within the Canadian share of the overall quota would consist of other kinds of barley including malting barley and barley malt."¹¹⁹

[Ottawa], January 20, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY; U.S. LEGISLATION

1. In his State of the Union address to Congress on January 7, 1954, President Eisenhower strongly supported the legislation now before the United States Congress to authorize U.S. participation in the construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway. There is every indication that this legislation has been given high priority by the Administration.

2. The principal bill before Congress is the Wiley bill which has now been reported to the Senate and placed on the Senate calendar for final reading in the amended form of bill No. S 2150. A similar bill in the House of Representatives, H.J. Res. 104 (the Dondero bill) has been considered by the House Committee on Public Works. Hearings have been held, but the Committee has not taken any decisive action.

3. On January 9, 1953,¹²⁰ the United States Ambassador was informed in a memorandum by the Prime Minister that the Canadian Government was "most reluctant to engage in any discussion which might delay the progress . . . of the plan now underway for the development of power in the International Rapids Section" but that "if the United States Government wishes to put forward a specific proposal differing from that put forward by the Canadian Government, for the construction of the Seaway in the International Section . . . the Canadian Government will be prepared to discuss such a proposal", on the understanding that such a proposal would not delay the development of power under arrangements agreed upon in the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952,¹²¹ and in the expectation that such discussion would not "cause any serious delay in the completion of the whole Seaway". Although no specific proposal has yet been made by the U.S. Government it can be assumed, in the light of the President's recent State of the Union message, that the Wiley bill, if and when it becomes law, will likely form the basis of any such proposal.

4. A vote on the Wiley bill is expected momentarily in the Senate but the Canadian Embassy at Washington reports that the Dondero bill is not likely to be passed by the House of Representatives during the present session of Congress. However, passage of the Wiley bill in the Senate by a fairly large majority and the strong support now given to this measure by the Administration might possibly provide the impetus required to enable the sponsors of the Dondero bill to get it through the House of Representatives. If this were to come about, it is clear that any representations the Canadian Government might wish to make would have to be made known, if they were to be effective, after passage of the Wiley bill in the Senate and before the Dondero bill gets through the House of Representatives. With this in mind, the Interdepartmental Committee on the St. Lawrence Project has examined the U.S. legislation to ascertain whether there were any points of substance on which the Canadian Government might usefully comment.

5. After examining the Canadian and the U.S. legislation, the Committee agreed that there was no serious conflict between the various provisions of the Wiley bill and of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act and that the fundamentals of both were reconcilable. It should be noted that the Wiley bill does not envisage joint construction and operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway by Canada and the United States. Rather, the bill contemplates that each country will construct and operate its portion of the Seaway quite independently of one another, much in the same manner as the Welland Canal and the MacArthur Lock were constructed and are operated separately. The only really "joint" aspect of the resolution is the provision that tolls may be imposed jointly by agreement between the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and the U.S. Corporation or unilaterally if agreement is not possible. There are a few minor points that might need to be ironed out, either in the American or in the Canadian Legislation, but these are not worrisome.

6. Because there are no practicable amendments that could be suggested to the Wiley bill and because, in any event, there appears to be nothing to prevent the United States or Canada from building the Seaway, or a portion thereof, entirely on their own and independently of one another, the Committee concluded that it would be inadvisable at this time for Canada to make any representations even though there are certain important ancillary matters which will have to be discussed if and when the Wiley bill becomes law. An additional consideration supporting this view is that comment by Canada at this time could scarcely be interpreted in the United States otherwise than as opposition by Canada to the proposal that the United States should build part of the Seaway. Such an interpretation might have undesirable results as regards litigation now before U.S. Courts on the St. Lawrence Power Development project. It is now expected that all litigation will have been disposed of finally before the U.S. Supreme Court adjourns for its summer recess on or about June 15th next. This might not happen, however, if the impression is created that Canada is attempting to obstruct U.S. construction of a portion of the Seaway and the U.S. Administration withdraws the vigorous support it has given to the New York State Power Authority and the Federal Power Commission before the Courts.

7. Notwithstanding that the various provisions of the Wiley bill and the Canadian Legislation are reconcilable in all important respects, there are several ancillary points of some considerable importance on which agreement will have to be reached if and when U.S. Legislation becomes a fait accompli. These are outlined hereunder:

(a) Both the Wiley bill and the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act envisage that tolls may be established internationally by some form of agreement, either between the two administering agencies or between the two governments, or unilaterally by each body. No matter which of these courses of action is eventually followed, serious problems are bound to arise because, if for no other reason, of the divergence of national interests in the various commodities that will be moving through the canals. Deadlocks may well arise if an attempt is made to establish tolls by international agreement. On the other hand, unilateral establishment of tolls on both sides of the border may result in substantially different Canadian and U.S. rates on the same commodities. If tolls are established internationally, presumably regard will also have to be had to the fact that Canada will have spent more on the Seaway between Lake Erie and Montreal than the United States. The most recent estimates on the cost of the all-Canadian Seaway, as furnished to the Committee by the Department of Transport on a confidential basis, are as follows:

Lachine Canal	$122,500,000.	(assuming that construction is independent of power development)
Soulanges Canal	47,100,000.	(does not include the $7.9 million Federal payment re common works)
Lake St. Francis	3,350,000.
International Rapids Section	88,000,000.	(does not include the $15 million for channel enlargement)
Thousand Islands	2,000,000.
Welland Canal	2,000,000.
	$264,950,000.

If the United States undertakes construction of the Seaway in the International Rapids Section and the Thousand Islands section, they will have spent approximately $90 million (U.S. and Canadian estimates are very close), as opposed to an overall Canadian capital outlay of at least $175 million. It should be noted, in this connection, that the Wiley bill provides that the proposed U.S. Corporation may borrow up to, but not in excess of $105 million.

(b) In committing itself to ensure uninterrupted 27 foot navigation between Lake Erie and Montreal, provided an acceptable power development project was undertaken in the International Rapids Section, the Canadian Government, in a Note of June 30, 1952, agreed that the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority would contribute $15 million towards certain channel enlargements to be undertaken by the power developing entities and which would be of particular benefit to navigation. If the canal in the International Rapids Section is constructed by the United States rather than Canada, it could be argued, with some logic, that the United States should pay the $15 million since the additional channel enlargement in the power pool will be a natural adjunct of the canal in the International Rapids Section. There is no provision, of course, for such a payment in the Wiley and Dondero bills.

(c) In the same Note of June 30, 1952, the Canadian Government further agreed that the cost of continuing 14 foot navigation on the Canadian side, as contemplated in the 1941 Agreement, would be excluded from the total costs to be divided between New York and Ontario in consideration of the fact that the all-Canadian Seaway would, in any event, replace 14 foot navigation in the International Rapids Section. If the deep waterway in this area is now to be on the U.S. side of the border, the question arises as to what should be done about the 14 foot canal. On the one hand, it would appear inadvisable to spend something of the order of $15 million to perpetuate an obsolescent mode of water transportation. On the other hand, the 14 foot canals may continue to serve a useful purpose for some years to come and, in any event, certain industries, particularly in the Cornwall area, may to some extent be dependent on the existing canal system. This question will obviously have to be threshed out in detail if the U.S. Government presents the approved Wiley bill as a specific proposal for Canada's consideration.¹²²

ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT

Following for the Minister, Begins: The Wiley Bill has been scheduled for limited debate in the House of Representatives on May 5, and a vote will be taken the following day. Indications are that it will pass although agreed conference version may be delayed a week or longer.

2. The Interdepartmental Committee reviewed related problems on May 3. During the meeting strong reasons were developed by R.A.C. Henry, supported by General McNaughton and others, for proceeding with a wholly Canadian seaway regardless of what the United States may propose in the International Rapids Section. It was clear, of course, that the Prime Minister's undertaking of January 1953 still stood.

3. The gist of the argument, however, was that, from Lake Erie to Montreal and the sea, the waterway had been built traditionally by Canada. While Canada had formerly agreed to improve it internationally, it had since agreed to build the canals on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section in return for a prompt joint development with the U.S.A. of the power phase. The 1941 Agreement¹²³ had been laid to rest though the Prime Minister had agreed in 1953 to discuss any specific U.S. proposal different from the Canadian proposal which would not retard the power or seaway phases.¹²⁴ Now it seems (the argument goes) that under the guise of a 'joint' venture, our American friends want to build the canals on the U.S. side of the International Rapids Section. The cost might be $86 million to the U.S., while Canada will have built works — between Lake Erie to the mouth of the St. Lawrence — which at today's costs would amount to over $700 million. As a result, the U.S.A. would acquire an unwarranted unilateral control of the seaway for something more than a tenth of the total cost. In addition, tolls would not readily be agreed upon because of the fundamentally divergent interests (cf. the history of U.S.-Canada international freight rates which have not been agreed). Besides this, the U.S. desire for control of a small but vital section in this area by construction on the U.S. side of the rapids, would ensure the application of U.S. rules regarding defence and security measures to say nothing of commercial policy. The Committee came to no conclusion because of (a) the Prime Minister's assurance of 1953 whereby Canada must consider any specific proposal and (b) the matter of an all-Canadian seaway would, at all events, require Cabinet decision sometime later.

4. The Committee considered, in addition, that Cabinet would be unlikely to take a decision until after your return from Geneva. The Committee felt, however, that questions will doubtless be asked in the House on the action expected to be taken on May 6 in the House of Representatives. The Committee has suggested that the Prime Minister might answer such questions very cautiously by explaining the remaining legislative steps to be taken in the United States, emphasizing the urgent need for power in Ontario and referring only to the undertaking of January 9, 1953, to discuss a specific proposal once the power entities have been designated and authorized to proceed and provided that such discussions do not delay the development of the whole project. It is understood that it has been agreed that the Prime Minister will deal with any such questions as may arise and that the Cabinet directive that there be no discussions with United States officials concerning the navigation works should continue to be observed until the matter can be considered further, and, if possible, until the construction of the United States portion of the power project is assured by the conclusion of litigation. Ends.

ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT

Following for the Acting Under-Secretary from the Ambassador, Begins: Thank you for letting us see the telegram on this subject which you sent yesterday to the Minister in Geneva.

2. I was very disturbed by the report it contained that Mr. Henry and General McNaughton were now arguing that the Canadian Government should proceed "with a wholly Canadian seaway regardless of what the United States may propose in the International Rapids Section", since a clear corollary of this would seem to be that the government should refuse to negotiate with the United States authorities if they were to put forward a specific proposal based on the Wiley Bill. The consequences of any such decision on relations between the United States and Canada would, in my opinion be very serious. We had the distinct impression that there was informal agreement within the government that, if the Wiley Bill were approved by Congress without substantial amendment, Canada would be willing to enter into negotiations with the United States for the construction of a seaway in which some of the canals would be on the United States side and some on the Canadian side. If our impression was mistaken (and, frankly, I cannot see how this could be), I would urge that this matter be considered and resolved in Cabinet as soon as possible after the Minister returns from Geneva.

3. My reason for urging that consideration of this question be expedited is that I think events here may run very rapidly now that the crucial vote has been taken in Congress. Senator Ferguson (Rep.-Mich.) yesterday announced that he would move to have the bill as approved by the House of Representatives also approved by the Senate without a conference, and sent immediately to the President for signature. This is a not uncommon procedure in cases where the differences between the bills as passed by the two houses are slight; and it may well be adopted. In that event, the President might well be in a position to sign the bill early next week.

4. It would also be incautious, I think, to count on very much time elapsing between the moment when the President signs the bill and the moment when we are presented with a specific proposal. Some months ago, before there was the present embargo on discussions with United States authorities of the navigation side of the project, we learned informally from State Department officials that one procedure they were considering adopting, in the event the bill secured congressional approval, was to send us a very brief note to which the new law would be attached and which would request that Canada enter into negotiations for the construction of a seaway in which the United States would participate along the lines indicated in the measure just approved by Congress. Although such a proposal might not be so detailed as we would like, it would be perhaps as specific as the proposal for an all-Canadian seaway contained in the exchange of notes of the 30th of June, 1952. Accordingly, we must reckon with the possibility that we may be faced very shortly with a United States proposal.

5. On the issue of whether we should be prepared to negotiate with the United States on a proposal based on the bill as now approved by Congress, I am convinced (whatever one may think of the Wiley Bill) that there can now be only one decision. Canada cannot refuse such an invitation to negotiate without exposing itself to charges of bad faith that would have far-reaching consequences for relations between the two countries. In our telegram No. 80 of January 16th† we referred to some of the events which have built up a strong presumption within the United States Government and in the public mind that we would be prepared to negotiate on the basis of the Wiley Bill if it were passed without substantial amendment. That presumption has been strengthened as more months have passed without any indication being given that the arrangements contemplated in the Wiley Bill would be unacceptable in Canada.

6. I appreciate that such a decision will cause keen regret in many quarters in Canada. Ever since Champlain labelled it on one of his maps "La grande rivière du Canada", the St. Lawrence has been, and has been considered, an essentially Canadian river; and, if recent events had turned out differently, there would have been wide satisfaction in the construction of an all-Canadian seaway. No doubt there is also validity in many of the arguments advanced by Mr. Henry and General McNaughton, and these will have to be borne in mind in our negotiations with the Americans, where, I have no doubt, our negotiators will defend Canadian interests stoutly. But I do think that our reputation in the United States would be gravely tarnished if we refused to enter into negotiations with the United States looking towards the completion of a seaway in which some of the canals would be on the United States side of the river and some on the Canadian side. Our reputation would also suffer, I think, if we did not make an honest effort, in the course of such negotiations, to work out co-operative arrangements with the Americans that would be both workable and fair.

7. I should be grateful if you would repeat this message to the Minister in Geneva.

I. CANADIAN REPLY TO U.S. NOTE OF JUNE 7, 1954

1. The Chairman said that in a Note of June 7,¹²⁵ the United States Ambassador referred to the passage in Congress, and signing by the President on May 13, 1954, of the Wiley Bill creating the St. Lawrence Development Corporation, and suggested that as soon as convenient after the initial organization of the Corporation detailed discussions take place between representatives of the Canadian and United States governments on the planning and execution of the Seaway development in both countries. External Affairs had submitted to the Cabinet on June 10 alternative proposals for a reply to the US Note and, in the light of the Cabinet direction, a draft reply† (a copy of which had been circulated) had been prepared.

2. Mr. Côté said that three alternative proposals had been submitted to the Cabinet. The Canadian reply to the US Note might:

(a) welcome the information conveyed in the US Note and ask the United States government to put forward for discussion a specific and detailed proposal on the basis of its legislation for modification of the agreed arrangement for the construction of the Seaway, which formed a part of the agreement of June 30, 1952; or

(b) list the topics which might be discussed by representatives of both governments. These might include:

(i) proposals for the establishment and administration of a system of joint tolls;

(ii) arrangements for joint administration of the Seaway; and

(iii) such matters as assumption by the United States of responsibility for the two undertakings given by the Canadian government in the exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952, with respect to:

1. a contribution of $15 million by the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to the power entities towards the cost of dredging in the International Rapids power pool; and

2. the abandonment of indemnification for the 14 foot navigation facilities to be destroyed by the power project; or

(c) acknowledge the US Note, welcome the information it contained and suggest a meeting of officials in Ottawa on, say, June 28, for which an agenda might be prepared through cooperation of the officials concerned on both sides.

The Cabinet had favoured alternative (c) and the draft reply had been prepared along these lines.

¹²⁵ Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, volume XXXI, No. 785, July 12, 1954, pp. 50-51.

The United States Minister in Ottawa had thought that July 15 might be the earliest that it could be expected that the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation could be organized in its initial stages.

3. Mr. MacKay questioned the need of waiting for the appointment of an administrator. It seemed that policy matters could be settled without waiting for his appointment.

4. The Chairman said that even in inter-governmental negotiations there would have to be someone who could speak with authority for the Corporation. It would be useful if this person would continue to be identified with the Corporation.

5. General McNaughton pointed out that the President had vested in the Secretary of Defense the responsibility for any US portion of the Seaway.

6. Mr. MacLeod said that a Canadian willingness to negotiate would pre-suppose the joint construction of the Seaway.

7. Mr. Henry said that in his view there were no arguments favouring joint construction, and a number against it.

The United States wanted to take part in the Seaway for three reasons:

- (a) the cost to them would be relatively small;
- (b) they would obtain an equal voice in the control of the Seaway; and
- (c) they would be a major user of the Seaway.

The argument for having the United States participate in the Seaway went back to the 1920's when, in discussions with them, it had been assumed that there would be equal sharing by both sides of the costs of the whole St. Lawrence-Great Lakes Waterway. This principle had been repeated in 1932 and in 1941 but in the meantime other changes had taken place and now, of course, United States participation would give them equal control on payment of roughly one-third of the costs of that portion of the Seaway between Lake Erie and Montreal.

United States estimates of tonnage using the Seaway and tolls which might be collected were considerably higher than Canadian estimates and it was likely that if the United States participated there would be interminable disputes.

In addition, the cost of a canal on the Canadian side of the International Section would certainly not be more — and quite possibly less — than the cost of a canal on the United States side. Taking the Seaway as a whole, it would seem most illogical to allow the canal to be built on the United States side for the saving to Canada of about $85 million.

In twenty years, it was likely that the capacity of the Seaway would have to be increased. This might involve expenditures of the order of $100 million on the Welland Canal and $40 million at Lachine. The question of tolls therefore would be a continuing one and future trouble would be avoided if the Seaway were all Canadian.

Lastly, it was his view that public opinion now favoured an all-Canadian Seaway rather than joint participation.

8. Mr. MacKay said that by exchange of Notes and the statement of the Prime Minister the Canadian government was firmly committed to discussing any reasonable proposal that the United States government might put forward provided, however, that no delay was caused thereby.

Since no Canadian government comment had been made when the Wiley Bill was before Congress, the US government would have very good reason to expect discussion. Their present Note was not a specific proposal but it appeared, however, that we were committed either to ask for a specific proposal or to enter into preliminary discussions as suggested in the Note.

9. The Chairman said that in a discussion with the United States, the first item might possibly be the question of who should build the International Rapids section of the Seaway.

10. Mr. Henry said it did not seem possible to avoid entering into discussion with the United States.

11. Mr. Côté pointed out that the Canadian government, while committed to considering any specific proposal which might be put forward by the United States government, was not in any way committed to the joint construction of the Seaway.

12. The Chairman said that since it appeared inevitable that discussions would be held, the question for Ministers to decide was whether or not — within certain limitations — the Seaway was to be all-Canadian. This question would have to be considered not only on the merits of the Seaway itself, but in the light of our relationships with the United States and their internal political situation.

13. Mr. MacKay said there would be serious repercussions if we were to choke off discussion with the United States by insisting at the outset that we build the section in the International Rapids.

14. Mr. Côté suggested that the first step might be to invite the United States to put forward a specific proposal. This proposal could then be analysed and Ministers asked to make their decision.

15. The Chairman said that if conditions which the United States put forward in their proposal were unacceptable to the Canadian government, we would be on firm ground in carrying out construction ourselves.

16. General McNaughton said that in his view any proposal put forward under the Wiley Bill would be unacceptable to Canada. It was a requirement of the Wiley Bill that the Project be self-liquidating, which would mean that the United States must receive priority in tolls. This we could not give them. There was also the question of replacement of the 14 foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side and the contribution of $15 million toward the cost of channel enlargement undertaken by the power entities. No provision had been made in the Wiley Bill for these expenditures and not enough money had been provided to both build the Seaway and meet these costs. It was his view that the reply to the United States Note should not give any indication of present Canadian thinking, but rather merely acknowledge their Note and ask for their specific proposal.

17. The Chairman said that if it were the case that conditions in any proposal made under the Wiley Bill would be unacceptable to Canada, then this should be explained to Ministers.

18. General McNaughton said that at this stage he did not envisage any discussions being held. It would first be necessary for the United States to submit a proposal.

19. Mr. Henry agreed with General McNaughton that a proposal made under the Wiley Bill would undoubtedly be unsatisfactory to Canada.

20. Mr. MacKay pointed out that it should be borne in mind that the power project had not finally been cleared in United States courts. Technically, there were still two weeks from the date of the Supreme Court decision for the Lake Ontario Land Development Company to ask for a re-hearing. The Supreme Court was not to reconvene until next September and it was conceivable that final disposition would not be made until that time. There was, therefore, the possibility that if we did not appear to be reasonable about the Seaway there might be a delay on the power issue.

21. Mr. Henry pointed out that representatives of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and the Power Authority of the State of New York had met on June 7 and agreed on a programme of construction. The New York State Power Authority had indicated that they could now obtain the financing required for their share of the project on the strength of the June 7th decision of the Supreme Court. One of the conditions of financing was that the necessary $300 million would be raised all at once. It could therefore be expected that by next autumn the Power Authority would have the whole amount necessary to finance the project.

22. Mr. Isbister pointed out that the drafters of the reply to the United States Note would find themselves in a difficult position, since it would be necessary to avoid giving the United States the wrong impression about Canadian open-mindedness on the Seaway and also to avoid tipping our hand about our current thinking.

23. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that a memorandum be prepared for the Cabinet recommending that the reply to the United States Note of June 7, 1954, after a preamble re-affirming the arrangements agreed to in the exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952, state that it was assumed by the Canadian government that the United States Note indicated their intention of preparing a specific proposal and that Canada would be prepared to consider this proposal provided no delay was thereby occasioned; and also thank the United States administration for its energetic cooperation in furthering the power project in the United States.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY PROJECT; U.S. PROPOSAL FOR PARTICIPATION

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of June 10th, reported that the Canadian officials who had been considering the situation arising out of the Note of June 7th from the Ambassador of the U.S. in Canada on the St. Lawrence Seaway, had come to the conclusion that it would be desirable not to hold a meeting with American officials until the U.S. government produced a specific proposal to participate in construction of the Seaway. He felt that, unless Canada gave a clear indication of a genuine wish to co-operate with the U.S., much harm could be done.

8. In the course of discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) There were cogent reasons why it would be desirable for the U.S. to come forward with a specific proposal. If this were not done early in the discussions, there was a danger of losing the tactical advantage enjoyed by Canada in having left the next move clearly up to the United States;

(b) On the other hand, Canada had to proceed on good faith in these discussions. It would be desirable to hold a meeting and explain our present position and ask the U.S. authorities what they proposed to do. Detailed proposals could then be considered and, if they were not suitable, they could be rejected by Canada for good reasons.

9. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding possible discussions between representatives from the United States and Canada concerning U.S. participation in the construction and operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway project, and re-affirmed its decision that, in reply to the Note received from the U.S. Ambassador in Canada, the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggest that a meeting of officials take place at an early date in Ottawa for the purpose of reaching agreement on an agenda and procedure for subsequent discussions.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], June 16, 1954

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY: U.S. PARTICIPATION
RECORD OF CONVERSATION WITH THE UNITED STATES MINISTER

The Acting Under-Secretary today handed Note No. 155, dated June 16, to Mr. Don Bliss of the United States Embassy.¹²⁶ In discussing the Note, Mr. Bliss seemed to be at a loss in understanding the implications of the reference in it to the arrangements for the construction of the seaway expressed in the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952. As he has not really studied these Notes, copies of them were also supplied and it was emphasized that they constituted an Agreement covering the seaway which the United States was now preparing to modify.

2. Mr. Bliss indicated that it was the view of the United States Government that the Wiley Act, a copy of which had been formally communicated to the Canadian Government, in itself constituted a proposal by the United States for joint development of the St. Lawrence Seaway. He added that he considered that this proposal reverted to a limited extent to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Agreement of 1941 although he later said that this was only true to the extent that the physical dimensions of the works authorized by the legislation were the same as those contemplated in the 1941 Agreement. (It would appear that it would not be fruitful to pursue this aspect of the subject further.)

3. When it was pointed out to Mr. Bliss that the only existing arrangements agreed upon by both countries for the construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway were those embodied in the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952, and that these Notes constituted an agreement to that effect, he asked if the Canadian Government intended to stand on that agreement and to insist that its terms be carried out. He was reminded that the Prime Minister, in his memorandum of January 9, 1953, to the United States Ambassador and in his statement on May 6, 1954, in the House of Commons, had stated that the Canadian Government was prepared to discuss any specific proposal for modifying that arrangement. On the other hand, any such proposal would have to take into account the provisions of the existing arrangement and in that sense it was necessary to start from that position. It was for this reason that the attention of the United States Government has been drawn to that Agreement.

4. Mr. Bliss said that the United States Government's proposal was necessarily limited by the terms of the Wiley Act and that it obviously could not go beyond those terms. He questioned whether a meeting of officials would be useful prior to a decision by the Canadian Government as to whether the United States proposal as limited by the Wiley Act would be acceptable. He remarked that it was one thing to enter into discussions and quite another to have discussions which were intended to be abortive. Immediate exception was taken to this point by referring to the Canadian Government's commitment to discuss arrangements for United States construction of a part of the seaway when a specific proposal was put forward which would delay neither the power project nor the seaway. That alone was a clear indication that a decision had been reached to work out arrangements for United States construction of part of the seaway but it was also clear that these arrangements must take into account the arrangements under which the power project was being constructed. Two important details of these arrangements were covered in the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952, and those arrangements were also, in turn, taken into account in the Order of Approval of the International Joint Commission dated October 29, 1952. Moreover, the United States Note refers to "certain conditions" and the Wiley Act mentions "assurances satisfactory to" the Corporation. It could not be expected that final agreement would be reached on arrangements to modify existing plans for the construction of the seaway until the United States proposal was clarified to the extent that all essential features of both seaway and power projects were provided for, that such provision would not entail undue delay to either project and that the conditions and assurances required of the Canadian Government would be acceptable to it.

5. Mr. Bliss raised the question of the level of representation of the two countries at the proposed discussions by officials. He was told that we were thinking in terms of representatives from each of the Departments of External Affairs, Transport and Finance and from the Privy Council Office and that representation would probably be at the Assistant Under-Secretary and Head of Division level. Mr. Bliss suggested that Mr. Horsey might come from Washington but that he doubted whether Mr. Livingston Merchant could also come.

6. With regard to the appointment of an Administrator of the United States Corporation, it was explained that this was a matter for the United States Government to decide and that, while we recognized that the situation in the United States was somewhat different to that in Canada, we did not expect that it would be necessary for officers of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to be associated with the discussions and, in any case, certainly not with the preliminary discussion at the official level.

7. The question of publicity was also raised and Mr. Bliss commented that the United States Government would not have any reason to urge publicity at this stage. He was reminded, however, that public reference had already been made to the United States Note and that questions would undoubtedly arise very soon in the Canadian Parliament. When Parliament was sitting, it was customary to inform Parliament first by tabling papers of this sort and that we would like to reach agreement with the United States Government in advance on the timing and manner of any release of the Notes. He undertook to discuss this aspect of the matter with the State Department and to let us know the outcome.¹²⁷

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

In anticipation of discussions which may be held at Cabinet level between the United States and Canada on the subject of United States participation in the St. Lawrence seaway, it might be useful to try to assess as many as possible of the factors which will have a bearing on the negotiations.

United States Attitude

2. One of the great legislative achievements of the Eisenhower Administration (in its own eyes and in the public mind) is the statesman-like piece of legislation known as the Wiley Act which provides (as has been often said) that the United States may now "join" Canada in the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway. In the public eye, this is an historic joining of forces of both countries which, by tradition and better than most countries, know how to get along. In the face of selfish regional interests, the Eisenhower Administration has been able — where so many others have failed — to bring about a "joint" development of the seaway. In fact, the United States public probably does not understand why the Seaway project is not under way! Much less will it understand why negotiations are required with Canada in order to carry out what Congress has so clearly told the Administration should be done on United States soil. From a domestic political viewpoint, the Seaway may loom large in the November, 1954 elections.

Canadian Attitude

3. After so much talk of "Canada going it alone", the public may have felt a bit of an anti-climax since Canada could not now flex its own muscles without the United States "muscling in" at the last moment. The Canadian public, however, may perhaps sense that "joint" construction is inevitable but, if it were possible, it might be useful to build the seaway alone.

International Arrangements

4. The only Agreement on the St. Lawrence Power and Seaway Projects now in force between both countries is the one embodied in the Exchange of Notes of June

¹²⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
OK R.A. M[acKay]

30, 1952 (copy attached). This Agreement provides for the separation of the power and seaway phases in the following manner:

- (a) Canada and the United States to arrange for the speedy construction of the power project in the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence River;
- (b) Predicated on the construction and maintenance of the power project, Canada will build the 27-foot seaway between Lake Erie and the Port of Montreal;
- (c) Canada is prepared to exclude from the cost of the power project the amount to be paid to Canada as indemnity for the 14-foot canal;
- (d) Canada to contribute $15 million towards the cost of channel enlargements.

5. The United States Administration has been most punctilious and, indeed, more than cooperative in removing the obstacles in the way of the power development. Altogether apart from any desire to fulfil the Agreement, I expect that the motivation of self-interest from a power viewpoint and with an eye to possible negotiations on the Seaway project may not have been entirely absent from the mind of United States officials. In this connection, the Prime Minister indicated on January 9, 1953 (and later on May 6, 1954) that the Government was reluctant to enter into any talks which might delay the power project. The Prime Minister undertook, however, once a United States entity had been "designated and authorized" to do the United States share of the power works, to "discuss" any specific proposal the United States might put forward which differed from the Canadian Government's proposal on the Seaway. The condition attached was twofold: there should be no delay in the power development and no "serious" delay in the completion of the "whole seaway".

6. The United States Ambassador requested on June 7, 1954 that discussions take place between representatives of both governments on "the planning and execution of the Seaway development in both countries". On June 16, 1954 the Canadian Government suggested official talks in Ottawa during the week of June 28, 1954 to prepare a list of topics for subsequent inter-governmental talks. At the same time, the Canadian Government pointed to the June 30, 1952 Agreement and to the Prime Minister's statements of January 9, 1953 and of May 6, 1954.

The Problem

7. The problem is: How far should Canada go in modifying the June 30, 1952 Agreement in so far as the Seaway project is concerned? This can only be ascertained by examining, in some detail, various aspects of the seaway project as it now stands and by looking at the short- and long-term effects of any change agreed by Canada and the United States. This phase of the study is predicated on the desirability of reaching agreement: the number of obstacles in the way of such agreement is not inconsiderable but the way around the obstacles cannot be ascertained until they have been measured as accurately as possible.

1. POINTS TO BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN MODIFYING THE JUNE 30, 1952 AGREEMENT IN SO FAR AS THE SEAWAY PROJECT IS CONCERNED

8. There can be no question, of course, of modifying (otherwise than accessorially) the power aspect of the June 30, 1952 Agreement (hereafter called the Agreement): the construction of the seaway in the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence, (whether on the Canadian or United States side) is predicated on the power project now approved by the International Joint Commission. Any amendment of the Agreement, however, regarding the $15 million contribution to the cost of channel enlargement or the indemnity for the 14-foot canal will almost certainly require an amendment to Appendix C of the I.J.C. Order of October 29, 1952. This should present no insuperable difficulty if both governments agree on the substance of the points involved.

A. $15 million contribution by Canada to channel enlargements

9. The Agreement embodies an undertaking by Canada that the Canadian Seaway Authority shall contribute $15 million to the power-developing entities towards the cost of channel enlargements at the upper end of the project between Chimney Point and Morrisburg, that is before Iroquois dam and below that dam in the power pool. The total cost of these enlargements (which are of value both to the power and navigation projects) might be $30 million. Because Canada was taking on the navigation part of the Project, it was agreed by the Canadian and United States governments that about half the cost, $15 million, would be contributed to the power-developing entities by Canada. As a result of this and although no agreement subsequent to 1951 exists between Canada and the power-developing entities, this undertaking was made a part of the International Joint Commission Order of October 29, 1952. Should Canada and the United States agree that this amount shall be borne by the power entities (as is the responsibility of at least the Canadian entity under the International Rapids Power Development Agreement entered into between Canada and Ontario on December 3, 1951) it is fairly obvious that the power entities would jointly or individually oppose any change in the I.J.C. Order which would add $15 million to their present costs as fixed by this Order. The solution would be either for the United States or Canada to assume these costs. If the United States assumes these costs, a guarantee to this effect should be contained in any modifications of the Agreement. If this proves impossible or impolitic, Canada may wish still to bear the cost on the understanding that this sum shall be comprised in the total amount to be amortized by the tolls.

B. Compensation for 14-foot canal

10. Article VIII of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 gives priority to navigation over power uses of boundary waters. The International Rapids Power Development Agreement of December 3, 1951 between Canada and Ontario provides that:

(a) Ontario shall provide the necessary works to permit the continuance of 14-foot navigation on the Canadian side around Iroquois and above the Long-Sault dam to connect with the Cornwall canal.

(b) Canada is obliged to compensate Ontario for any lands belonging to Ontario and taken for a deep waterway. (This may involve, in fact, a relatively small amount of land principally in the upper reaches of the pool.)

(c) If, however, the construction by Canada of a deep waterway rendered unnecessary the 14-foot canal, Ontario would pay part of the cost equivalent to what would have been required to keep the 14-foot canal in operation.

The 1952 Agreement, however, provides that the amount to be paid by Ontario under the Agreement of December 3, 1951, shall be excluded from the power costs divisible between the power entities because the replacement of the 14-foot canal would be rendered unnecessary by the construction by Canada of the deep waterway almost atop of the 14-foot canal. This arrangement is also embodied in the I.J.C. Order of October 29, 1952.

11. In sum, if the Ontario power entity destroys Canada's 14-foot navigation canals, some compensation must be paid by Ontario. Because, however, the 27-foot seaway was to be built over the 14-foot canals, Canada could now hardly object to this part of the I.J.C. Order which excludes this amount from the total cost of the power project to be divided between the power entities. Any attempt by Canada or the United States to get the power entities to compensate Canada would be resisted by the entities before the International Joint Commission: they have a vested interest now in keeping their costs down to the amount already fixed by the international authority.

12. The solution lies in having the United States or Canada bear the cost of compensation for the destruction of the 14-foot canal. If Canada were to bear the cost, this amount should be included in the amount to be amortized out of tolls. If the United States is to bear the cost, the question of a guarantee of payment (with its inherent difficulties) arises.

C. Continuation of 14-foot canal

13. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Agreement of 1941 between Canada and the United States provided that one of the main features of the Controlled Single Stage Project (238-242) should be works necessary to permit the continuance of 14-foot navigation on the Canadian side around the Iroquois and Long-Sault dams to connect with the Cornwall Canal. Later in 1952, Canada was prepared to abandon the 14-foot canal when the Agreement was reached which provided that the 27-foot canal would, in effect, sit atop the old 14-foot canal. Does Canada wish to give up the 14-foot canal entirely if the 27-foot canal is built in United States territory? In any case, should there be assurances given that Canadian ships using the U.S. canals will not be subject to United States laws relating to United States economic, commercial or security policies? If these assurances are not forthcoming, Canada should ascertain if it should keep the 14-foot canal or build 27-foot canals on the Canadian side following its traditional policy in having its own navigation link between Upper and Lower Canada. The continuation of the 14-foot canal raises the question of the perpetuation of the uneconomic canallers and of the tolls which should be applied to canallers which use part of the seaway presumably on a toll-free basis. The continuation of a 14-foot canal in competition with the 27-foot seaway in a manner which would affect, to a degree, the ability of the United States to amortize its part of the seaway, is a matter which will not be overlooked.

II. DISCUSSION OF PROBLEMS TO BE MET ASSUMING AN UNDERSTANDING IS REACHED TO MODIFY THE JUNE 30, 1952 AGREEMENT

14. In so far as Canadian shipping is concerned, it should be free to use the International Rapids deep waterway — when going through the United States locks and canals — as though it were going through Canadian waters. The Treaties of 1870 (Washington) and 1909 (Boundary Waters) provide, broadly, that British and American shipping using the St. Lawrence to the head of the Great Lakes shall have freedom of navigation. This does not exclude shipping from having to comply with the laws and regulations of the country through which the shipping travels. Should there not be (if Canada does not continue the 14-foot canal) an understanding — embodied in an effective instrument of agreement between Canada and the United States — whereby, in the “Wiley” locks and canals, Canadian shipping shall not be subject to United States economic, commercial or security legislation?

15. Assuming that an international understanding is reached on such matters as the compensation for the 14-foot canal and for the $15 million dredging, and assuming that no guarantee of payment is forthcoming from the United States, it may prove essential to have these sums incorporated in the amount to be amortized out of toll revenues. It will then become important to have a joint agreement on tolls which will include a division of revenues (possibly on a basis of 25/35 ths. to Canada, i.e. based on the total investment (including compensation payable to Canada) of possibly $250 million by Canada to $105 million by the U.S.A.). This, of course, makes the joint fixing of tolls a condition sine qua non. If there is to be a joint apportionment of revenues, the tolls must be jointly collected. The tolls and apportionment of revenues, under these circumstances, would require to be fixed, presumably by international agreement as well, possibly, as by agreement between the two St. Lawrence agencies.

16. Under the Wiley Act, funds may be provided only for works designated as “works solely for navigation” in the joint report of 1941. Assuming the United States is prepared to compensate Canada for the $15 million involved in dredging, it is doubtful that this could be done under the Wiley Act because these works are not “solely for navigation” but are works which are “common to navigation and power”. For the same reason, funds to compensate Canada for the destruction of the 14-foot canal could probably not be provided under the Wiley Act.

17. The Canadian St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act may require to be amended as to Section 17. That section provides that tolls may be established unilaterally or “by agreement between Canada and the United States”. The Wiley Act foresees only an agreement between the agencies — i.e. the United States Corporation and the Canadian Seaway Authority — and not an inter-governmental agreement.

18. Prior to the discussions with the United States representatives, Canada should presumably obtain some information as to the United States (and Canada’s) own dredging programmes in the Upper Great Lakes. The cost involved will be a matter of something of the order of $100 million dollars. Unless this dredging programme is completed by both countries concurrently with the completion of deep-waterway, access to Lake Huron may be denied and a large part of the usefulness of the Seaway may then be lost. In fact, this may be a most critical point on which Canada and the United States may each wish to have assurances.

III. CONCLUSIONS

19. Assuming both parties wish to modify the Agreement, the modification should be embodied in at least in an "Executive Agreement" or Exchange of Notes though I suspect a Treaty for action by the Senate may be required if guarantees affecting a monetary compensation or future United States action in the fields of economic or security policy are required. Since any such Exchange of Notes or Treaty would be contrary to the sense of Congress, as expressed in the debates on the Wiley Act, there is little or no chance of such an agreement being acceptable to the United States government.

20. In that case the only practical alternative to treaty procedure would be by Exchange of Notes whereby the United States agreed that Canada should claim compensation out of the toll revenues. A further international agreement would then be required to fix the tolls and the apportionment of revenues. Canada would have to take some other action (such as continuation of a 14-foot canal system or the construction of 27-foot canals on the Canadian side) if it wished to assure itself a measure of independence on the International Rapids section regarding economic, commercial or security policy.

21. Consequential amendments would be required to the International Joint Commission's Order of October 29, 1952 and possibly to the Canadian St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

22. Apart from the legislative aspect, it does not seem that the conclusion of negotiations should retard the construction of either the power and seaway projects, provided always that Congressional approval is not required.

General Comment

23. This paper is intended as a brief outline of some of the problems which will arise in the forthcoming discussions on the Seaway. It also shows in what directions some solutions lie. No attempt has been made to examine what might be Canada's future policy in this field: for example, matters affecting Canada's future industrial interests as conditioned by the Canadian or United States Seaway, or, indeed, those matters affecting Canada's future position when it becomes necessary to double the present seaway capacity, have not been considered here. They will doubtless be considered at the political level before final decisions are made.

23. Lastly, this paper lacks the detailed guidance which will be subsequently available in the fields of economics, transport, law and international trade.¹²⁸

I. REPORT OF RECENT GOVERNMENT DECISIONS

1. The Chairman said that following the June 11 meeting of the Committee, the question of the Canadian reply to the US Note of June 7 had, on June 14, been reconsidered in the Cabinet and their earlier decision of June 10 reaffirmed. A Canadian Note in reply was therefore presented on June 16, suggesting that discussions at the official level be held in Ottawa in the week of June 28, for the purpose of preparing an agenda for subsequent intergovernmental discussions.

The US Note and the Canadian reply had been tabled that morning in the House of Commons by Mr. Pearson.

2. The Committee noted the Chairman's report.

II. MEETING OF OFFICIALS IN PREPARATION FOR INTERGOVERNMENTAL MEETING

Time and Place; Officials Attending; Instructions for Canadian Team

3. Mr. Wershof said the State Department had indicated a preference for a meeting during the week of July 5, rather than June 25 as first suggested, and had been told that Monday, July 5, might be the most suitable date. The meetings could be held in the External Affairs Conference Room.

4. Mr. Côté said it was expected that the American officials attending the meeting would be:

Livingstone Merchant and Outbridge Horsey of the State Department;
Robert B. Anderson, Deputy Secretary of Defense;
An Officer (possibly Mr. Yingling or Mr. English) of the Legal Office of the State Department; and General Robinson of the Army Corps of Engineers.

5. The Chairman said the Cabinet had agreed that the Canadian officials attending the meeting should be the Secretary to the Cabinet (Chairman); Mr. R.A.C. Henry; Mr. M.H. Wershof; Mr. Paul Pelletier (Secretary); and, in addition, one representative each of Transport, External Affairs and Finance. It was desired to limit the numbers on the Canadian side, although others might be called upon if specially required.

The government had not issued any instructions to the Canadian side and it was understood that they would not come to any decision about the Seaway until after the official meeting — and possibly after the intergovernmental meetings.

6. Mr. Sharp asked if the visit on July 6 of the Secretary of Defense had any connection with the Seaway meetings.

7. Mr. MacKay said that Mr. Wilson's visit had been arranged for other purposes although, of course, the Seaway question might be raised informally.

8. The Committee:

(a) noted the expressed composition of the Canadian and US teams; and

(b) agreed that every effort should be made to hold the meeting on Monday, July 5.

Subjects for Discussion

Agenda

9. The Chairman said that the task of the official meeting would be to prepare an agenda for the ensuing intergovernmental meeting. It might be assumed that there would be some discussion on the various subjects which would be placed on the agenda for the Ministers' meeting.

10. Mr. MacKay said that unless it was wished to run the risk of giving to the United States an impression of bad faith on the part of Canada, officials at the July 5 meeting would have to be reasonably frank in discussing the various points which arose.

11. Mr. Wershof said that External Affairs had prepared a first outline of an agenda† (copies of which were circulated) for the intergovernmental meeting, which might be discussed at the official meeting.

12. Mr. Henry said that at the official meeting the US side should be asked for their interpretation of the Wiley Act. The Canadian side should endeavour to find out the US line of approach before giving away their own position.

13. Mr. MacKay agreed that an effort should be made to ascertain US views before Canadian cards were placed on the table.

14. The Chairman said that the opening tactic might be to ask US officials their interpretation of the Wiley Act and what specific proposal they might make under it.

The meeting would, however, undoubtedly end up by discussing the subjects listed as agenda items for the intergovernmental meeting and the US side would, with reason, expect the Canadian side to tell them their views on the different points.

15. Mr. Henry pointed out that the relationship of any US proposal to the I.J.C Order of Approval should be included in the topics for discussion.

16. Mr. Pelletier suggested that in the External Affairs draft agenda items 3 and 4 be consolidated in order to get away from the assumption that any US proposal might be satisfactory provided agreement was reached on the various points listed under item 3.

17. Mr. Stead asked if there should be agreement on ancillary items that could properly be included with the navigation works and the cost of which would be recouped from tolls.

18. Mr. Henry said that the relevant Act in each country specified the items which could be capitalized.

19. Mr. Matthews pointed out that the official meeting might wish to consider the movement of foreign — as well as Canadian — vessels in canals on the US side.

20. The Chairman said it was assumed that the Canadian government would not be prepared to give an undertaking that if the International Rapids Section were built on the US side duplicate facilities would not be constructed on the Canadian side. The question of the intention of the Canadian government, if it should be raised, might best be answered, in the light of the trend of discussion, at the conclusion of the meeting.

21. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) noted the remarks on the probable course of development of the official meeting; and

(b) agreed that the Department of External Affairs draft agenda, amended in the light of the discussion, might be put forward by the Canadian side some time during the course of the meeting with US officials.

Movement of Canadian and Foreign Vessels in Canals on the US side

22. General McNaughton said that undoubtedly Canada would require assurance that ships or personnel consigned to Canadian ports and properly cleared in accordance with Canadian law would not be hindered in any US sector. The security aspect was one of considerable importance. The United States might try to enforce a drastic regulation — such as their current proposal to search foreign ships on the high seas. We would of course wish to avoid the consequences of any similar sort of unilateral action. A requirement might possibly be made that any contemplated action might first be reviewed in the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

23. Mr. MacLeod agreed that there was a need for some sort of assurance on this point. Canada was much more dependent on foreign shipping than was the United States.

24. Mr. MacKay said the purpose of the meeting was to ascertain the US view-point. This sort of question might be raised, but it would be for the intergovernmental meeting to decide on the adequacy of the US position.

25. Mr. Henry said that the United States would undoubtedly regard the question of the use of the Seaway by foreign vessels as one of considerable importance.

26. The Chairman pointed out that the real question appeared to be whether Canada would wish for more in the way of assurances than was already provided in The Boundary Waters Treaty. The inclination might be to ask for more, but this would probably be hard to justify.

27. Mr. Wershof suggested that the Canadian side might ask for an undertaking that not only would equal treatment be extended on both sides but, in addition, that either government, before imposing any regulations having a bearing on the other's shipping, would provide an opportunity for consultation.

28. Mr. Deutsch asked if it would be open for Canada to take retaliatory action in the event of the United States imposing unpalatable restrictions.

29. General McNaughton said it would be difficult to do so because of the provisions of The Boundary Waters Treaty.

30. The Chairman said that a related point was that of the possibility of imposing restrictions for commercial reasons, such as outlined in the Potter Bill, on foreign shipping in the Great Lakes.

31. General McNaughton said that support for such restrictions was increasing in the United States. In US law, an act of Congress could modify the terms of an earlier treaty as it applied to US territory — hence The Boundary Waters Treaty could be modified as it applied to US territory by an act such as the Potter Bill.

It was of interest, however, that the Dutch and the Norwegians were both designing special types of ships which could be used both in the North Atlantic and the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes.

32. Mr. MacLeod pointed out that the Canadian interest in Great Lakes shipping was not a simple one. For instance, in order that the locks on the system be utilized at their optimum efficiency, it would be necessary that ships with more cargo capacity than ocean-lakers should use them.

33. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that Trade and Commerce, in consultation with External Affairs, Transport and Finance, prepare a memorandum — if possible, by Wednesday, June 30 — dealing with conditions relating to the use of a canal on the United States side by Canadian and foreign vessels.

Contribution of $15 million to the Power Entities toward additional dredging in the Power Pool

34. The Chairman said that in the exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952, Canada had agreed that a contribution of $15 million would be made to the power entities toward the cost of canal enlargement which they must undertake in the St. Lawrence River. The I.J.C. Order of Approval required Canada to pay an agreed amount for the same purpose. In neither the exchange of Notes nor the Order of Approval was it explicit but, in both, it appeared implicit that such payment was conditional upon the Seaway being built entirely in Canada.

35. Mr. Henry said that the power authorities considered it an obligation that $15 million be paid to them.

36. The Chairman said that if the International Rapids Section was built on the US side, the obligation should logically rest with the United States. Would it require a change in the Order of Approval to place the responsibility upon them?

37. General McNaughton pointed out that the Orders of Approval was generally favourable to Canada and efforts on the US side to have it reconsidered had been resisted. If an application for a change were to be made, it would be difficult to avoid opening up the whole Order for reconsideration. Another factor to be considered was that a number of court actions had been carried through with the Order in its present form. If it were to be changed, there would be an additional risk from this quarter.

38. Mr. Matthews pointed out that, if Canada paid $15 million, recovery would eventually be made through tolls.

39. Mr. Pelletier said that this would have the effect of increasing the Canadian and decreasing the US toll rates.

40. Mr. Wershof pointed out that no provision was made in the Wiley Act for the payment of $15 million to the power entities.

41. General McNaughton said he did not think that it would be too great a problem for the US authorities to find $15 million if they agreed to making the payment. The Rivers and Harbours Appropriation Act could, if necessary, be used as authority.

42. Mr. Henry pointed out that the US government had insisted on Canada assuming the responsibility for the $15 million in the I.J.C. application.

43. Mr. MacKay said he did not think the United States would consider disagreement over the payment of $15 million as sufficient cause for breaking off negotiations.

44. Mr. Deutsch agreed that the question of the payment of $15 million would not form an ultimate stumbling block. It might, however, be an important factor if linked with other sources of disagreement.

45. The Chairman said that, in negotiations with the United States side, our position would be strengthened by dwelling on their original insistence that the payment be made by the country building the section in the International Rapids.

46. The Committee agreed that a memorandum be prepared — if possible, by Wednesday, June 30 — by the Privy Council Office on the question of the payment to the power entities of $15 million towards the cost of additional dredging in the power pool.

Continuance of 14-foot Navigation Facilities on the Canadian Side

47. The Chairman said that in the agreement between Canada and Ontario, it was provided that Ontario would indemnify the Canadian government for the 14-foot navigation facilities which would be destroyed by the power project. The exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952, however, excluded from the total cost of the power project to be divided between the two power entities, the amount to be paid to Canada by Ontario in lieu of construction by the power entities of the facilities required for the continuance of the 14-foot navigation, since this would be unnecessary if the deep waterway were in Canada. The I.J.C. Order of Approval required only that the 14-foot navigation facilities be continued during the period of construction of the deep waterway.

The situation with respect to the 14-foot facilities if the canal were to be built on the US side was not clear.

48. Mr. MacLeod said that one of the first points requiring decision was whether or not the 14-foot facilities should be continued. A realistic view might suggest that there was no need for them. On the other hand, the question of their continuance might be a useful bargaining point.

49. Mr. Wershof suggested that the problem might be broken down into a number of questions which could be looked at departmentally. Transport and Trade and Commerce might give some thought to the need for continuing the 14-foot facilities, and Justice might look into the legal questions involved.

50. Mr. Henry pointed out that the question of the transfer of canal reserve lands had come up with Ontario and would have to be resolved.

It should also be borne in mind that within about ten years there would be a requirement for duplicate facilities throughout the waterway and that it would be much cheaper to do the preparatory work before the area on the Canadian side was flooded.

51. The Chairman asked if Ontario had agreed to the waiver included in the June, 1952 exchange of Notes.

52. Mr. Henry said that they had not been consulted.

53. Mr. Pelletier pointed out that if the 27-foot waterway did not go on top of the 14-foot waterway, the waiver would be invalidated.

54. General McNaughton said that if the 27-foot canal were built on the United States side and the 14-foot facilities not replaced, there would be an outcry in Canada. In negotiating with the United States, Canada should strive to maintain all points of interest, amongst which was the 14-foot waterway. Canadian public opinion was swinging more and more in favour of an all-Canadian waterway and a retreat might be difficult to explain.

55. Mr. West agreed that it might be psychologically desirable to retain the 14-foot facilities.

56. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that a memorandum be prepared by Transport — if possible, by Wednesday, June 30 — on the requirement for 14-foot facilities on the Canadian side, and by Justice on the legal position with respect to indemnification and land transfers.

Tolls; Joint or Unilateral

57. Mr. Henry said it was his opinion that the Canadian side should, from the beginning, advocate separate tolls. If, after sufficient experience, it was found that joint tolls would be desirable, a change could then be made.

Acts in both countries covered the requirements for tolls. The Canadian system of setting tolls would differ considerably from that in the United States and it was of interest that, up to the present, the two countries had not been able to reach understanding on common tolls, such as international freight rates.

58. The Chairman said it might be possible in the early meetings to avoid substantive discussion of the toll question.

59. Mr. Hadskis said there was some fear on the Canadian side of leaving Canadian traffic to the mercy of US tolls if rates were set unilaterally.

60. Mr. MacLeod said he thought some discussion of toll structure would be required at an early stage in the negotiations. Commodities of most interest to Canada — such as grain — did not have the same importance in the United States. It was also possible that the toll question might resolve itself into an additional reason for an all-Canadian Seaway.

61. Mr. Wershof said that The Boundary Waters Treaty provided protection to both countries against discrimination. It might be possible, as an added safeguard, to insist that there be joint discussion before the structure was settled. For this reason, there might be some value in making a study of the economic advantages and disadvantages of joint and separate tolls.

62. The Chairman said he thought it would be difficult to make an economic assessment of which toll system would be the better.

63. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that Trade and Commerce, in consultation with External Affairs and Transport, prepare — if possible by Wednesday, June 30 — a memorandum on the question of joint or unilateral tolls on the Seaway.

Advantages and Disadvantages of a Canadian — as compared with a United States Seaway

64. Mr. Henry said that the most recent investigation had shown that a Canadian waterway in the International Rapids sector would cost no more — and possibly be somewhat cheaper — than a corresponding waterway on the United States side. The location of the waterway would make no difference to navigation.

65. The Committee noted Mr. Henry's statement.

Advisability and/or Practicability of two Canal Systems now and in the future

66. Mr. Deutsch said there might be some advantage in making a study of the economics of duplicate canal systems.

67. The Committee agreed that a memorandum be prepared by Transport — if possible by Wednesday, June 30 — in consultation with Finance and Trade and Commerce, on the advisability and/or practicability of two canal systems now and in the future.

Desirability of concluding a new Canada-United States St. Lawrence Agreement

68. The Committee noted that External Affairs would, when more information on US proposals was available, prepare a memorandum dealing with the desirability of concluding a new Canada-United States St. Lawrence Agreement.

Detailed Comparison of Canadian and US Legislation

69. The Committee noted Mr. Henry's memorandum of June 16† (copies of which had been circulated).

III. NEXT MEETING

70. The Committee agreed to meet again on Wednesday, June 30, at 2:30 p.m., in the Privy Council Committee Room, East Block, for further consideration of points to be discussed at the forthcoming Canada-United States meetings on the St. Lawrence Project.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

At Horsey's invitation we called on him this morning at the State Department to give him some personal help in identifying the main issues that may be expected to arise during the meetings in Ottawa on the 5 and 6 of July. We began by saying that the Canadian authorities would enter into the negotiations in the hope of reaching agreement. But perhaps an analogy could be drawn between these discussions and tariff negotiations. Even when both parties to such negotiations desired agreement, there was always hard bargaining and the participants did not always reveal at the outset what their ultimate positions might be. For that reason he should not expect us to anticipate fully the Canadian position even as it would be disclosed at the preliminary meeting to be held in Ottawa next week, although we could perhaps serve a useful purpose by directing his attention to some of the issues that would have to be discussed.

2. Horsey said he realized that hard bargaining must be expected. However, he doubted whether this fact was appreciated by many of the United States authorities who would be coming to Ottawa next week. Indeed, the chief purpose of taking such a large delegation to Ottawa was to acquaint them without delay with the stubborn problems that would have to be solved if agreement was to be reached. He added, however, that he hoped little time would be consumed in diplomatic fencing and that the meeting in Ottawa could be devoted to an examination of the main outstanding issues. We said that we thought that was the intention of the Canadian authorities. He, for his part, assured us that there was no disposition on the United States side to try to railroad the negotiations and repeated that it was clearly understood here that further meetings would be required after there had been an interval for consideration of the issues that would be examined in a preliminary way next week.

3. After this preface to the conversation, we went on to list some of the issues that would be bound to arise during the meeting in Ottawa, some of them lying within the framework of the Public Law 358, and others falling outside its scope. There is no need to repeat at length here our exposition of these issues, since you know them far better than we do. Perhaps, however, it would be as well to list summarily the points we touched on.

(a) Referring to the provision in the United States act that assurances should be sought from the Canadian authorities, we said that the Canadian representatives would naturally be interested to know the nature of the assurances that would be requested.

(b) After outlining the history of the Canadian undertaking to pay $15 million towards the cost of channel enlargement of the International Rapids section, we indicated that it would be the Canadian view that this arrangement would have to be modified if canals in that part of the river were to be built in United States territory.

(c) We also outlined the problem created for the Canadian Government by the present 14' canal on the Canadian side of the river.

(d) We also stressed the necessity of interfering as little as possible with the arrangements that have now been completed to authorize construction of the power project, including the IJC's order of approval.

We said nothing about the Canadian requirement that there should be no impediment, except the payment of tolls, to the free passage of Canadian vessels through the canals that might be built in United States territory, since we thought that this subject would best be opened at the meeting in Ottawa. Horsey, however, brought it up very briefly. He suggested that the Canadian authorities might want some assurance of free right of passage and that United States representatives would, of course, be willing to discuss such a demand. His remark, however, led to no further discussion.

4. His chief concern seemed to be over the impression Bliss had received from discussions with Canadian officials in Ottawa that the Canadian Government expected a more specific proposal to be put forward by the United States authorities. He said that, in the State Department's view, transmission of Public Law No. 358 was to be regarded as a proposal of a fairly specific kind. Nor was this issue, as he saw it, merely a matter of words, since Bliss had reported that, in the view of some Canadian officials, it was now the responsibility of the United States Government "to make a specific proposal that the Canadian Government would then accept or reject". That was not how the forthcoming negotiations were being envisaged in the State Department. Instead, the United States authorities expected that a specific proposal would emerge in the course of the negotiations as was customary in other negotiations between the United States and Canada. That had been the case, for example, in many negotiations over defence issues. If the St. Lawrence seaway negotiations succeeded and agreement were reached, the United States proposal might attain its final degree of particularity only at the last moment before formal notes were exchanged. However, the United States authorities would, of course, try at every stage of the negotiations to make their developing proposals as clear and specific as possible, although this could only be done, they thought, in the course of discussions which would serve to reveal what arrangements might be acceptable to the Canadian Government.

5. Horsey was also anxious to discuss the kind of opening statement that might be made by the leader of the United States delegation in Ottawa on the 5 of July. If present intentions prevail, we gathered that Anderson would probably begin by referring to the long campaign in the United States in favour of the seaway. Passage of the Wiley Bill, he would go on, was the culmination of that campaign in the eyes of those in this country who had fought for the seaway for many years; and it had seemed to the United States authorities that Public Law No. 358 might be regarded as a specific proposal. Without arguing that point, however, the United States spokesmen would say that it was fully realized that a number of contentions issues would have to be solved before construction could begin on the seaway as a cooperative venture between Canada and the United States. He and his colleagues were anxious to move as quickly as possible to sharpen United States proposals on these issues. But since it was their earnest hope that they could fashion proposals that would be acceptable to Canada, they thought that the work of defining the United States proposals should be part of the process of negotiation.

I. JUNE 28 MEETING OF MINISTERS

1. The Chairman reviewed the principal conclusions reached at the June 28th meeting of Ministers:

(a) Canadian Commitment not to proceed with a Second Waterway in Canada

Canadian officials in their July 5th meeting with US officials should indicate clearly that the Canadian government was not prepared to make any commitment about not proceeding with a second waterway in Canada even for a limited period of time.

(b) $15,000,000 Contribution towards Channel Enlargements

The Canadian government would naturally expect the United States to assume responsibility for making a payment of $15 million as a contribution toward the cost of channel enlargements to the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission and the New York State Power Authority if the United States undertook the construction of the Seaway in the International Section.

(c) Continuance of 14-foot Navigation

Officials should not give any indication of the stand likely to be taken by the Canadian government on this question.

(d) Safeguards for Canadian Shipping in the US Waterway

Officials should indicate that the Canadian government would likely expect Canadian ships to have free access to canals and locks in a US waterway on the same conditions (except for tolls) as would apply if the canals and locks were in Canada. Reference to UK and foreign shipping should be avoided if at all possible.

(e) Tolls

Officials might indicate that the Canadian government would probably favour a system of unilaterally fixed tolls on the segments of the Seaway, although Canada might agree to some form of common collection of tolls.

(f) I.J.C. Order of Approval

Any suggestion that might lead to a re-opening of the Order of Approval issued by the International Joint Commission on October 29, 1952, should be avoided.

(Conclusions of the meeting of Ministers to discuss the proposal for US participation in the construction and operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway, held on June 28, had been circulated).

2. Mr. West said that Mr. Pearson's view — as he recalled it — had been that Canadian ships should have the same rights in US segments of the Seaway as they would have in Canadian territory.

3. The Chairman added that the probable reason that Ministers directed that discussion of the rights of foreign shipping in the waterway be avoided was that United Kingdom shipping was, at present, afforded equal treatment with Canadian shipping, and also that Canadian policy in connection with the coasting trade was not fully settled.

4. The Committee noted the Chairman's report on the conclusions reached by Ministers at their meeting of June 28.

II. TWO CANAL SYSTEMS

5. Mr. West dealt with the engineering and economic aspects of two ship channels. The following points were made:

(a) Engineering

(i) There were no particular engineering difficulties involved on either side of the river.

(ii) There were no practical differences in efficiency in handling ship traffic, the overall distance in a US or a Canadian canal being about the same and each having three locks. Passage through a Canadian canal would be slightly quicker since there would be more open river navigation.

(iii) The cost on either side had been estimated at $88 million, although improved construction at the Iroquois Control Dam would reduce the Canadian cost by several million dollars.

(b) Economics

(i) It appeared unlikely that there would be difficulty in amortizing the entire project with a canal on each side.

(ii) Estimates of revenue, volume through system and period for amortization at 3% and 3 1/2% were given.

(Memorandum — "Two Ship Channels (US and Canadian) in the International Rapids Section" had been circulated).

6. Mr. Cox pointed out that if it were indicated that Canada was making preparations for building a 27-foot waterway the possibility of the Americans making the $15 million contribution to the power entities might be compromised.

7. Mr. West said that Ministers had directed that no Canadian commitment be made.

8. Mr. McLeod pointed out that if two canal systems were built the US position might become untenable if Canada were to establish a "one collection" toll schedule applying where a vessel passed through one, two or three of the Canadian canals. Hence, he suggested that there was reason for seeking a uniform system of charging tolls for the whole seaway. Four alternative Canadian courses of action might be considered:

- (a) Undertake no work toward Canadian canals in the International Section;
- (b) Undertake excavation "in the dry" on parts of the Canadian channel that would be flooded by the Hydro project;
- (c) Undertake excavation and build the upper Cornwall dock and connect it to the present 14-foot canal; or
- (d) build the Canadian system at this time.

Estimates were given on the cost of the works proposed in the above alternatives, and it was suggested that alternative (c) appeared the most reasonable at the present time.

(Memorandum of June 30 — "Two Canal System (US and Canadian) in the International Rapids Section and related alternatives" had been circulated.)

9. Mr. McLeod added that the two-canal issue might well be one of which discussions broke off because Canada could, by building her own waterway, make the financial position of the US waterway extremely difficult.

10. The Chairman said that the issue should not be raised unless the Americans brought it up.

11. Mr. Wershof suggested that at this stage we should not worry about the problem of two canals. Up to the present, Ministers had not considered the points raised by Mr. McLeod.

12. Mr. Henry said that in a two-canal system rates would have to be similar. He went on to point out that it might be expected that in about fifteen years there would be need for duplicate seaway facilities throughout. The President of Canada Steamship Lines had already suggested duplicate facilities in the Welland Canal. Present estimate of cost for these facilities was $100 million. There would be an additional $40 million required for duplicate facilities at Lachine.

13. Mr. West agreed and said that there was already a loss of time through congestion on the Welland Canal.

14. Mr. Wershof said that he thought US officials would want to know Canadian plans.

15. General McNaughton said the answer to their question about our intentions would depend in part on the rights which the US would grant to Canada on their side.

16. Mr. Henry pointed out that Canada would, within the next month or so, have to tell the Ontario Hydro how much land was needed for expropriation purposes and would also want to expropriate from the end of the Hydro land to Cornwall.

17. The Committee, after further discussion, noted that it would be necessary within the next few weeks to obtain direction from the Cabinet on the work which might be undertaken in preparation for a 27-foot canal on the Canadian side.

III. CONTRIBUTION OF $15 MILLION BY THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY TOWARD THE COST OF CHANNEL ENLARGEMENTS TO BE UNDERTAKEN BY THE ONTARIO HYDRO AND THE NEW YORK STATE POWER AUTHORITY IN THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

18. Mr. Pelletier, after reviewing undertakings about the $15 million contribution contained in the June 30, 1952 Exchange of Notes, and the I.J.C. Order of Approval, said that if the waterway in the International Section was to be built by the United States, Canada had a right in equity, if not in law, to expect the US government to assume responsibility for the contribution. He went on to point out that the Wiley Act did not cover this question, and therefore the U.S. St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation could not accept responsibility without further action by Congress. The Annual Rivers and Harbours Improvement Act might, with congressional approval, provide authority for the payment. In addition it would be necessary that Appendix "C" of the Order of Approval be modified, since it specifically stated that the payment should be made by the Canadian St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. Another factor was that it was at US insistence that Canada consented to make the $15 billion commitment. Finally, it was pointed out that the following objections could be made to Canada making the payment:

(a) The channel enlargements toward which the contribution would be made would be in the International Section of the river and should logically be paid for by the country developing that section;

(b) Assuming that tolls were to be established unilaterally, the Canadian toll rate would be unduly loaded and the US rate unduly relieved if Canada were to make the contribution;

(c) It was the United States and not Canada that insisted in the first instance on the contribution; and

(d) Public opinion in Canada would be against the contribution, since the commitment had been made on the assumption that Canada — not the U.S. — would build the facilities in the International Section.

(Memorandum of June 25 — "Contribution of $15 million by the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority toward the cost of channel enlargements to be undertaken by the Ontario Hydro and the New York State Power Authority in the St. Lawrence River" had been circulated).

19. General McNaughton pointed out that, since both the power project and the navigation project were to be self-liquidating, Canada might contribute the $15 million provided that the amount, plus interest, be recovered from joint tolls to be imposed in the International Section of the river. An alternative to this scheme would be for the power entities to finance the $15 million contribution and recover costs, plus interest, from joint tolls. This arrangement, however, would require approval by the I.J.C. of a revised cost allocation between the power entities.

(An explanatory memorandum was circulated at the meeting).

20. Mr. Wershof pointed out that it might be difficult to make our lack of intentions seem in accord with asking the United States to undertake the responsibility for the $15 million.

21. The Chairman agreed that the inference might be that we were not going to build on our side. We might say, however, that in our view the tolls in the International Section should bear the cost of the $15 million contribution. Whoever collected the tolls — i.e., whoever built the canal — should put up the $15 million. If both countries built a canal, the unamortized portion of the $15 million should be shared between them. If this approach was not acceptable to the United States, the second Canadian position might be that we would put up the $15 million and ask them to collect the amount necessary to pay it off.

22. Mr. West agreed that the assumption made in General McNaughton's paper was reasonable.

23. Mr. Côté said that External Affairs' preliminary opinion was that an item for $15 million could not be slipped into the U.S. Rivers and Harbours Improvement Act without being the occasion for discussion in Congress.

24. The Committee, after discussion, agreed that:

(a) An attempt be made to obtain preliminary agreement that the country building the canal in the International Rapids Section assume responsibility for the $15 million contribution; or

(b) failing agreement on this point, it might be indicated that Canada might consider paying the $15 million on the understanding that this expenditure, plus interest, would be reimbursed through toll charges.

IV. CONTINUING 14-FOOT NAVIGATION ON THE CANADIAN SIDE

25. Mr. West said that from a strictly economic viewpoint, 14-foot navigation on the Canadian side in conjunction with the 27-foot navigation on the US side was not justified. On the other hand, however, a number of factors should be considered:

(a) The agreement of December 3, 1951 between Canada and Ontario contemplated that Ontario, in return for the transfer from Canada of such of the 14-foot canal lands as might be required to enable the power works to be completed, would either provide a new 14-foot canal or make a contribution equivalent to the cost of the 14-foot canal toward the cost of the 27-foot canal on the Canadian side. (In 1949, the estimated amount was $15,309,000);

(b) If it were decided to defer construction of a 27-foot canal on the Canadian side, it would be extremely desirable to undertake the necessary excavation in the upper approaches to the proposed Cornwall lock, since this could be done "in the dry" at one-quarter of the cost of later sub-aqueous excavation. The estimated cost of this excavation was $2 million. This excavation would be required in any event to provide access to the Canadian shore by large vessels;

(c) The I.J.C. Order of Approval required Canada to contribute an agreed amount to the power entities on account of channel enlargements, and in the note of June 30, 1952, this was stated to be $15 million; and

(d) No authority existed in the Wiley Act for this contribution to be made by the United States.

Canada could undertake the necessary excavations and construct the upper Cornwall lock for an estimated $24,250,000 which would, if a later decision were made to complete the 27-foot navigation on the Canadian side, reduce the estimated $101 million cost by $24,250,000.

(Memorandum dated June 28, "Continuing 14-foot navigation on the Canadian side" had been circulated).

26. Mr. West added that Mr. Henry had suggested that instead of building a 600-foot lock it would be sufficient at this time to build only a 300-foot lock, and expropriate the property required sometime in the future for the additional 300 feet. Because of the location of the lock on a dyke, it could be completed to 600 feet without the construction of a cofferdam and with no danger to workmen. The reduction in costs for a 300-foot lock would be about $10 million, to which would have to be added about $4 million for expropriation costs.

27. Mr. Henry said that recent studies had indicated that it would be cheaper by about $3 million to build the canal at Iroquois on the Canadian side.

28. General McNaughton said that he did not think Ontario would pay the $15 million to Canada because it would be an additional charge to the cost of power. He would like to see the $15 million added to the cost of navigation and amortized through tolls.

29. Mr. Côté said the Wiley Act, which directed that the canal be built on the US side, would probably require an amendment if the Iroquois canal were to be on the Canadian side.

30. The Chairman asked General McNaughton and Messrs. West and Henry to prepare a paper on the location of the Iroquois canal and on the continuation of 14-foot navigation. He added that if the question should arise in the joint meeting, the Canadian answer might be that in view of the altered circumstances, a government decision had not been reached about continuing the 14-foot navigation.

31. Mr. West said his view was that if the canal were on the US side, the minimum required in Canada would be the maintenance of 14-foot navigation, a 300-foot lock at Cornwall and the necessary excavation for eventual 27-foot navigation. The 14-foot canal would not, of course, be toll-free.

32. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) noted that:

(i) a new memorandum would be prepared on the location of the canal at Iroquois and the continuation of 14-foot navigation on the Canadian side; and

(ii) it would be necessary to seek a Cabinet decision within the next few weeks on the question of the continuation of 14-foot navigation; and

(b) agreed that at the forthcoming joint meeting, US officials would be told, if they enquired, that no decision had been reached by the government about the continuation of 14-foot navigation.

V. USE OF THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY BY CANADIAN AND FOREIGN SHIPPING

33. Mr. Isbister pointed out that bilateral treaties in force between Canada and the United States had the effect of ensuring equal rights of navigation for purposes of commerce to citizens and vessels of both countries throughout the St. Lawrence River and Great Lakes. These treaties were, however, subject to the right of each country to enact laws and regulations within its own territory so long as they were not inconsistent with the privilege of free navigation and were applied equally and without discrimination to the citizens and vessels of both countries. There were also some multilateral arrangements (including the GATT) extending to other countries the obligation on the part of the United States and Canada to permit freedom of transit and to avoid discrimination. Canada would have a significant economic interest in facilitating the use of the Seaway by British and foreign ships operating between Canadian ports and ports Overseas. With the completion of the Seaway, the potential increase in traffic for direct carriage between the Great Lakes and overseas ports would represent a significant proportion of the total overseas trade of Canada and the United States, and it could be expected that foreign ships operating through the Seaway would carry a much greater proportion of the total Canadian overseas commerce than of the total United States or overseas commerce. The initial position of US authorities would probably be that US regulations should apply to all ships passing through that part of the Seaway in US territory. The opening Canadian position might be that only regulations comparable to those in force in Canada should apply to Canadian-registered ships in the US Section of the Seaway and to any ship using the Seaway when destined only for (or originating only in) Canadian ports. There might, however, be serious difficulty in working out such arrangements, particularly in connection with security controls. The efficient operation of the Seaway and the contribution which it would make to the Canadian economy required that some firm understanding be reached with the United States at an early stage regarding the use of the US portions of the Seaway by Canadian and foreign ships.

(An explanatory memorandum — “Use of the St. Lawrence Seaway by foreign Shipping” — was circulated)†.

34. General McNaughton pointed out that there was some doubt that Article I of The Boundary Waters Treaty provided equal treatment for British — as opposed to Canadian—shipping.

35. Mr. McLeod suggested that Canada might ask the United States to take steps satisfactory to Canada by a certain date.

36. Mr. Matthews pointed out that US shipping regulations — apart from security controls — were comparable to Canadian regulations.

37. General McNaughton said that in the event of a war it might be expected that questions to do with the Seaway would be worked out in the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

38. Mr. Reisman said that the United States could, by regulation, make it very difficult for foreign shipping to use the Seaway even if the regulations were non-discriminatory.

39. Mr. West said he did not anticipate any difficulty through Labour regulations.

40. General McNaughton pointed out that it was unlikely that problems would arise through the use of channels on the US side. The US locks would be the places where US regulations would have effect.

41. Mr. Wershof said that if a treaty with the United States was required, it would probably take about a year and a half to go into effect. A safeguard might be to insist that before new restrictions were introduced by either side there be consultation. On the other hand, it should be remembered that if the United States behaved in a manner which Canada did not like it would be possible for Canada, in four or five years, to have its own seaway.

42. The Chairman said that since the seaway would be five-sevenths on the Canadian side it was probably not necessary to give equal treatment with respect to shipping, to the United States.

43. Mr. Isbister did not feel that a requirement for prior consultation would be an adequate safeguard. The United States was now required under the GATT to afford the opportunity for prior consultation.

44. Mr. Pelletier reviewed the present Canadian security regulations which applied only in the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River down to Montreal. In practice, foreign ships made their first journey into the Lakes free of checks. There was a three-year time limit on the present Canadian law.

45. The Chairman said that it might be possible to ask Mr. Pearson and Mr. Howe before the Monday meeting whether the question of the use of the seaway by foreign ships could be discussed. At the meeting, it might be best to ask the United States for their views of the security problem without developing our own position too extensively.

46. The Committee, after further discussion, noted that at the forthcoming joint meeting an effort would be made to obtain US views on the use by Canadian (and possibly foreign) ships of the portion of the seaway which might be in US territory without, however, indicating in any detail the position which Canada might take.

VI. TOLLS

47. The Chairman said that the only new point to be considered in connection with tolls was that of the possible amortization of the $15 million contribution through tolls. The Canadian attitude on the general question might be that in principle there was no objection to joint tolls but it was thought that in practice separate tolls would work out better.

48. Mr. Pelletier said that Trade and Commerce was undertaking an intensive study of the toll question.

49. Mr. Wershof said that presumably toll arrangements could be altered in the light of experience gained.

50. The Committee noted the Chairman's remarks.

VII. JULY 5TH JOINT MEETING

51. It was agreed to meet on Monday, July 5th, at 11:30 a.m., in the Privy Council Committee Room, to discuss the tactics which might be adopted at the July 5th joint meeting.

[Ottawa], July 12, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

ST. LAWRENCE POWER PROJECT; SPECIAL CUSTOMS AND IMMIGRATION ARRANGEMENTS

1. At a meeting held on June 22nd, 1954, Cabinet agreed that the undersigned should convene an ad hoc committee of officials comprising representatives of the departments of External Affairs, Finance, National Revenue, Citizenship and Immigration, Labour and Transport to consider all the implications of any special customs and immigration arrangements that might be made with the United States on the movement of equipment, materials and personnel across the Canada-US boundary during the course of construction of the St. Lawrence power project by the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission and the New York State Power Authority and to submit recommendations as to how this problem might best be met.

2. In accordance with this decision, representatives of the above-named departments, as well as officials of the department of Trade and Commerce and of the Privy Council Office, have consulted with Mr. Saunders and Dr. Holden of Ontario Hydro, have considered the advantages and disadvantages of the various arrangements that might be made with the United States in this connection and wish to submit the following report and recommendations.

I. The Problem

3. The Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario has been authorized to construct those portions of the power project that lie in Canadian territory and similarly the Power Authority of the State of New York has been licensed to construct those portions of the project which lie in US territory. However, because certain more or less indivisible components of the project straddle the boundary line, it is neither practical nor efficient to attempt to divide responsibility for construction of the Canadian and US portions of such components between Ontario and New York on a purely national basis. This very practical consideration was taken into account by the International Joint Commission whose Order of Approval of October 29th, 1952, provides that total costs of the power works shall be based on Canadian costs and United States costs and that the total shall be equally divided between the two construction entities. In actual fact, Ontario and New York have divided responsibility for construction of the various components on the basis of practicability and of a more or less equal division of total costs to each, and not on the basis of the international boundary.

4. The question of special customs and immigration arrangements arises now because Ontario Hydro will shortly call for tenders for the construction of two cofferdams on either side of the site where the power houses will later be erected. Both cofferdams will lie across the boundary; but both are to be wholly constructed by Ontario Hydro.

II. The Considerations

5. Following an enquiry by the Chairman of Ontario Hydro as to what customs and immigration arrangements might be made by Canada and the United States to enable materials, equipment and men to move unimpeded across the boundary during construction of the power house cofferdams referred to above, the matter was taken up informally with the US State Department by the Canadian Embassy at Washington. It is now understood that the United States is prepared to waive the normal passport and visa requirements for temporary entry into the United States of foreign labour working on these cofferdams provided that the men are legally landed in Canada, that their entry will be limited to geographic areas where they should have access for the purposes of the cofferdams and that they will be required to wear a badge or to have some other form of identification. The United States will also allow any material for incorporation in the cofferdams to enter duty free (although there will be no exemption on materials to be used for approaches) and construction equipment will be allowed to enter in bond subject to a guarantee of re-export on completion of the work.

6. With reference to US intentions in the field of customs, it must be recognized that it may be relatively easy for the United States government to expose its producers and contractors, who operate on a large scale with low costs, to the full force of international competition. The position of Canadian industry is less secure. It might nevertheless be unfortunate, at home and abroad, if the Canadian government appeared to be following a less liberal tariff policy than the United States with regard to an enterprise of joint and common concern. On the other hand, because of the fact that the average wage in the Cornwall area is considerably below the Massachusetts level, it may be that the US proposals regarding the waiving of normal immigration requirements may work in favour of Canadian labour and to the detriment of US labour.

7. It should be noted that the US intentions referred to above relate to the power house cofferdams. It is now understood, however, that the United States will probably suggest that similar customs and immigration arrangements be made in respect of all other power works. The only decision required immediately concerns the position the Canadian Government wishes to take on special customs and immigration arrangements for the construction of these cofferdams. It must be recognized, however, that the cofferdams are the first part of, and will likely set the pattern for, other more important works. For these reasons, the committee of officials thought it advisable to consider the problem in relation to the project as a whole rather than to cofferdams alone.

8. Insofar as immigration requirements are concerned, there is no really serious problem. As stated above, the margin between Canadian and US wage levels is such that Canada could probably waive immigration requirements on a wider basis than would likely be acceptable to the United States.

9. The problem is rather more complex with regard to materials and equipment. It might be well to remember, in this connection,

(a) that government policy has consistently been to avoid federal subsidization of hydro-electric power projects;

(b) that while some remissions (e.g., of sales tax) might improve the competitive position of Canadian producers of materials and equipment, other remissions (e.g., of customs duties) would normally work in the opposite direction;

(c) that there have been recent precedents for making certain concessions in connection with developmental projects of national significance (e.g., the Labrador railway, the oil pipeline, etc.);

(d) that the essentially international character of at least a part of the work involved in the St. Lawrence power project appears to put that part of the work (although not necessarily the whole project) in a special position deserving special treatment;

(e) that it would be very difficult, if not impossible, from a purely administrative point of view to apply normal customs and immigration requirements in cases where a single contractor undertook a project which straddled the boundary — as, for example, the Iroquois dam or the dredging of the channels;

(f) that the cofferdams will contain a good deal of Canadian supplies such as rock fill and undressed lumber, no matter what decisions are taken on duties and taxes, and not very significant quantities of steel which would be the only important item affected by the Canadian tariff, while the other more permanent structures such as power houses, dams and dykes would involve much greater quantities of dutiable steel and concrete; and

(g) that while some of the construction equipment required for the whole project (e.g., compressors, rock-drilling machinery, diesel shovels and cranes, heavy duty trucks, pile-drivers, dredges, scows, tugs, conveyers, concrete pumps, etc.) is made in Canada, most of it is not.

10. The committee of officials considered the implications of the two extreme positions — complete remission of duties and taxes or no concession of any kind — and also of several mid-way measures such as remission of duties and taxes on materials only or equipment only, reduction of British Preferential to free with proportionate lowering of MFN rate, remission only in cases where materials are of a class of kind not made in Canada or where equipment is not available in Canada, etc.

11. After studying these various possibilities in the light of all relevant factors — interests of Canadian labour, contractors and manufacturers; undesirability of appearing less liberal tariff-wise than the United States; administrative difficulty of applying normal customs and immigration rules to works lying astride the boundary; government policy regarding hydro-electric power projects; etc. — the committee came to the conclusion that the most practical and defensible course of action would be to make a distinction between the “international” and the “national” components of the project and to waive all duties and taxes and immigration requirements in respect of the former while making no concession of any kind in respect of the latter.

12. Attached hereto as Appendix “A”[†] is a tentative allocation of the main works into two such categories. Also shown are the total expenditures (exclusive of interest during construction) to be made in each country on these works. The total Canadian and US investment is of the order of $500 million. Of this, something more than $350 million will be expenditures of an essentially “national” rather than “international” character, clearly located on one side of the boundary or the other. These “national” works include both power houses, the generating equipment, the Long Sault dam, the dykes and all rehabilitation undertakings such as relocation of highways, railways, bridges, towns, etc. (Incidentally, the seaway project will consist entirely of “national” components of this character with the exception of dredging in the Thousand Island section). The remainder of the power project, amounting to slightly more than $130 million for both Ontario and New York, consists of works which are predominantly “international”, i.e., dredging, cofferdams and the Iroquois control dam. The cost of that portion of these three “international” components actually located in Canada, and to which therefore Canadian duties and taxes would normally apply, is estimated to be $42.5 million; but this figure includes labour and management costs and therefore the dutiable or taxable element would be substantially lower than that.

III. Recommendations

13. It is therefore recommended,

(a) that all duties and taxes on materials to be incorporated in the cofferdams required for the St. Lawrence power project and on equipment to be used in the construction of these cofferdams be remitted (see Appendix “B”)[†] and that normal immigration requirements be waived in respect of workers (but not dependents and camp followers) employed on these works — (in the case of duties and taxes, remission would normally be by Order in Council; in the case of labour, employers would be required to furnish each employee with an identification card bearing his photograph and to forward certain prescribed information concerning each such employee to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration);

(b) that, without commitment (except with regard to cofferdams) as to which works should be classed in each category, approval be given to the principle that all duties and taxes should be remitted and normal immigration requirements waived in respect of “international” works (generally speaking, the works that straddle the boundary) but that no concession of any kind be made with regard to other or “national” works; and

(c) that the US State Department be informed that the government is prepared to reciprocate in the matter of special customs and immigration arrangements on cofferdams as set out in (a) above and that the Department of External Affairs be authorized, in consultation with the government departments concerned and subject to final Cabinet approval, to negotiate with the State Department a reciprocal customs and immigration agreement covering the whole power project along the lines suggested in (b) above.¹²⁹

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY; U.S. PROPOSAL FOR PARTICIPATION IN CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION; REPORT ON MEETINGS OF CANADIAN AND U.S. OFFICIALS HELD ON JULY 5 AND 6

I. INTRODUCTION

1. Canadian and United States officials met in Ottawa on July 5 and 6 to explore the problems which arise out of the US proposal to participate in the construction and operation of the Seaway and to fix an agenda for inter-governmental meetings to be held at a later date.

2. At the conclusion of the second day's meeting, both Canadian and US officials approved the agenda set out hereunder for the inter-governmental meetings which are to be held at a date and place to be determined by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and US Secretary of Defence Wilson in consultation:

DRAFT AGENDA

1. Opening statements.
2. Assurances required under the Wiley Act.
3. Contribution of $15 million to power entities toward meeting cost of channel enlargements.
4. Provision of 14' canals in Canadian territory.
5. General views regarding policy of separate or joint tolls.
6. Agreement on consultation before navigation works are duplicated by either country.

¹²⁹ Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 13 juillet 1954./Approved by Cabinet, July 13, 1954.
Voir/See Canada, Department of External Affairs, Press Releases, 1954, No. 62.

7. Navigation rights and conditions on which vessels may use canals in International Section.
8. Effects of modified arrangements on legal situation in the light of US and Canadian legislation and International Joint Commission Order.
9. Possibility of a new Canada-US agreement to embody modified arrangements.
10. Expectation of timing of construction programme.
11. Other business.

II. THE FACTS

3. Attached hereto as Appendix "A"† is a résumé of the more important developments that have taken place since the Prime Minister first discussed with the President of the United States, in September of 1951, the possibility of developing the Seaway as an all-Canadian project.

4. It will be seen from a perusal of this Appendix that the only effective international instruments concerning the Seaway now in existence are the Notes which were exchanged by the Canadian and US governments on June 30, 1952. Copies of these Notes are attached as Appendix "B".†

III. THE PROBLEMS

5. As a result of the meetings of officials on July 5 and 6 the United States views (which were ascertained in a purely tentative and exploratory fashion) might be summed up as follows:

The United States Administration is not only authorized but directed to build canals and works in the United States territory in the International Rapids Section to the extent of $105 million. These works must be for navigation alone. Accordingly, the Wiley Act provides neither the authority nor funds required to compensate Canada for the $15 million though conceivably this amount, if paid by Canada, might be amortized in a joint toll structure which covered the Seaway from Lake Erie to Montreal. There was an evident reluctance on the part of the United States officials to offer any encouragement for the continuation of 14' navigation in Canada which, even with tolls, would tend to detract from the possibility of amortizing the United States investment in the "Wiley" works. As for compensation for the destruction of the 14' navigation, no immediate solution could be foreseen by United States officials. As regards the treatment of Canadian vessels, it was difficult to foresee that a Treaty could be ratified by the United States even if signed; it was hoped that these matters could be settled as we went along in the course of the years. On the subject of assurances, those required under the Wiley Act were more of a formality but the United States officials indicated that their Government might wish to have an international Agreement with Canada whereby neither side would construct parallel works in the International Rapids Section in the absence of full discussions between both countries.

6. On the Canadian side, the importance attached to the $15 million and to the treatment of Canadian ships was underlined. It was indicated that while there was a preference for unilateral tolls no firm view had been arrived at. Likewise while Canada thought there was some equity in being compensated for the 14' navigation, no decision would be taken on this point nor, indeed, on the question of continuing 14' navigation.

$15 million contribution towards channel enlargements

7. It is unlikely that the United States can give, at this time, any firm undertaking to compensate Canada for its contribution towards the enlargement of channels for use by power and navigation in the International Rapids Section. The best that could be hoped for is either

(a) a United States Administration undertaking, embodied in an Executive Agreement, to seek Congressional appropriation of funds or a change of legislation at a later date, or

(b) an undertaking to compensate Canada out of tolls if Canada joins in setting the tolls in the whole Seaway between Lake Erie and the port of Montreal. (In this latter connection, the preliminary opinion of the United States Assistant Attorney General Rankin is that the Wiley Act envisages the fixing of tolls for the whole Seaway and the rules for fixing of measurements of vessels and the apportionment of revenues to be three inseparable and mandatory elements under the Wiley Act.)

8. If Cabinet is prepared to accept the undertaking mentioned in paragraph 7(a), such an undertaking might be forthcoming without much delay. At the same time, once the United States Administration had taken reasonable steps to get the necessary Congressional approval, this obligation would be discharged even if the efforts to fulfil it were unsuccessful.

9. As regards the alternative mentioned in paragraph 7(b), Canada might find it difficult to withdraw from the understanding to fix tolls and ship measurements and to apportion revenues jointly unless it were prepared to forfeit the collection from the International Rapids Section of the then remaining unpaid share of the $15 million with interest.

10. It should be noted that a corollary of the preliminary United States view on joint tolls is probably that should Canada not agree to joint toll-fixing procedures, the United States could not collect the amount of $15 million for Canada out of tolls fixed in the International Rapids Section alone. In these circumstances, there would seem to be nothing to prevent Canada from amortizing the $15 million out of adjacent portions of the Canadian Seaway.

Treatment of Canadian vessels in the "Wiley" locks

11. United States officials gave clear indications that it would be extremely difficult to give guarantees (even if Canada assured reciprocity) that Canadian vessels should be able to use the "Wiley" canals on terms no more onerous or restrictive than United States or Canadian vessels using Canadian canals. (Naturally, tolls would not be included in such an arrangement.) From a security, immigration, customs, economic and navigational viewpoint, a Treaty approved by Congress would be required. United States officials raised doubts as to the constitutionality of such action which would, in effect, deprive the United States the application of a part of its territorial sovereignty when Canadian vessels use the "Wiley" locks.

12. It was suggested by United States officials that, insofar as security (in the broad sense) was concerned, this matter might be dealt with by joint consultation through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. No recommendation by this Board, however, would be binding on the United States if it were in contravention of terms of, say, the so-called McCarren-Walter Immigration Act.

13. Under these circumstances (which must still be re-examined by officials versed in the law) it seems that the most Canada could obtain from the United States might be an assurance (embodied in an Executive Agreement) that the United States government would first consult Canada before Congress passed a law or the Administration fixed regulations affecting Canadian shipping in the "Wiley" locks. Even this assurance might be difficult to obtain because of the broad field of legislation or regulations involved.

Treatment of third-party shipping in the "Wiley" locks

14. United States officials, naturally, could not give any assurances on this point. There is little doubt, however, that this point is more important to Canada since Canada may be dependent to a large extent on foreign vessels for its commerce. This matter is to be studied by officials of both countries before the intergovernmental discussions to be held in the latter part of July. It may be that a rule of non-discrimination will be found to be binding in both countries because of the network of treaties of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation. Assuming this to be so (and assuming that Congress did not over-ride by legislation the United States treaties of this type) Canada may find some comfort in non-discrimination but may well find that foreign (including Commonwealth) vessels carrying Canadian cargoes may be seriously hampered (especially in time of crisis) when using the "Wiley" locks.

Tolls

15. It seemed clear from the discussions on July 5 and 6 that the United States strongly favoured the establishment of tolls on a joint basis. One of the arguments advanced by US officials in favour of the joint toll system was that it might perhaps be possible for them to devote a proportionately greater portion of the revenues from tolls to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority in consideration of the fact that the Authority would have made a contribution of $15 million towards channel enlargements at the International Section. They did not see off hand how this end could be achieved in the absence of such joint tolls.

16. On the other hand, Canadian officials made it quite clear that although no decision had been taken by the Government on this point it seemed very likely that Canada would favour unilateral tolls as being easier both to establish and to administer.

Continuation of or compensation for 14' navigation

17. In this case, as for the $15 million compensation for the enlargement of channels, the United States might find that, on grounds of equity, a portion of the compensation might be paid to Canada. This compensation, United States officials intimated, could not be paid under the Wiley Act but might possibly be recovered out of joint tolls, but the indication on this score was not very clear.

18. The impression gained from United States officials was that they did not favour the continuation of even a toll-paying 14' system on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section as this would not only tend to perpetuate an uneconomie mode of transportation but would detract from the possibilities of amortizing the cost of the construction of the "Wiley" locks.

19. Cabinet will wish to decide, in the circumstances, whether 14' navigation facilities in the International Rapids Section will be continued. If the answer is in the affirmative, Cabinet will wish to consider whether it is desirable rather than to rebuild 14' locks, to build at Cornwall a portion of a 27-foot lock. Whether or not 14' navigation is to be perpetuated in this section of the River, it will be a matter for decision by the Canadian Government what lands it desires under the Ontario-Canada Agreement, whether this Agreement is to be re-negotiated and what steps should be taken to water the 14' canal at Cornwall.

20. If Cabinet decided not to continue 14' navigation in the International Rapids Section, a decision should be reached as to what compensation should be asked of the United States in view of Canada's waiver of this compensation as regards the New York State Power Authority while, at the same time, holding the Province of Ontario liable to reconstruct the 14' system.

Assurances

21. United States officials indicated that it would be desirable for Canada and the United States to have an Agreement or understanding whereby neither country would duplicate facilities in the International Rapids Section without first discussing the matter fully with the other country. The reasons advanced for such consultation were that neither country would wish to do anything which would adversely affect the joint investments in the seaway. While such an understanding may not affect fundamentally Canada's freedom of action, it is based on the assumption that the seaway is a joint venture in which the United States acquires a voice. Cabinet will wish to consider whether any assurances are to be given or an understanding is to be reached as to consultation on future developments.

IV. ADVANTAGES AND DISADVANTAGES OF US PARTICIPATION

22. From the Canadian point of view, there appear to be no engineering, economic or navigation advantages in having the international section canals constructed in US territory.

23. It must be remembered that the 1941 agreement was based on the principle that the whole Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin would be developed on a 50/50 basis by Canada and the United States and it was necessary to allocate the International Section of the St. Lawrence to the United States to compensate for the very extensive work done by Canada in other areas. This convincing argument in favour of US canals has since disappeared. Furthermore, current estimates place the cost of constructing the canals on either side of the boundary at about the same figure, somewhere between $85 and $88 million. Indeed, there is now some indication that, for engineering reasons, the Control Dam at Iroquois may be moved a few miles downstream and, in this eventuality, it is estimated that the canal and lock to by-pass this dam can be constructed in Canada at a cost appreciably below that of constructing these facilities in the United States.

24. However, the fact cannot be escaped that the Wiley Act is one of the very few legislative successes about which the US administration can boast and it would no doubt be a shock to the US public and particularly to the US administration if the Canadian Government were now to erect difficulties in the way of implementation of that legislation. There may therefore be some advantage to be gained in the interests of harmonious Canada-US relations in not placing too many difficulties in the way of US participation in the construction and operation of a portion of the seaway.

25. It would therefore appear that, from the Canadian point of view, the above is the one single advantage to be gained from US participation in construction of the seaway.

26. There are, however, several important disadvantages to such participation. These are briefly summarized hereunder:

(a) Canada could not be sure of full protection of Canadian and foreign shipping destined to Canadian ports in the Great Lakes.

(b) Some additional expenditure (which may be greater or lesser depending on the nature of the works undertaken) would be required to ensure continued access by water to the various industries, some of which are rather important, along the existing Cornwall canal.

(c) Canada would be losing a transport facility of considerable value which would provide important employment opportunities to Canadian labour.

(d) In the International Rapids Section future industrial expansion would likely be attracted to the United States where seaway navigation facilities were available rather than in Canada where such facilities were not to be had.

(e) An increase in administrative difficulties is only to be expected if the St. Lawrence Seaway is to be subject to two rather than to one national authority.

(f) In view of developments since the Fall of 1951, a majority of Canadian public opinion might react unfavourably if the so-called "all-Canadian" seaway was not now brought to fruition.

V. COST OF CANADIAN 27-FT AND 14-FT NAVIGATION WORKS

27. The estimated cost of the various components of the Canadian 27-ft navigation works, from Montreal to Lake Erie, exclusive of interest and of the $15 million contribution towards enlargement of channels in the International Section, are as follows:

(a) Lachine (no power develop.)	$122,500,000
(b) Beauharnois	47,100,000
(c) Lake St. Francis	4,500,000
(d) International Rapids
i) Long Sault canal & locks	70,500,000
ii) Iroquois canal & lock	14,500,000
(e) Thousand Islands	2,000,000
(f) Welland canal	2,000,000
Total:	$263,100,000

28. If the United States takes on the construction of the two canals and locks in the International Section and dredging in the Thousand Islands section, the estimated Canadian cost of these works should be deducted from the total of $263.1 million referred to in paragraph 27, but to this reduced total should be added the following expenditures if 14-ft. navigation is to be continued on the Canadian side:

Maintenance of 14-ft. locks and canal at Cornwall	$ 14,300,000
Maintenance of 14-ft. lock and canal at Iroquois	1,000,000
Add reduced amount for 27-ft works	166,100,000
Total:	$181,400,000

29. In the event the government agrees that the United States and not Canada should proceed with at least a portion of the works in the international section of the river, one plan that has commended itself to the Canadian officials concerned would involve US construction of the Long Sault canal and locks — Canadian and US estimates are almost identical on this portion —, Canadian construction of the Iroquois canal and lock since this can be done much more cheaply in Canada and, in addition, excavation of a 27' channel and construction of half a 27' lock in the dyke in Canadian territory just above Cornwall, which works would be linked with the existing 14' canal below the dyke. The cost of proceeding with this 27' construction in the dry would be four or five times less than if undertaken later when levels had been raised in the power pool. Furthermore, this plan would enable the Canadian 27' navigation works to be completed with maximum speed and minimum engineering inconvenience whenever such action appeared to be warranted. The Canadian expenditures involved under this arrangement would be as follows:

Iroquois canal and lock	$14,500,000
Excavation of 27' channel	2,500,000
Half 27' lock in dyke	14,000,000
Link between lock and 14' canal	500,000
Expropriation of lands	4,500,000
	36,000,000
Add other Canadian 27' works	166,100,000
Total:	$202,100,000

The economics of this plan are set out in synoptic form in Appendix "C" hereto.†

30. It should perhaps be noted that two 27' canal systems could be constructed in the International Rapids section — one on either side of the river — at a total cost of approximately $175 million. Although a twin lock canal system capable of handling as much traffic as two separate single canals could be built for appreciably less either in Canada or in the United States, the $175 million referred to above is less than the total costs allocated to navigation in the International Rapids section under the 1941 Agreement. Furthermore, there is every indication that it will be necessary to double the capacity of the single 27' system in a very few years after it has been completed. At that time, of course, thought will also have to be given to doubling the capacity of Welland ($100 million) and Lachine ($40 million).

VI. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

31. The Committee has reached the conclusion that there are two main alternative courses of action open to Canada, the choice of which must be decided on grounds of broad policy, and several important questions of detail to be settled if one of these courses is followed.

32. The main issue is to decide whether Canada should plan to build the Seaway herself in the International Rapids area, finding excuses to delay a definite decision until after the American election in November, or whether agreement should be sought with the United States under which they would build the main canals in this section with adequate safeguards for Canadian interests. This central issue must be decided mainly in the light of the probable effect which a Canadian decision to "go it alone" would have on Canadian-American relations. All other considerations favour this course of action, but some members of the Committee feel that it would cause very serious harm to the general attitude toward Canada in the Administration and Congress, after the very heavy political effort that has been made to get Congressional approval for what they regard as a cooperative venture. If the United States turned down proposals advanced by Canada that public opinion, and Congress, would regard as reasonable, then it might be possible to go it alone after the election without much danger to general Canadian-American relations. The only issue on which it seems possible to get such a productive disagreement would be a firm stand by Canada that the United States must get immediately (in 1955) authority to make the $15 million payment to the power entities on our behalf, perhaps coupled with insistence on protection of the rights of Canadian shipping in the US canals by a special treaty. By making a firm stand on these two conditions we might succeed in preventing agreement before November and paving the way for a solely Canadian venture.

33. If, on the other hand, it is decided to seek agreement with the United States on an arrangement in which they would participate, it is suggested it might be found along the following lines:

(a) Canada would construct the small canal around the Iroquois dam. The new location of the dam makes this more economical than the present US proposal. By constructing this dam Canada makes it much easier and less expensive at some time in future to have a Canadian seaway by duplicating on the Canadian side the main canal around the power-house when the traffic situation justifies that. Moreover the construction of this dam would justify our paying the $15 million to the power companies, which is for dredging above and below this dam, and to collect tolls on it to pay the cost of such dredging.

The United States could probably not agree to our doing this, as Congress had directed them to do it in the Wiley Act, but they would probably not duplicate it and would accept the situation as leaving them with the main canal, and an essential link in the whole seaway, which is what Congress really wanted.

(b) Canada should ask for United States agreement in principle to the entry into a treaty which would ensure to each country that the other would not put restrictions (other than tolls) on the use of its canals (or boundary waters) more onerous than those imposed by the other country without mutual agreement. This would cover the whole seaway from the Gulf to Lake Superior, and apply to customs, immigration, shipping and security laws and regulations.

The United States may be reluctant to enter into such a treaty, though there is some chance they would agree if it is reciprocal, as proposed above, and perhaps if they received certain assurances regarding security regulations to safeguard against possible introduction of atomic bombs in foreign ships. It might be necessary to restrict the application of this treaty to US and Canadian vessels. If the United States will not agree to a treaty, it will be necessary to decide whether Canada should be satisfied with something less, such as an undertaking to consult before applying new restrictions, and this decision will presumably depend on how much we wish to secure agreement on a cooperative venture rather than "go it alone".

(c) In regard to tolls, Canada should agree only to study the question of joint versus separate tolls, making no commitment and indicating that at present the Canadian view is that separate tolls are more practical and to be preferred. It appears that the United States Congress was most interested in getting the maximum United States voice in setting of tolls, and the United States may be expected to press for joint tolls, but they have no real argument for this nor bargaining power in getting Canada to agree to it.

(d) Canada should be prepared to give, through the Seaway Authority, the necessary formal assurances that she is proceeding with the rest of the seaway, but should make no undertakings, beyond agreeing to consult in advance, regarding the construction of parallel facilities in future.

(e) The United States should be informed of Canada's intentions with regard to the construction of facilities to continue 14' navigation and prepare in advance for later construction of a full 27' canal on the Canadian side when conditions warrant parallel canals. (The substance of this is discussed below).

34. If it is agreed to proceed cooperatively with the United States, it is necessary then to decide whether or not facilities will be constructed to continue 14' navigation on the Canadian side for the "canallers" and whether, and to what degree, preparation will be made now for building a 27' Canadian canal at Cornwall in the future. On these related matters the Committee's conclusions are as follows:

(a) The construction of 14' navigation is not important enough to justify much expenditure on it, even though Ontario is obligated under its agreement to construct new 14' canals. It is necessary, however, to make some expenditure to keep water flowing in the old 14' canal below the new dam, in front of Cornwall, to serve the industry there and preserve the water table under that city. If, however, certain major works are undertaken now, as proposed below, in preparation for future construction of a 27' canal on the Canadian side, the extra cost of preserving 14' navigation would be quite small and would seem to be justified if the canal at Iroquois were on the Canadian side, as proposed.

(b) The excavation of a 27' channel in the pool above the main dam at the approaches to the future Canadian 27' canal would cost about $2 1/2 million if done before flooding, compared with an estimated $8 million if done by dredging later. Even after allowing for compound interest on the cost, it would seem prudent to undertake this excavation now if there is any chance, as seems to be the case, that Canada will later build a 27' canal. This has the additional value of permitting development of dock facilities for industry and commerce on the Canadian side in the pool immediately above Cornwall.

(c) It also appears prudent, if there is any chance of Canada later constructing a 27' canal at Cornwall, to acquire the land that would be required. Ontario will have some of this land after completing their construction, which they can turn over to us, and could acquire the additional parcels required when they are expropriating the large amounts they need. Canada would have to pay for this additional land, at a cost of perhaps $4 1/2 million now, but will be able to lease it until it is needed, and the cost of acquiring it later after further development of the area would likely be much higher than the present cost.

(d) The most expensive work involved in preparation for future construction of a Canadian 27' seaway (and continuation of 14' navigation in the meantime) would be the construction, within the large dyke to be built north of the power house dam, of a portion of the upper Cornwall lock eventually required there. This is estimated to cost about $14 million if constructed at the time the dyke is built, and about $17 1/2 million if constructed later. If the 27' canal were not constructed until ten years or more after the preparatory work is done, compound interest on the original cost would exceed the saving due to engineering advantages. On the other hand, however, the existence of this preparatory work and of a Canadian canal at Iroquois would reduce to quite reasonable dimensions the additional cost necessary to finish a 27' canal on the Canadian side at Cornwall when traffic grows to the point where it is justified, or if restrictions on the use of the US canal are found to be a serious obstacle to Canada securing the full benefits of the seaway as a whole. On those grounds the Committee feels warranted in recommending it.

35. If it is decided to continue 14' navigation at Cornwall by making some preparations for 27' navigation, and to put the 27' canal in Canada at Iroquois, Ontario's obligations under her agreement with Canada are complicated and not entirely clear. Moreover, by waiving any claim on New York for a share of the cost of meeting these obligations, Canada has weakened her moral claim for Ontario paying the full cost of continuing 14' navigation. On the whole it would seem reasonable in these circumstances to work out some compromise with Ontario, perhaps by waiving the portion that New York would have paid but for our earlier waiver made in order to secure approval by the International Joint Commission.¹³⁰

TELEGRAM WA-1306

Washington, July 26, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

Reference: Our telegram WA-879 of May 19.†

¹³⁰ Le Cabinet a examiné ce mémoire le 13 juillet 1954, mais a remis sa décision à une date ultérieure en juillet alors que Saint- Laurent et Harris devraient être présents.

The Cabinet considered this memorandum on July 13, 1954 but deferred decision until late July when St. Laurent and Harris were expected to be present.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY: UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION

During the most recent phase of the St. Lawrence issue we have deliberately refrained from commenting, since we doubted whether we had sufficient knowledge of the engineering and economic problems involved to participate helpfully in the detailed discussions you have been having in Ottawa. However, the memorandum to Cabinet which we understand is to be considered tomorrow makes so many references to possible effects on relations between Canada and the United States of the alternative solutions now being considered that we think you might again wish to have our views before final decisions are taken. You will know better than we whether it would be useful to circulate this message to those in other departments who are concerned with the St. Lawrence Seaway.

2. Of the two alternative courses of action suggested in the memorandum to Cabinet, the first is that Canada should plan to build the Seaway wholly on the Canadian side of the river and to that end should find excuses to delay a definite decision until after the United States elections in November. It is also suggested that it might be possible to find points of "productive disagreement" which would enable Canada after the elections to build the seaway alone without damaging relations between the two countries. We doubt very much whether such sanguine expectations can be justified.

3. In the first place, it would be difficult, almost to the point of impossibility, we think, to conceal until after the November elections are over that Canada was opposed to the United States building the navigation works in the International Rapids Section in accordance with the terms of the recently passed United States legislation. If the Canadian Government were to adopt this alternative course of action, one result would be that no practical steps to get on with building the seaway in the International Rapids Section would be taken on either the Canadian or the United States side until after the 5th of November. Public opinion here — and we imagine in Canada as well — expects that some start, however slight, will be made on the seaway this year. If nothing whatsoever were to be done, that fact, and the reasons for it, would inevitably, we think, be brought to light by one of the many newspapermen here who are interested in the St. Lawrence project and knowledgeable about it. For that reason we think it would be deluded to expect that a decision as to whether the canals in the International Rapids Section should be built by Canada or the United States could be quietly postponed until after November. Such a course, in our opinion, would almost certainly lead to the kind of public outcry in this country which we mentioned as a possibility to be taken into account in our telegram WA-897 of May 19.

4. Intrinsic to this alternative, as we understand it, is the possibility of finding points of "productive disagreement" with the United States which would enable Canada, after the November elections had been held, to announce that it had decided to build the seaway in Canadian territory. These points are defined as positions to be taken by the Canadian Government which the United States Administration could not accept but which would commend themselves as reasonable to United States public opinion and to Congress. Conceivably, such points of disagreement might be found. But we are convinced that neither of the points mentioned in the memorandum to Cabinet fall within the terms of definition.

5. It is suggested, first, that, although the Administration almost certainly could not undertake to pay the $15 million for channel enlargement, the equity of Canada's claim that this responsibility should be assumed by the United States if it wishes to build the canals in the International Rapids Section, would be recognized by public opinion in this country. Without questioning the fairness of the Canadian position on this issue, we would despair of presenting it to public opinion here in a way that would seem to provide clear-cut justification for rejecting the United States proposal. Some of us in this mission have had more experience with the labyrinths of the St. Lawrence Seaway than all but a very small proportion of the United States public. But we cheerfully admit that we usually have to hesitate a moment and collect our thoughts before being able to explain, with any degree of clarity, how this $15 million item arose and why it should be paid by the United States. To draw a clear thread of argument through the various complicated agreements in a way that would carry conviction to public opinion in this country would be a disheartening assignment for even the most redoubtable Canadian propagandist, in our opinion.

6. The other Canadian position mentioned as a possible point of "productive disagreement" is perhaps easier to present in simple terms. We would like Canadian ships to pass through the locks on the United States side of the river as if they were passing through Canadian locks. That is understandable enough. But it must be remembered that the United States position is also simple. It runs something like this. "Most of the Canadian wheat that is shipped east from Fort William passes through the MacArthur locks at the Sault in United States territory. You have never experienced any serious difficulty there, so why should you require additional guarantees of unimpeded right of passage through the Wiley Locks? Moreover, what you are seeking is a treaty that is quite unprecedented. Not content with national treatment in the Wiley Locks, you want Canadian law to apply in one strip of United States territory." If the arguments were joined in something like that fashion, as we believe it would be, we doubt very much whether public opinion here could be persuaded that the Canadian case was more reasonable than that advanced by the Administration. Accordingly, we think that both of the points of "productive disagreement" that have been suggested fall to the ground as failing to meet the specifications. In brief, we believe that it would be mistaken to think that negotiations between the two countries could break down on either of these issues without arousing in the United States wide public criticism of Canada.

7. From the point of view of Canadian-United States relations, the second alternative proposed in the memorandum to Cabinet seems to us to be considerably less dangerous. We can see that the proposal to build the Iroquois canal on the Canadian side of the river would have a number of advantages.

(a) It would do something to satisfy those in Canada who believe that an all-Canadian Seaway should be built at all costs.

(b) It would leave less work to be done on the Canadian side of the river if it were decided at some later date to duplicate the canals on the United States side.

(c) It would enable Canada to withdraw its claim that the United States assume responsibility for the $15 million to be paid towards channel enlargement.

(d) The cost of a Canadian canal might be somewhat less than the cost of a United States canal at Iroquois. Moreover, it might prove that, if a Canadian canal at Iroquois were not duplicated across the river, public opinion in the United States would not be disturbed by this change in the programme of construction indicated in the legislation recently passed by Congress. To all but a few initiates, it might then seem that the intent of the legislation was being implemented, since large and important navigation works would be constructed in United States territory and since the United States and Canada would be cooperating in building the Seaway. Nor do we think that those particularly in upper New York State, who might oppose any such modification of the Wiley Scheme, would easily be able to whip up widespread public feeling against it.

8. The situation, however, would be very different if parallel canals were to be built simultaneously at Iroquois. The oddity of such an outcome would be bound to attract widespread notice in the United States, and Canada would be blamed for insisting on duplicating a canal for which full provision had already been made in the legislation approved by Congress. From the conversations which Wershof had in Washington last week, we gather that the lawyers on the United States side are convinced that the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation here could not legally drop such a substantial item as the Iroquois canal from its construction programme. Conceivably, however, the United States authorities might be induced not to go forward with a duplicate canal if confronted in fact with a decision by Canada to build the navigation facilities at Iroquois on the Canadian side. In any case, we think that a decision on the second alternative mentioned in the memorandum to Cabinet should be taken in the full light of the probable consequences on opinion in the United States if the upshot of these negotiations were the construction of all the canals contemplated in the Wiley Legislation and in addition construction of a Canadian canal at Iroquois.

9. We of course agree that Canada should reserve the right to construct 27' canals on the Canadian side of the river at any time that they may be required by the needs of traffic in the St. Lawrence either because of growth in the volume of tonnage or because of any other developments that may be operating to deprive Canada of the full benefits of the Seaway.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY; PROPOSAL FOR U.S. PARTICIPATION

3. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of July 13th, said that legal officers of the Canadian and U.S. governments had met in Washington on July 23rd, to elucidate legal problems involved in the draft agenda for the forthcoming intergovernmental meetings on the United States proposal to participate in the construction and operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway. It seemed clear, from the reports which had been received of these meetings, that there was practically no chance of obtaining U.S. ratification of a treaty which would guarantee to Canadian and other shipping destined to Canadian ports in the Great Lakes treatment no more onerous than that which applied to U.S. shipping in Canadian canals.

Notwithstanding this, it was important not to turn down on unreasonable grounds the U.S. proposal for participation in construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway. It should always be borne in mind that, legally at least, it might be possible for the U.S. Administration to have cancelled the licence granted by the Federal Power Commission to the New York State Power Authority. If this were to come about, there would be no Seaway since the power project was an essential prerequisite to its construction.

The Wiley Act was predicted on the principle of co-operation between the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and the United States Seaway Corporation. Such co-operation could obviously only take place in the International Section of the St. Lawrence River. Consequently, if the United States found it impossible to assume responsibility for the contribution of $15 million towards certain channel excavations to be undertaken by the power entities in this Section, then it seemed to him that the Canadian government would be justified in informing the United States that Canada would construct the short canal and lock required to by-pass the Iroquois control dam and would collect sufficient tolls on this canal to amortize its cost plus the $15 million contribution during the 50-year period prescribed by the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act. The Iroquois canal and lock could be constructed in Canadian territory for something less than $14 million. This would still leave the main canal and locks and the power houses to be built by the United States at a cost of approximately $70 million. If this were done, he did not think that there was any real need to continue the 14-foot canal system at Cornwall, beyond ensuring continued access by water to the industries located along the banks of this canal, nor to do, now certain preparatory works required to provide eventually a second 27-foot system on the Canadian side at Cornwall.

4. In the course of discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) The United States legal officers who had participated in the Washington discussions of July 23rd, (Mr. Brucker, General Counsel of the Department of Defence; Mr. Rankin, Assistant Attorney General; and Mr. Yingling, of the U.S. State Department) had been rather unreceptive to the suggestion that Canada might construct the Iroquois canal and retain responsibility for the $15 million contribution. They had pointed out that the Wiley Act not only authorized but directed the U.S. Corporation to construct all the navigation facilities in the international section and to do the dredging required in the Thousand Islands. In the circumstances, they did not see how the United States could agree to forego construction of the Iroquois canal. Notwithstanding this attitude of the U.S. legal officers, it was suggested that the United States might be informed that the Canadian government proposed to construct the navigation works at Iroquois and, if such construction were indeed undertaken by Canada, it was thought that the United States would likely not proceed with construction of duplicate facilities in U.S. territory.

(b) Although it had been indicated to U.S. officials participating in the Canada-United States discussions of July 5th and 6th in Ottawa that the Canadian government would likely favour unilateral tolls in preference to a joint toll system, it might be possible to reach an agreement on the relative relationship of tolls to be imposed on various commodities, it being understood that actual rates would be determined independently by each authority, taking into account the total capital investment and operating and maintenance charges to be amortized. It was noted that although the Wiley Act stipulated that a rather complicated procedure of public hearings and appeals would apply to unilateral tolls, no provision was made for the application of this procedure to joint tolls. On the other hand, it was suggested that it would perhaps be in the best interests of Canada to have the tolls fixed unilaterally, as it would then be possible for the Seaway Authority to fix its own tolls within the framework of its governing statute without any interference by the U.S. Corporation. Unilateral tolls would have the added advantage of avoiding the complications which might arise if an attempt were made to establish an agreed international toll structure. In any event, for bargaining purposes at least, it would seem preferable to suggest to the United States, in the first instance, that the Canadian government favoured unilateral tolls.

(c) It seemed unlikely that the United States could or would ratify a treaty which would ensure that Canadian shipping in U.S. canals would be subject to treatment and conditions no more onerous than those which applied to U.S. shipping in Canadian canals. However, it would probably be possible to reach an executive agreement with the United States to the effect that neither government would make any change in its own rules governing navigation in the Seaway without prior consultation with the other.

(d) There was some indication that a majority of Canadians favoured construction of the Seaway entirely in Canada. In the circumstances, it was for consideration whether it would not be possible to delay decision in this matter until after the forthcoming Congressional elections, when a decision to proceed with the all-Canadian Seaway could be taken with minimum adverse political effect in the United States.

(e) There might be some delay in completion of the Seaway if the Province of Quebec delayed much longer its decision as to whether or not it would participate in the construction of a joint power-navigation project at Lachine. In the circumstances, Canada should hasten preparation of the engineering plans for construction of the navigation works alone and then inform the Premier of Quebec that if he did not feel disposed to proceed now with the power project, the Canadian government would immediately commence independent construction of the navigation works.

(f) There seemed to be no doubt that, under the terms of the Constitution, the bed and foreshore of that portion of the St. Lawrence River lying within the boundaries of the Province of Quebec belonged to the Crown in the right of the province. However, from decisions which had been rendered in the past by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it seemed clear that the Federal government could expropriate provincial property for works which were to the general benefit of Canada.

(g) It was noted that the forthcoming intergovernmental meeting with the United States would be held in Ottawa on Thursday, August 12th. It had been ascertained that U.S. Secretary of Defence Wilson would not attend and it was very unlikely that U.S. Secretary of State Dulles would find it possible to participate in the talks. In all likelihood, the U.S. delegation would be headed by Deputy Secretary of Defence Anderson.

5. The Cabinet, noted the various suggestions made during the course of discussion, of the stand to be taken by Canada during the forthcoming intergovernmental meeting on United States participation in the construction and operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway and agreed that, as a minimum position, the Canadian representatives should indicate that the Canadian government proposed to construct in Canada the short canal and lock to by-pass the Iroquois control dam and to collect, in tolls, revenues sufficient to amortize the cost of this dam plus the $15 million to be contributed by the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority towards channel excavations to be undertaken by Ontario Hydro and the New York State Power Authority in the International Section of the River.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 174-54

Ottawa, August 9, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY PROJECT

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has asked that the documents listed hereunder and appended hereto relating to the St. Lawrence Seaway Project be circulated for consideration:

- (a) Draft memorandum of instructions to Canadian representatives who will participate in the August 12 discussions with U.S. representatives;
- (b) Draft aide-mémoire on Canadian position; and
- (c) Draft Note to modify Notes exchanged on June 30, 1952.

Also attached is a summary showing the estimated costs involved in the various courses of action that might be followed in connection with the continuance or discontinuance of existing 14-ft facilities at Cornwall in the event the main 27-ft navigation facilities are constructed in U.S. rather than in Canadian territory.

Draft Memorandum

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], August 9, 1954

DRAFT MEMORANDUM OF INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN NEGOTIATORS in anticipation of the talks to be held at Ottawa with United States representatives on the St. Lawrence Seaway on August 12, 1954

Purpose of the Meeting

The object of the United States representatives is to secure the concurrence of the Canadian Government in the construction, operation and maintenance of all the navigation works in the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence River on United States soil in accordance with the Wiley Act.

2. The object of the Canadian negotiators will be to seek a satisfactory modification of the International Arrangements now existing between Canada and the United States (embodied mainly in an Exchange of Notes dated June 30, 1952) in order to meet as far as possible the United States wishes while protecting, at the same time, the essential Canadian interests. (The minimum requirement for the protection of these interests is that Canada build the canal and lock at Iroquois.) (Possible alternatives—new portions underlined)

Alternative A

The minimum requirement for the protection of these interests is that Canada build the canal and lock at Iroquois, acquire now the necessary lands in the International Rapids Section for the future construction of 27-foot facilities in Canada, water the 14-foot canal and build a turn-around basin at Cornwall.

Alternative B

The minimum requirement for the protection of these interests is that Canada build the canal and lock at Iroquois, acquire now the necessary lands in the International Rapids Section and do now some excavations for future 27-foot facilities in Canada, water the 14-foot canal and build a turn-round basin at Cornwall.

Alternative C

The minimum requirement for the protection of these interests is that Canada build the canal and lock at Iroquois, acquire now the necessary lands in the International Rapids Section and do now some excavations for future 27-foot facilities in Canada and continue 14-foot navigation facilities through the International Rapids Section.

Alternative D

The minimum requirement for the protection of these interests is that Canada build the canal and lock at Iroquois, acquire now the necessary lands in the International Rapids Section and do now some excavations for future 27-foot facilities in Canada, continue 14-foot navigation facilities through the International Rapids Section and build part of a 27-foot lock at Cornwall.

General Considerations

3. Under the present Arrangements of June 30, 1952 for the construction in Canada of the whole Seaway between Lake Erie and Montreal, Canada would have complete control of St. Lawrence Basin commerce destined to and from Canada and the United States. If the "Wiley" works are to be built, it appears that, because of the inability of the United States to give additional treaty guarantees satisfactory to Canada, Canadian shipping and trade passing through the "Wiley" canals will be entirely subject to United States laws and regulations notwithstanding that by far the larger part of the St. Lawrence navigation system will have been built by Canada and that, in any event, Canada could build the whole 27-foot Seaway physically in its own territory while the United States could not.

4. It is probable that the United States negotiators will seek to diminish the importance of the International Arrangements of June 30, 1952. They are likely to argue that the Canadian undertakings then given were unsolicited and unilateral Canadian Acts. This is contrary to the facts. United States officials in 1951 declared that if the United States were to agree in a joint development of the power phase, Canada must undertake to develop all the seaway in Canada. Indeed, in a Note of January 11, 1952, the United States Secretary of State said that should Congress not approve the 1941 Agreement soon, the United States would join Canada in referring the project to the International Joint Commission "on the understanding" that the Canadian Government was prepared to proceed with the construction of the Seaway as soon as appropriate arrangements could be made for the construction of the power phase. In the June 30, 1952 Exchange of Notes, Canada informed the United States that when "all arrangements have been made to ensure the completion of the power phase of the St. Lawrence Project" Canada would construct the locks and canals on the Canadian side of the boundary between Lake Erie and Montreal. This undertaking was supplemented by two additional ones. By the first, the New York State Power Authority was relieved of the cost of reimbursing Canada for half of the cost of the destruction of the 14' canal (i.e. about $7 1/2 million though Ontario probably is still bound to pay either this amount or the whole cost under the Ontario-Canada Agreement of 1951). By the second undertaking, Canada agreed to contribute $15 million toward channel enlargements. On the same day, namely, June 30, 1952, the Acting United States Secretary of State declared that his "Government approves the arrangements set forth in your Note". This clearly constitutes an International Arrangement between both countries whereby Canada shall build the whole Seaway between Lake Erie and Montreal. It is this Arrangement which the Canadian negotiators will be asked to modify in order to allow the United States to build part of this Seaway on United States territory and to provide, at the same time, satisfactory guarantees for shipping, either Canadian or destined to and from Canadian ports.

Tactics

5. As agreed at the meeting of officials held in Ottawa on July 5 and 6, the draft agenda for the meeting of August 12 will be the following:

DRAFT AGENDA

1. Opening statements.
2. Assurances required under the Wiley Act.
3. Contribution of $15 million to power entities towards meeting cost of channel enlargements.
4. Provision of 14' canals in Canadian territory.
5. General views regarding policy of separate or joint tolls.
6. Agreement on consultation before navigation works are duplicated by either country.
7. Navigation rights and conditions on which vessels may use canals in International Section.
8. Effects of modified arrangements on legal situation in the light of US and Canadian legislation and International Joint Commission Order.
9. Possibility of a new Canada-US agreement to embody modified arrangements.
10. Expectation of timing of construction programme.
11. Other business.

6. From the information now at hand, it appears almost certain that the United States will not be able to give a firm undertaking to contribute $15 million to the power entities; it will not favour the perpetuation of the 14' canals in Canadian territory; it will advocate joint tolls; it will seek an Agreement for consultation before duplicate navigation works are begun in either country in the International Rapids Section; and, most important, it will be unable to give satisfactory guarantees for navigation rights.

7. In these circumstances, the Canadian negotiators should state that the Canadian Government fully appreciates the difficulty in which the United States Government is placed by the very terms of the Wiley Act and, of course, by the political situation in the United States and that the Canadian Government is therefore anxious to meet the United States' wishes within reasonable limits. However, in view of the inability of the United States to meet more important Canadian requests, particularly those related to navigation rights, to the $15 million contribution and to compensation for the loss of 14-foot navigation to be sustained by Canada, and in view of the political situation in Canada, the Canadian negotiators should indicate that the Canadian Government cannot do more than agree to modify the Arrangements contained in the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952, in the following sense:

The Canadian Government will construct all the necessary 27-foot navigation works between Lake Erie and the port of Montreal on the Canadian side of the International Boundary as nearly as possible concurrently with the completion of the power phase of the St. Lawrence Project with the exception of the dredging in the Thousand Islands Section and the construction of a side canal with one guard gate and two locks for 27' navigation in the vicinity of Barnhart Island. In agreeing to forego its undertaking and obligations under the existing Arrangements, the Canadian Government wishes to declare that, as soon as it considers that traffic conditions warrant (e.g. if physical capacity becomes inadequate or if movement of Canadian shipping or trade were otherwise seriously impeded), its present intention is to duplicate 27-foot navigation facilities on Canadian soil in the vicinity of Barnhart Island. In other respects the Notes of June 30, 1952, shall remain unchanged. Canada will make the contribution of $15 million towards channel enlargements and recover this amount out of tolls assessed against the Iroquois works.

(Possible additions — new portions underlined)

Alternative A: "Canada intends to acquire lands now in the International Rapids Section necessary for the future construction of 27-foot navigation facilities in Canada and to water the 14-foot canal and build a turn-round basin at Cornwall."

or

Alternative B: "Canada intends to acquire lands and to do some preliminary excavation work now in contemplation of the eventual construction of 27-foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section. It also intends to water the 14-foot canal and build a turn-round basin at Cornwall."

or

Alternative C: "Canada intends to acquire lands and to do some preliminary excavation work now in contemplation of the eventual construction of 27-foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section. It also intends to continue 14-foot navigation facilities through this Section.

or

Alternative D: "Canada intends to acquire lands and to do some preliminary excavation work now in contemplation of the eventual construction of 27-foot navigation on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section. It also intends to continue 14-foot navigation facilities through this Section and to build now part of a 27-foot lock at Cornwall."

8. The modifications of the June 30, 1952 Notes set out above satisfy the spirit of the Wiley Act which is to cooperate with Canada in the construction of the Seaway and at the same time meet the essential minimum requirements of the Canadian Government.

9. An Aide-Mémoire along the lines of Annex A might be given to the United States negotiators during the talks in order to set forth in a more permanent form the Canadian views.

10. It might also be desirable at some point in the talks to give to the United States negotiators a draft Note amending the arrangements of June 30, 1952. A suggested draft Note is shown as Annex B.

11. The reaction of the United States negotiators to the Canadian proposals may take either of the following forms:

(a) They may say that the Administration cannot undertake any navigation works in the International Rapids Section until Congress has approved an amendment to the Wiley Act foregoing to build at Iroquois;

(b) They may say that, regardless of the Canadian decision to build at Iroquois, the Wiley Act directs the Administration to build a canal and a lock at Iroquois as well;

(c) They may say that the Administration is prepared to note the Canadian decision and to seek legislation to amend the Wiley Act at the next session of Congress.

12. It is unlikely that the United States representatives will be able to accept the Canadian proposals without reference to Secretary Dulles and to the President. Indeed, it may not be possible for the United States Administration to do anything but note the Canadian proposals. The Canadian negotiators should try to persuade the United States delegation to accept the Canadian proposals or, at least, to note them and to urge upon the President and the Secretary of State the desirability of seeking an amendment to the Wiley Act if they consider this necessary to ensure the construction of the Iroquois works in Canada. (This should not cause, or be allowed to cause, delay in the overall completion of the Project.)

13. While the Canadian delegation should keep an open mind on the question of joint or separate tolls, and the Canadian Seaway Authority should be prepared to give, at an appropriate time (but not until an inter-governmental Agreement has been reached) the assurances desired under the Wiley Act, the Canadian negotiators should seek to obtain an Executive Agreement from the United States Administration that each government will endeavour to avoid any action which would adversely affect the trade or shipping of the other and will consult the other before any legislation is enacted or regulations passed which shall directly affect the commercial interests of either country in the International Rapids Section. The Canadian negotiators should also be prepared to agree to mutual consultation before navigation works are duplicated in either country. The draft Note in Annex B covers these points.

Projet d'aide mémoire

Draft Aide Mémoire

RESTRICTED

[Ottawa], August 9, 1954

During a meeting with the Prime Minister of Canada on September 28, 1951, President Truman agreed to the construction by Canada of 27-foot navigation works in the St. Lawrence Seaway between Lake Erie and Montreal if it were not possible to achieve joint development of the whole Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin on the basis of the 1941 Agreement. In December 1951, by the enactment of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, the Canadian Parliament authorized the construction, operation and maintenance of facilities for those 27-foot navigation facilities between Montreal and Lake Erie.

2. On January 11, 1952, the United States Government declared in a Note that it would co-operate with Canada in referring the power phase of the St. Lawrence Project to the International Joint Commission on the understanding that the Canadian Government was prepared to proceed with the construction of the Seaway as a solely Canadian undertaking as soon as appropriate arrangements had been made for the construction of the power phase.

3. By an Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952, the United States and Canadian Governments confirmed the undertaking by Canada to construct the remaining locks and canals necessary for uninterrupted 27-foot navigation between Lake Erie and Montreal on the Canadian side of the boundary. At the request of the United States Government, Canada supplemented this undertaking by two additional ones. In the first undertaking the New York State Power Authority was relieved of the cost of reimbursing Canada for half of the cost of the destruction of the 14-foot canal system. The second undertaking was that Canada should contribute $15 million towards the channel enlargements in the International Rapids Section.

4. On May 13, 1954, the President of the United States signed Public Law 358, known as the Wiley Act. Under this Act, the United States St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation is authorized and directed to construct a 27-foot deep waterway in the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence River.

5. Although the Canadian Government would prefer to construct the remaining works necessary for 27-foot navigation entirely on Canadian territory and is empowered to do so under the Canadian legislation referred to above, it is understood that the United States Government considers that, under Public Law 358, it is mandatory for it to construct on United States territory all the navigation facilities in the International Rapids Section. As the United States Government knows, Canada desires that Canadian shipping and trade moving to and from Canadian ports should pass through the proposed "Wiley" canals and locks on a basis no more restrictive than would be applicable in similar Canadian works. The Canadian Government understands that the United States could not give treaty guarantees of this nature. It is understood further that the United States cannot reimburse Canada for the $15 million which Canada is now committed to contribute towards channel enlargements, and also that the United States is unable to make a contribution towards a continuation of, or to make compensation for, the destruction of the 14-foot navigation facilities owned by Canada on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section.

6. In these circumstances the Canadian Government is prepared to modify the Arrangements contained in the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952, in the following sense:

The Canadian Government will construct all the necessary works for uninterrupted 27-foot navigation between Lake Erie and the port of Montreal on the Canadian side of the International Boundary as nearly as possible concurrently with the completion of the power phase of the St. Lawrence Project with the exception of the dredging in the Thousand Islands section and the construction of a side canal with one guard gate and two locks for 27-foot navigation in the vicinity of Barnhart Island. In agreeing to forego its undertaking and obligation under the existing Arrangements, the Canadian Government wishes to declare that as soon as it considers that traffic conditions warrant, its present intention is to duplicate 27-foot navigation facilities on Canadian soil in the vicinity of Barnhart Island. In other respects the Notes of June 30, 1952, remain unchanged. Canada will make the contribution of $15 million towards channel enlargements and recover this amount out of tolls assessed against the Iroquois works.

(Possible additions — new portions underlined.)

Alternative A: Add: "Canada intends to acquire lands now in the International Rapids Section necessary for the future construction of duplicate 27-foot navigation facilities in Canada and to water the 14-foot canal and build a turn-round basin at Cornwall."

or

Alternative B: "Canada intends to acquire lands and to do some preliminary excavation work now in contemplation of the eventual construction of 27-foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section. It also intends to water the 14-foot canal and build a turn-round basis at Cornwall."

or

Alternative C: "Canada intends to acquire lands and to do some preliminary excavation work now in contemplation of the eventual construction of 27-foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section. It also intends to continue 14-foot navigation facilities through this Section.

or,

Alternative D: "Canada intends to acquire lands and to do preliminary excavation work now in contemplation of the eventual construction of 27-foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section. It also intends to continue 14-foot navigation facilities through this Section and to build now part of a 27-foot lock at Cornwall."

7. The Canadian Government considers that the modification of the Arrangements outlined in paragraph 6 above respects the spirit of the Wiley Act which is to participate with Canada in the construction and operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway and, at the same time, meets the essential minimum requirements of Canada.

Projet de note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour l'ambassadeur des États-Unis

Draft Note from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador of United States

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], August 9, 1954

I have the honour to refer to the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952 between the Canadian Ambassador in Washington and the Acting Secretary of State of the United States in which it was agreed that the Canadian Government would, when all arrangements have been made to ensure the completion of the power phase of the St. Lawrence Project, construct locks and canals on the Canadian side of the International Boundary to provide for uninterrupted 27-foot navigation between Lake Erie and the Port of Montreal.

2. Subsequently, with the cooperation of the Government of the United States, arrangements were made to ensure the completion of the power phase of the Project by the New York State Power Authority and the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission. Accordingly the Canadian Government has been ready and indeed anxious to carry out its obligation to provide 27-foot navigation on Canadian territory from Lake Erie to the Port of Montreal. In the meantime, however, the Congress of the United States enacted, and the President of the United States approved on May 13, 1954, Public Law 358, known as the Wiley Act, which created the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation and directed it to construct 27-foot navigation works on the United States side of the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence River.

3. At the request of the United States Government, representatives of our two governments held meetings in July and August of this year to discuss how best to reconcile the requirements of the Wiley Act with the undertaking of the Canadian Government approved by the United States and set forth in the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952. Although the Canadian Government would be pleased to complete the remaining works necessary for 27-foot navigation in the St. Lawrence Seaway in Canadian territory, it understands the desire of the United States to construct a part of the Seaway Project in United States territory. Accordingly, the Canadian Government is prepared to modify the arrangements set forth in the Notes of June 30, 1952 in the sense that the Canadian Government will construct all the necessary 27-foot navigation works between Lake Erie and the Port of Montreal on the Canadian side of the International Boundary as nearly as possible concurrently with the completion of the power phase of the St. Lawrence Project with the exception of the dredging in the Thousand Islands Section and the construction of a side canal with one guard gate and two locks for 27-foot navigation in the vicinity of Barnhart Island.

4. It is understood that the United States will undertake the necessary remaining work in the Thousand Islands and International Rapids Sections in accordance with the Wiley Act, that this will be done as nearly as possible concurrently with the completion of the power phase of the St. Lawrence Project and that the Canadian Government is to be relieved of the obligation towards the United States Government set forth in the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952 to provide 27-foot navigation facilities in the Thousand Islands Section and in the vicinity of Barnhart Island.

5. The Canadian Government fully reserves the right to build at any future time 27-foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section. As soon as traffic conditions warrant, the Canadian Government intends to complete duplicate 27-foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section. Before doing so, however, the Canadian Government intends to consult the United States Government and understands that should the United States Government intend to build additional facilities of this nature on United States territory, it would similarly consult the Canadian Government.

(Possible additions — new portions underlined.)

Alternative A: "In the meantime, the Canadian Government intends to acquire lands now in the International Rapids Section necessary for the future construction of 27-foot navigation facilities in Canada and to water the 14-foot canal and build a turn-round basin at Cornwall."

or

Alternative B: "In the meantime, the Canadian Government intends to acquire lands and to do some preliminary excavation work in contemplation of the eventual construction of 27-foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section. It also intends to water the 14-foot canal and build a turn-round basin at Cornwall."

or

Alternative C: "In the meantime, the Canadian Government intends to acquire lands and to do some preliminary excavation work in contemplation of the eventual construction of 27-foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section. It also intends to continue 14-foot navigation through this Section."

or

Alternative D: "In the meantime, the Canadian Government intends to acquire lands and to do some preliminary excavation work in contemplation of the eventual construction of 27-foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section. It also intends to continue 14-foot navigation facilities through this Section and to build now part of a 27-foot lock at Cornwall."

6. In order to obtain the consent of the United States Government to a joint application to the International Joint Commission for the power phase of the Project, and on the understanding that the United States agreed that the 27-foot navigation facilities in the International Rapids Section were to be built in Canada, the Canadian Government undertook, in the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952, to contribute $15 million towards the cost of the channel enlargements which the power-developing entities must undertake in the International Rapids Section. The Order of Approval issued by the International Joint Commission on October 29, 1952, also placed this obligation on Canada. The Canadian Government is prepared to honour this undertaking and will recover this amount by charging appropriate tolls to be assessed against the Iroquois works. The Canadian Government also understands that it would be impracticable to seek to modify the further undertaking contained in the said Exchange of Notes and in Order of Approval regarding compensation for 14-foot navigation. While the power entities are obliged to continue facilities for 14-foot navigation during construction, Canada shall not seek to have the said Notes or Order changed as regards compensation for 14-foot navigation.

7. Most of the length of the St. Lawrence Seaway will of course be in Canadian territory and most of its cost will be borne by Canada. In view of this and of the vital role of the Seaway in the economy of Canada, it is of great importance to Canada that no restrictions should be placed on Canadian shipping or trade on the United States part of the Seaway in the International Rapids Section. It is understood that both governments will endeavour to avoid placing restrictions on the transit of passengers, shipping or trade in the International Rapids Section. It is further understood that the United States Government is prepared to undertake to consult fully with the Canadian Government before imposing or enforcing, in the United States part of the Seaway, any important regulations which may affect Canadian shipping or shipping of third-country registry proceeding to or from Canada. For its part, the Canadian Government reciprocally undertakes to consult with the United States Government before imposing or enforcing in the International Rapids Section any important new regulations affecting United States shipping. It is, of course, understood that both governments will continue to abide strictly by the terms of the treaties now in force between them affecting shipping in the St. Lawrence River and canals, notably Article I of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909.

8. I should be glad to receive your confirmation that the United States Government agrees with the position set forth in this Note.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY PROJECT

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, said that discussions between representatives of the Canadian and U.S. Governments would begin the following day.

The Minister recalled that at the meeting of July 28th, 1954, it had been agreed that Canadian representatives should inform the American negotiators that Canada would undertake the construction in Canadian territory, of the canal and lock at Iroquois and that tolls would be imposed on Canadian navigation works at a level sufficient to amortize not only the cost of those works but also the $15 million contribution by the Seaway Authority towards certain channel excavation to be undertaken in the International Section by the Ontario Hydro and the New York State Power Authority. No firm decision, however, had been reached on the question of whether tolls should be jointly or separately determined or on the question of what, if anything, should be done to continue existing 14-foot facilities at Cornwall. No decision need perhaps be taken at this time concerning tolls but there might be some advantage in reaching at least tentative conclusions as to the government's intentions regarding 14-foot navigation works at Cornwall while considering the instructions to be given to those negotiating with the United States.

The Minister submitted drafts of instructions, an aide mémoire and a possible note to be given United States; these included four alternative courses of action that might be followed in connection with the continuation of 14-foot navigation.

Under the first, 14-foot navigation would not be continued but provision would be made to water the existing canal below the power dyke and to build a turning basin in order to allow access by water from the lower end of the canal to the industries located along the canal banks. In addition, the Canadian government would now purchase the lands required eventually for completion of a 27-foot system in the vicinity of Cornwall.

Under the second alternative Canada would water the 14-foot canal, build a turning basin at Cornwall, acquire the lands required eventually for 27-foot navigation, and make, at this time, certain excavations for future 27-foot facilities in the land to be flooded just above Cornwall.

The third plan involved all the features of the second alternative plus the construction of a 14-foot lock in the dyke in order to combine 14-foot navigation on the Canadian side around the main dam.

The last alternative included all the features of the fourth except that, instead of building a 14-foot lock in the dyke, provision would be made now for a short 27-foot lock which could be extended to full size whenever 27-foot facilities were completed in the Cornwall area.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum Aug. 9, 1954 — and attached draft instructions, aide mémoire and note — Cab. Doc. 174-54).

6. In the course of discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) It seemed desirable to acquire, at this time, the lands which would be required eventually for completion of 27-foot facilities on the Canadian side of the river. The cost of acquiring these lands should not however be amortized out of toll revenue and should be considered, until such time as they were actually used for waterway purposes, as a real-estate investment by the government through the Authority.

(b) It was argued, on the one hand, that Canadian public opinion might react unfavourably if 14-foot navigation were not continued. On the other hand, it was suggested that the industries located along the banks of the Cornwall canal could be serviced adequately from the lower entrance of the canal provided a turning basin were built below the power dyke. In any event it did not seem possible to continue a toll-free 14-foot system and the present users of the canal might object if tolls were now to be imposed on this canal.

(c) It should be made perfectly clear to the Americans that Canada fully reserved its right to complete 27-foot navigation entirely in Canadian territory at any time in the future that traffic or other conditions made such action appear desirable.

(d) It was pointed out that the much talked of mutual understanding and friendly cooperation between Canada and the United States were not empty words and that Canada should, therefore, attempt to meet, as far as possible, the wishes of the United States Administration in carrying out the provisions of the Wiley Act provided Canadian interests were fully protected.

7. The Cabinet approved in general the instructions proposed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be given those meeting with the United States representatives, and agreed,

(a) that during the course of the Canada-U.S. discussions to begin the following day on the proposal that the United States participate in the construction and operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway, the American representatives be informed that if the United States could not meet the more important Canadian requests, particularly those relating to navigation rights and to the $15 million contribution towards channel excavations, the Canadian government proposed to construct the canal and lock at Iroquois in Canadian territory, and to fix tolls on Canadian navigation works at a level sufficient to amortize not only the cost of these works but also the $15 million contribution by the Seaway Authority towards channel excavations in the International Rapids Section; and,

(b) that if the 27-foot navigation works at Barnhart Island were to be constructed in U.S. territory, it would be sufficient to water the existing 14-foot canal at Cornwall and to build a turning basin at the upper end of that canal below the dyke; and

(c) that the lands required eventually for a 27-foot system at Cornwall be purchased new but that the cost of acquisition be not amortized out of toll revenue until such time as the lands were actually used for navigation facilities; it being understood that the government's intentions set out in (b) and (c) above need not, at this time, be communicated to the United States.

Memorandum by Head, American Division

[Ottawa], August 18, 1954

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Following information that Mr. Anderson was "seriously disturbed" about certain aspects of the Canadian Press Release, I ascertained from Mr. George Vest (and passed this information on to Mr. Wershof) what the points were which were bothering Mr. Anderson.

2. The points are three in number: viz., those three points which the Canadian Government was making in the Press Release.¹³¹ Mr. Anderson hoped personally that the Canadian Government's hope that the United States would decide not to build at Iroquois would not be put in writing. Mr. Anderson, in the second place, did not really like the way in which it had been stated that the Canadian Government would be informed that the United States would build the works at Barnhart Island and in the Thousand Islands section; it left the implication that the United States would not build at Iroquois. The third point was that Mr. Anderson did not like the singling out of the hampering of Canadian traffic as one factor which might cause us to build parallel works in the International Rapids Section.

3. I expressed to Mr. Vest the hope that Mr. Bliss' representations would be cast against the background of Mr. Anderson's statement that if Canada agreed to the ¹³¹ Voir/See Documents 577-578.

U.S. modification in the Canadian draft Note, Canada would be free to make whatever press statements it thought proper.

4. I also made to George Vest the point that were the representations not coming from his country and by Don Bliss, we would normally not have entertained such representations because the Press Release was made available for the United States Government to see and not to comment on, as had been distinctly understood by us. I added that it put me in an awkward position because I had let them see the Press Release sooner than I had been instructed. George Vest rested assured that on future occasions and in similar circumstances I would not let them see a draft Press Release much before release time.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY; MODIFIED ARRANGEMENTS WITH THE UNITED STATES
REGARDING 27-FOOT NAVIGATION WORKS IN THE INTERNATIONAL SECTION

8. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of August 11th, reported on discussions which had taken place between representatives of the Canadian and United States governments on August 12th, 13th and 14th, regarding the possibility of modifying the international arrangements embodied in the Notes exchanged with the United States on June 30th, 1952, in order to enable the United States to participate in the construction and operation of the deep waterway in the International Section of the St. Lawrence River.

It became apparent, early in the discussions, that it would not be possible for the U.S. government to meet Canadian wishes with regard to navigation rights and to the $15 million contribution towards channel excavations which would be undertaken by the power entities in the bed of the river. In the circumstances, the U.S. representatives had been informed that the Canadian government intended to construct, forthwith, a canal and lock in Canadian territory in the vicinity of Iroquois, but that it was prepared to modify the arrangements of June, 1952, in order that the Canadian government be relieved of its obligation towards the United States to construct navigation works in the vicinity of Barnhart Island and in the Thousand Islands section. These modifications had been embodied in draft Canadian and U.S. Notes, the text of which have now been agreed by both sides.

These Notes, further, made provision for consultation between the two governments before either country duplicated 27-foot navigation already in existence in the territory of the other. Provision had also been made for consultation on any legislation which might affect the movement of one country's shipping through the navigation facilities of the other.

The Notes had been exchanged by the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and the U.S. Minister at Ottawa the previous day. He proposed to make the text of the Canadian and U.S. Notes public that afternoon and hold a press conference on the subject.

In the light of strong representations that had been made to him and notwithstanding the decision taken at the meeting of August 11th, he had indicated to U.S. representatives that the government might or might not continue 14-foot navigation in the vicinity of Cornwall and that a final decision yet remained to be taken on this score. A paragraph had, however, been included in the Canadian Note to the effect that the Canadian government undertook to consult the United States government before deciding to continue the 14-foot canal at Cornwall on a toll-free basis.

The toll question had been discussed briefly and inconclusively. While stating that they had an open mind on this question, the Canadian representatives had voiced a preference for separately determined tolls although no objection could be seen to the establishment of some form of joint collection and administration of tolls.

The press release, which it was planned to issue that afternoon, attempted to establish the Canadian government's position more specifically than in the Note to the U.S. government. In particular, it was pointed out that although it was realized that the U.S. St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation was directed by the Wiley Act to construct all the 27-foot navigation works in the International Section of the St. Lawrence River, the Canadian government hoped that the United States would not, in fact, proceed with the work at this time. It was also made clear that the Canadian government intended to complete navigation facilities in Canadian territory in the vicinity of Cornwall in the event an increase in traffic warranted such action or in the event of unreasonable interference with Canadian shipping in U.S. canals.

(External Affairs press release No. 50, Aug. 18, 1954, and attached Canadian and U.S. Notes, Aug. 17, 1954).¹³²

9. In the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) If, as was expected, traffic did increase sufficiently to warrant completion of 27-foot navigation facilities at Cornwall in the relatively near future, it would seem preferable not to continue 14-foot navigation at Cornwall since this would likely retard rather than hasten the eventual construction of a 27-foot canal on the Canadian side in the Barnhart Island area. On the other hand, no decision need be taken immediately on this matter and it would perhaps be preferable to withhold making any announcement for the time being.

(b) There was some indication that U.S. engineers were now thinking of constructing the Barnhart Island canal to a depth of thirty-two feet rather than twenty-seven feet as would be the case in the Canadian portions of the Seaway. If this were done the maximum total expenditure of $105 million authorized by the Wiley Act would likely be insufficient to complete both the Barnhart Island and the Iroquois canals and this, in turn, might induce the U.S. Administration to postpone, for the time being, construction of a canal at Iroquois in U.S. territory in view of the Canadian government's declared intention to proceed forthwith with construction of the required navigation works in Canadian territory at this point.

(c) It was suggested that perhaps the most satisfactory solution to the toll problem would be to reach an understanding under which the United States Corporation and the Canadian Authority would establish toll levels independently of one another on their own works, but that some joint collection agency be established to collect tolls and to allocate the proceeds therefrom on the basis of audited Canadian and U.S. accounts. Such an arrangement would likely result in more efficient handling of shipping by making it possible, for example, to issue through-tickets to a ship proceeding from, say, Cleveland to Montreal.

10. The Cabinet noted with approval the report by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the Notes which had been exchanged with the United States the previous day, and on the press release he planned to issue that day regarding modified Canada-U.S. arrangements for construction of 27-foot navigation facilities in the International Section of the St. Lawrence River, under which arrangements it was agreed that Canada should be relieved of its obligation towards the United States to construct the navigation works in the vicinity of Barnhart Island and in the Thousand Island Section, and under which the Canadian government had informed the United States that it proposed to proceed forthwith with the construction, in Canadian territory, of a canal and lock in the vicinity of Iroquois.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY — COLLATERAL LETTER

As a result of Mr. Anderson's request yesterday that we should not send any collateral letter, the officials in this Department have carefully reconsidered the matter.

2. Our view is that some letter is essential, for the record, to guard against future arguments with the United States Government or misunderstandings by Congressmen. We feel that Mr. Anderson's worries about the effect in Washington of a letter are exaggerated.

3. Two of the three points we had thought of recording in a letter are in the Press Release, i.e.

- (1) Our hope that the United States will not build Iroquois, and
- (2) Our intention that troubles in the United States Barnhart locks and canals could be a sufficient reason for Canada to decide to parallel them — whether or not the volume of traffic justified it.

I think that we could, in view of Mr. Anderson's feelings, desist from repeating these two points in our letter if we enclose the Press Release.

4. Enclosed is a draft letter for your consideration; it is milder and less direct than the draft† which you previously saw. I really do not see why it should give reasonable men in Washington any trouble. It will be unclassified but we could tell Mr. Bliss that we will in fact regard it as "For Official Use Only" until the United States has had a chance to say whether it should be available for publication. Even if the United States decides to treat it as available for publication, we need not rush to publish it. It does not call for a reply, and Mr. Bliss could be told that non-reply will not be regarded by us as meaning agreement (to the first 2 points).¹³³

5. If you approve the letter, is it to be shown in draft to Mr. Bliss?¹³⁴ My inclination is to advise a negative answer to this.

6. The Legal Adviser thinks that the enclosed draft is the minimum necessary for our protection. American Division thinks it is less than the minimum.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], August 20, 1954

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY TALKS AUGUST 12 AND 13

The talks began at 11.00 a.m. on August 12 in the Conference Room of the East Block. The principal United States representative was Mr. Robert B. Anderson, Deputy Secretary of Defence. The Canadian representatives, led by the Hon. L.B. Pearson, were the Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe and the Hon. George C. Marler.

2. After opening statements, Mr. Pearson proposed a revision of the order of the agenda items as originally prepared at the July meeting of officials. The purpose was to make possible a more effective presentation of the Canadian position. Mr. Anderson accepted the revised agenda order, which is given in Annex A.†

$15 Million Contribution to Channel Enlargements

3. Mr. C.D. Howe stated that, in the Canadian view, this was more properly a charge on power rather than navigation. The navigation aspect of the project was separated from the power aspect in 1948. We had assumed that the power would do all that was required including these channel enlargements. Because of the Federal Power Commission's desire that $15 million should be charged to navigation, it was assessed to Canada over strong Canadian objection. Mr. Howe wondered what our American friends could do in this regard.

4. Mr. Anderson replied that the United States recognized the equity of our claim but the Wiley Act made no provision for its payment. Even if it could, there would not be enough money left to build the remaining works. The only way open to the United States would be to recognize that the $15 million should be a preferential charge on joint tolls and would then eventually be returned to the Canadian Treasury with interest. Another course would be for the Administration to seek an additional $15 million from Congress, but, this might prove impossible to obtain and would in any event delay matters until at least March 1955. Accordingly, the United States was prepared to recognize the obligation and to pay the amount out of tolls.

5. Mr. Pearson summed up by saying that he took it that the United States was prepared to accept the charge of $15 million, was unable to absorb this amount now but was prepared to do anything it could through the collection of tolls.

6. Mr. Bliss enquired into the possibility of revising the obligation placed on Canada to pay the $15 million for channel enlargements. Mr. Howe replied that he did not wish to open up the question of a power licence. Mr. Pearson added that it would mean going back to the International Joint Commission and that Canada did not want to reopen this question or to delay further. It was agreed that the discussion should be adjourned on this item and that the representatives could return to it later, if desired.

14-foot Navigation

7. Mr. Howe explained that there had been a canal on the Canadian side of the International Rapids Section for the last hundred years, that industry had been built around it and that the 1941 Agreement provided for the maintenance of a 14' canal as, indeed, the Ontario-Canada Agreement had.¹³⁶ It looks as though Ontario would have to pay $15 million to reimburse Canada for the loss of this canal. Had the United States delegation any view as to what it might be able to do?

8. Mr. Anderson recognized the problem and the Canadian desire to continue this canal. He assumed that the canal in the International Rapids Section would be flooded. Unfortunately, the United States could not go beyond its legislation. He recognized the problem, and wanted to co-operate but doubted that there was any way of obtaining any financial provision from Congress for continuing these works on Canadian territory. Mr. Howe interjected that there was no thought of asking for a contribution. He asked what about the continuation of the 14-foot canal which it was important to conserve? After an inconclusive discussion in which Mr. Anderson raised the possibility of continuing a 14-foot canal through the rapids on a toll-free basis, the representatives agreed that they might return to this item later.

Agreement for Consultation Before Duplication of Works

9. Mr. Pearson said this item was related to Item 5 of the Agenda. Subject to this, there seemed to be no difficulty in reaching an agreement on consultation. Mr. Anderson said that the United States would like to talk to Canada before there was duplication because they would not want to impair the "partnership" arrangements.

Navigation Rights

10. Mr. Pearson opened by saying that this was a rather important item for Canada. Ships destined from one Canadian port to another should not be hampered and inconvenienced and should receive the same treatment as if they were going through a Canadian canal. If this were granted it would be infinitely easier to get Canadian public opinion fully to support this project. Was there any way in which this legitimate Canadian preoccupation could be met?

11. Mr. Anderson replied that a primary reason that the United States wanted to see the deep-waterway completed was to maintain a continuing stream of traffic between the United States and Canada. He appreciated the Canadian apprehensions. He said that the supreme law of the land in the United States was embodied in both treaties and in legislation. He had grave doubts whether the United States could enter into an inflexible treaty whereby the power of Congress to legislate would be circumscribed. Even if that hurdle could be jumped, he doubted whether it could be done constitutionally. The United States would be prepared to discuss with Canada any new law or regulation which it was proposed should be enacted or enforced regarding the passage of vessels in the International Section. His feeling was, however, that both countries must operate the canals in such a way that the Seaway operates to the maximum.

12. Mr. Howe said that the question of navigation rights was serious for Canada: over the years, Canada had spent $750 million for canals which must be kept up, and if the McCarren Act affected Canadian shipping, this would be pretty serious. Mr. Anderson recognized the seriousness of the problem. He said that if anyone proposed legislation which would affect shipping in the international section, the United States would be prepared to consult Canada and ascertain the Canadian reaction. He could not visualize any Administration wishing other than to maximize traffic in the whole of the Seaway. Mr. Pearson said that while any Administration might consult with Canada, this would not necessarily remove the special difficulties that might arise. While there might be no interference with commerce as such, certain regulations, (such as security regulations) might cause us a lot of trouble, e.g. the removal of persons who are objectionable to the United States from a Canadian or Commonwealth ship in United States canals. There are also ramifications regarding third-party shipping; any agreement should apply to these as well. Mr. Anderson said that one thing stuck out in his mind when we were talking of tolls, navigation rights, etc., and that was that unless shipping can pass freely, then we would have lost our time.

13. Mr. Pearson stated that the Canadian will say, if we do not get an agreement on navigation rights: "You have had a chance to get this agreement and you gave it up". We could get over this if both countries entered into an international agreement not to subject each other's ships to the other's laws while going through each other's canals. The United States may have, however, not only political but also constitutional difficulties in this regard. Mr. Yingling interjected that the United States Attorney General's tentative, but considered, opinion was that such an international agreement would be unconstitutional. Messrs. Pearson and Anderson thought that Messrs. Wershof, Brucker and Yingling might discuss the legal aspects during the lunch hour.

Effects of Modified Arrangements

14. Mr. Pearson wanted to talk now about the modified arrangements themselves. He thought it would be useful to leave a draft aide-mémoire with the United States delegation, not as an official document, at this time. Mr. Pearson then read the attached Aide-Mémoire (Annex B).¹³⁷ He then went on to say that to meet public opinion in Canada the Canadian Government must do something along the lines of this Aide-Mémoire. If this could be done it would be easier to "abandon" part of the Canadian Seaway so as to give the United States a chance to build on its side of the Rapids; it would also be easier for Canada to absorb the $15 million for channel enlargements and the loss of half of the replacement cost of a 14-foot navigation.

15. Mr. Howe said that Canada could not make the $15 million contribution towards channel enlargements without building the dam at Iroquois. After all, it is an international section where both countries should build! Mr. Anderson said that he did not know whether the $15 million could be paid by the United States Government. Mr. Pearson asked if it could be paid out of tolls, to which Mr. Anderson replied that this was yet another problem: all the monies collected entirely on the United States side must be paid to the United States Government. Therefore, he concluded, before any payments could be made to Canada they would have to be made out of joint tolls. Mr. Howe doubted whether the United States was mandatorily required by the Wiley Act to do all the works in the international section. To this Mr. Anderson countered that Congress has given the Administration a mandate to do just that. It would take some effort to do less than what is spelled out in the Wiley-Dondero Act as "substantially" the works to be built. To this Mr. Howe replied that if it comes to that point, Canada also has a mandate to build all the works in the international section. It was agreed that the United States delegation might examine the draft Aide-Mémoire during the lunch hour.

Joint Tolls

16. Mr. Howe said that there might be considerable difficulty in arranging joint tolls, because of the different systems for arriving at tolls in each country. Mr.

¹³⁷ Annexe A au document 574. L'aide-mémoire n'incluait aucun des paragraphes de remplacement proposés./Annex A to Document 574. The aide mémoire included none of the suggested alternative paragraphs.

Howe thought that both countries would undoubtedly consult on the general weighing of tolls for the various commodities, such as wheat, iron ore, etc. The Preliminary Canadian view, however, was that it would be much better to fix tolls unilaterally and then to arrange for some sort of joint collection: the amount collected on a through ticket would be eventually paid back to either Authority much in the same way as international train fares are settled between Canada and the United States.

17. Mr. Anderson said that it would be almost inconceivable that both countries should not talk on tolls. Adverting to the $15 million payment for channel enlargements, while repeating that equity was on the side of Canada, the only way he could see of reimbursing Canada was through joint tolls as envisioned under the Wiley Act. Mr. Howe said he was reluctant to embark upon a scheme of joint tolls because he could visualize the day when Canada might wish to abandon tolls. There followed a general discussion on the question and the meeting adjourned for lunch.

AFTERNOON SESSION, AUGUST 12, 3:30 P.M.

Aide-Mémoire

18. Mr. Pearson said that the word "draft" might be omitted from the Aide-Mémoire and that if Mr. Anderson were prepared to do so, the points raised in the Aide-Mémoire might now be discussed.

19. Mr. Anderson recognized the political problem arising especially out of the circumstances of the Exchange of Notes in 1952 on the subject of the $15 million. On the exact language shown in the Canadian Aide-Mémoire on page 3 as to how the Notes of June 30 might be modified, Mr. Anderson said that the attitudes of both the United States and Canadian legislatures were quite different. In the United States there would be no objection to two systems in the International Rapids Section. From the United States viewpoint, however, the Administration is obliged to construct in their entirety the works authorized by the Wiley Act. If it deviated from this, the Administration would have to go to Congress. Mr. Anderson hoped, therefore, that the language shown on page 3 of the Aide-Mémoire could be cast in a different terminology. He would like to study the Wiley Act again. If the two countries could reach some sort of agreement under which Canada would build what it wanted to build on its side and the United States would build what it wanted to build on its side, then it would be helpful. During the lunch hour the United States delegation had looked at this matter and the wording they would prefer is contained in the "Draft" now given to the Canadian side as to the form of an agreement.

(See Annex C)

20. Mr. Pearson said that paragraph (b) of the "Draft" would mean that both countries agreed to build at Iroquois. Mr. Anderson replied that that is what the United States would do if required. Mr. Howe asked if the Wiley Act did not allow some flexibility for timing. The Act requires assurances from Canada as to the construction. Does the Act not provide that the United States will build provided Canada gives the necessary assurances? Mr. Anderson thought either government might use its own judgment at Iroquois; if we end up with two facilities it would mean that we have so much more. Mr. Chevrier interjected that the converse also obtains at Barnhart Island. Mr. Anderson replied that both governments have no money invested in deep-water facilities in the International Section; when they do — such as at Barnhart Island — any action by the other government would affect this investment. Hence the desire for consultation. General Brucker interjected that there was no time set for the construction of Iroquois. That seemed to be true of Canada's intention to build there. To this Mr. Howe replied that Canada intended to build immediately at Iroquois. He could never explain to the Canadian public why the Americans desire to build at Iroquois also. This would be a wholly unilateral action on the part of the United States notwithstanding the International Arrangement of June 30, 1952 and this would seem a bit arbitrary to Canadians. If the Canadian Seaway Authority builds at Iroquois, the Government might find it easier to explain the matter publicly. Would it not be possible for the United States Administration to undertake to refrain from building the Iroquois section? Mr. Anderson replied that he did not think so. United States authorities would have to weigh this matter carefully but they must abide by the laws and it would not be proper at this time for themselves to be committed not to construct at Iroquois.

Assurances

21. Mr. Anderson said that the United States Seaway Authority would want assurances that Canada was to build the remaining works as nearly as possible concurrently with the completion of the power project. This assurance was pro forma and might be in the language of the Wiley Act. Some assurance might be required from the power authorities as well. Mr. Chevrier agreed with Mr. Castle that this was a matter to be worked out by the seaway authorities and that it might be done by an exchange of letters by the authorities.

Agreement to Consult before Paralleling of Facilities in the International Rapids Section

22. Mr. Anderson wanted the Agreement for consultation to be extended to the whole of the seaway in the Great Lakes basin because as it stands now any Agreement to consult placed no real obligation on Canada. Mr. Pearson saw value in this but he desired to concentrate attention to the International Rapids Section in the special application of this agreement. There might be a general reference in addition to consultation for the whole basin, but Mr. Anderson said that he was perfectly agreeable to the last draft paragraph in the United States "Draft". (See Annex C.) Mr. Pearson wondered if the reference should not be limited to consultation for duplication of "canals in the International Section".

The Canadian Aide-Mémoire

23. Mr. Pearson said that Canada would want to say publicly what has been stated in the Aide-Mémoire concerning Iroquois. What this amounts to is that the Canadian Government states its intention to construct a lock and canal around Iroquois and the United States delegation indicates that it was also directed to build a lock and canal in the same area. Mr. Anderson wondered whether we were not addressing ourselves too much to our own peoples. He thought that the modification of the Notes of June 30, 1952 should be a modification of principles and he hoped that both sides could refrain from announcing the construction of Iroquois until after the Notes were agreed. Mr. Pearson said that he would try to have a joint press announcement. He asked, however, whether Mr. Anderson did not feel that it would be possible to get an amendment to the Wiley Act so as to not build at Iroquois. Mr. Anderson did not think this was possible. He thought in addition that it would be improper for a formal Exchange of Notes to say that the Administration would seek such an amendment. He hoped that at the conclusion of the meeting that we would avoid a declaration which would freeze the position on each side. This was a matter which required further discussions within the United States. Mr. Pearson said that he wished to avoid giving the impression that Canada is committed not to construct parallel facilities in the International Rapids Section. That is why he thought that the last paragraph of the United States "Draft" (Annex C) was not happily worded although Canada would wish to consult before constructing parallel facilities at Barnhart Island.

24. Mr. Anderson reiterated that he hope that the official Notes would confine themselves to the declaration of the modification of the rights. Under paragraph (b) of the United States "Draft" (Annex C) Canada would say that it will build at Iroquois. concerning other facilities the United States reserved the right to build.

25. Mr. Howe interjected that the United States did not seem to care much for the 14-foot canal. To this Mr. Anderson replied that whatever Canada wished to do was its own decision. If, however, the canal traversed the whole International Rapids Section, he hoped that Canada would charge tolls. Mr. Howe said that there might have to be a 14-foot canal through the International Rapids Section.

Assurances

26. Mr. Pearson said that these assurances could be exchanged between the agencies after both governments had reached an agreement.

Timing

27. General Robinson stated that the critical date for the completion of the power project given to the Joint Board of Engineers was September 1958. There would then have to be an interruption of all traffic on the river for ten days before they switched over to 27-foot navigation. Mr. West intimated that navigation could not be interrupted at that critical time; in fact, the interruption would have to wait until the close of navigation.

28. Mr. Pearson asked at what point a delay in the Exchange of Notes would interfere with the engineering works, to which General Robinson replied that the construction of works had been intended by the United States to commence at Iroquois in April 1955. Contracts would have to be let early in December 1954. Presumably a delay beyond that period would be serious and it was agreed, however, that the power works would be ready towards the end of 1958, that the navigation works should be ready by about the same time but it was pointed out that power would not be "on the line" until the early part of 1959.

Press Communiqué

29. It was agreed that Messrs. Pelletier and Vest should now be thinking about the problem of a joint press communiqué.

Miscellaneous Points

30. Mr. Anderson said that earlier in the talks between officials, Mr. Wershof had expressed the view that there was no need to go to the International Joint Commission. He was happy to say that the United States authorities were in a position to revise their judgment and that they could see no reason now to have to go to the International Joint Commission.

31. The meeting adjourned shortly after 5 p.m.

MEETING ON AUGUST 13, 10:00 A.M.

Draft Canadian Note

32. On the evening of August 12 the Canadian delegation gave to the United States delegation, after the dinner held at the Country Club, a draft Note which would be satisfactory from the Canadian viewpoint. (Annex D)†

33. On the morning of August 13 Mr. Pearson said that he would be prepared to discuss this draft Note. He had no real objection to the United States "Draft" (Annex C) but he preferred the Canadian draft Note which would satisfactorily, from our viewpoint, amend the Note of June 30, 1952 under which Canada had an obligation to build the seaway entirely on Canadian territory.

34. Mr. Anderson said that there were two problems in connection with the Note. The first was to try to modify the rights and obligations, and the second was the presentation of the case to the public. The Canadian Note seeks to solve both these problems. The United States consideration of the Canadian draft is tempered by two thoughts. The first is that the United States delegation would not presume to amend the Canadian Note except that if a modification of the Notes of June 30 is to be achieved, all aspects should be included in the Canadian Note so as to ensure that the United States Note would result in a substantial general concurrence with the Canadian Note. His second thought was that in addition to modifying the arrangements of June 30, 1952 there should be full concurrence between the parties on the matter of future consultation. He had accordingly prepared a counter-proposal which was not immediately available, but would be presented to us later.

35. Mr. Pearson said that if we did not agree on a text we could still exchange our views. In a week or two there might be a formal Exchange of Notes. As far as the second problem mentioned by Mr. Anderson, that of the presentation of the case to our respective publics, this might be done by a press release. Mr. Howe interjected that the United States would have to steel itself to the shock which a Canadian Note might mean for them. Mr. Marler said that the press comment was quite adverse in Canada with the Le Devoir of this morning's date saying that Canada had given the seaway away overnight. Mr. Pearson said that the two governments are now in a position to modify the Exchange of Notes of June 30, 1952; he asked what could be said in public. Mr. Anderson suggested that what might be said would be that the next stage now would be a preparation of the texts of an Exchange of Notes. The three Canadian Ministers agreed and felt that it might be stated that both sides agreed that further consultation will cause no delay in the construction of the seaway. Mr. Anderson felt that there should be worked out some sort of a timetable to be used by both sides. Mr. R.A.C. Henry will work this out with General Robinson. It was important that throughout the construction of the seaway both countries should speak with the same voice on the question of the engineering timetable. This was agreed on both sides.

36. Mr. Pearson, reverting to the question of public release, said that Canada would have to make a full statement when the Notes were issued. Canada would be in a position to send its draft Note to Washington in a day or so. There would be a serious problem vis-à-vis Canadian public opinion if the Exchange of Notes were delayed for more than two or three weeks. Mr. Anderson thought that the exchange could be completed in two weeks. It was agreed to postpone discussions until after lunch when both delegations would have had before them the text of the United States draft of how the Canadian Note might read. It was suggested, however, that as regards the Canadian draft Note (Annex D), paragraph 4 should be placed towards the end of the Note.

37. During the interval before lunch when the United States delegation was preparing its draft (see Annex E),[†] the Canadian delegation had an opportunity of reviewing the position as regards the Canadian draft Note (Annex D). It was during this interval that the United States draft (Annex E) was made available and Mr. Pearson discussed it with other members of the delegation in his office.

AFTERNOON MEETING, AUGUST 13, 2:30 P.M.

38. Mr. Pearson opened the meeting by saying that the grammar in the United States draft (Annex E) was an improvement over the Canadian draft. He appreciated the United States difficulty, however, over the Canadian draft (Annex D). The Canadian problem, however, is to secure in a draft Note an agreement to modify the Wiley Act. He also pointed out that there would be the possibility of future action by the United States to relieve Canada of possible difficulties regarding the guarantees for navigation. On the other hand the United States wants a reference to a new element: namely, that as the Wiley Act binds the U.S.A., and the fact that Canada is also bound by the Wiley Act, should be recognized. This Canada cannot do in such a manner as will give sanction to the Wiley Act but Canada could alter its obligations in part to meet the United States position. If, in a Note, Canada were to say that the United States has priority over certain works, this should be acceptable and it would be for the United States to determine how it would frame its reply. We need not modify the agreement of June 30, 1952 except as regards the Canadian obligations. To this Mr. Anderson agreed. He said, however, that he should very much like to have gone into the problem as though the time now were before the arrangements were entered into June 30, 1952! Mr. Pearson said that he had no objection to putting certain factors forward in the Canadian Note but he did not want to give Canadian sanction to the Wiley Act. Mr. Marler thought that to do so would give the impression that we had agreed that all the works in the International Rapids Section (including Iroquois) should be built by the United States. Mr. Anderson understood the public opinion aspect of Iroquois. The expressed Canadian intention was to build at Iroquois. The expressed United States view was that it must build all the works shown in the Wiley Act. There is a conflict between these views. The problem is how to resolve this conflict. Mr. Heeney suggested that it might be useful to work jointly on both Notes to be exchanged and that maybe in that way we might make better progress. Mr. Anderson said that both these documents were basic documents which would be of considerable importance.

39. Mr. Pearson indicated that we would take into account the United States draft and that if the United States delegation would agree to leave behind one or two persons to work out a draft set of Notes to be exchanged, that would probably be a better way. Mr. Anderson arranged later for Governor Brucker, Mr. Castle and Mr. Yingling to remain behind to discuss this matter with the Canadian representatives.

40. As far as a press release was concerned, the joint press release (see Annex F) was agreed upon.¹³⁸

MEETINGS AFTER 3:30 P.M., AUGUST 13, 1954

41. At the conclusion of the formal talks, some time after 3:30 p.m. on August 13, Messrs. Wershof and Côté met to redraft the Canadian Note, basing themselves on the first draft, produced on August 12. The second Revise (Annex G)† was shown to Governor Brucker, Messrs. Yingling and Castle. Messrs. Côté and Wershof then prepared a third Revise (Annex H)† to meet the possible United States objections, together with a fourth redraft (Annex I).† The latter draft was never used.

42. After considerable discussions and examination during the night of Friday, August 13, with the United States representatives and early Saturday morning and afternoon, August 14, at which time Messrs. Heeney, Bryce and Pelletier attended from time to time, Mr. Wershof obtained the United States and Canadian concurrence to a draft Note. Those concurring included Mr. Anderson and Mr. Pearson. The final text of a Canadian Note jointly agreed is the text shown at Annex J.¹³⁹ The group also had an opportunity to examine the draft United States Note which eventually emerged in the form shown at Annex K.¹⁴⁰

43. In view of the pressure to which he was subjected on Friday afternoon to hold an impromptu press conference at 4:30 of August 13, 1954 Mr. Pearson asked on Saturday morning that the Exchange of Notes should be made, if at all possible, on August 17 and that the news should be made known publicly after Cabinet on August 18. Mr. Anderson agreed with this and a press release was prepared after discussions with the United States Embassy, which are not recorded here. The

Draft United States Note

The Governments of Canada and the United States will construct all of the necessary work for uninterrupted navigation between Lake Erie and Montreal as nearly as possible concurrently with the completion of the power phase of the St. Lawrence project in accordance with the following understanding:

A. The Canadian Government will construct all of the necessary works for such uninterrupted navigation through waters in Canadian territory.

B. Both Governments reserve the right in the International Boundary Section to construct a canal and locks around the Iroquois dam without further consultation.

C. The United States Government will perform the dredging in the Thousand Islands section and channel improvements and construction of a canal, locks and other necessary works in United States territory in the general vicinity of Barnhardt Island.

The Governments of Canada and the United States recognize the rights of each Government to construct additional facilities in its territory however any future duplication of facilities in the International Boundary Section will be constructed only after consultation between the two Governments.

18. The Press Release reports the views and intentions of the Canadian Government on some important questions, which we desire to bring to the attention of your Government in this way.

One question not covered in the Press Release is that of the nature of the obligation to consult your Government in connection with 14-foot navigation. The position of the Canadian Government is, as already indicated, as follows:

If the Canadian Government should decide to provide for 14-foot navigation through the International Rapids Section and if, in that event, the Canadian Government were contemplating making such navigation toll-free, the Canadian Government has promised to consult your Government before making it toll-free.¹⁴⁴

Yours sincerely,

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY: CONVERSATION WITH MR. LEWIS CASTLE

Mr. Lewis Castle, Administrator of the United States St. Lawrence Seaway Corporation, came in to say hello this morning and I took the opportunity of questioning him on points arising out of the hearings he held last week in the Pentagon. You will recall that he had invited representatives of shipping and industrial interests, port authorities, chambers of commerce, railroads and federal agencies to discuss the dimensions of "Wiley" works in the St. Lawrence Seaway. Mr. Castle mentioned that there had been a surprising amount of interest in the United States in the seaway, and he therefore thought it advisable to give interested parties the opportunity of expressing their views on this question. Representatives of 47 organizations in the above-mentioned categories attended the hearings.

Proposed New Dimensions for Locks

Mr. Castle said that opinion voiced at the hearings was almost unanimous for larger locks, with a consensus for dimensions of approximately 900-foot length, 85-95-foot width and 32-foot depth over the sills. (This compares with 800-foot length, 80-foot width and 30-foot depth in the Welland locks and those to be constructed by Canada at Iroquois, Beauharnois and Lachine.) Mr. Castle thought that he should at least report this preponderance of opinion to the Canadian Seaway Authority. When I asked him whether consideration of this question, which obviously had the most far-reaching implications, would delay his construction programme, he said that he had asked his engineers for a financial report by next Monday (October 11) and that he expected to come to a decision in 30 to 60 days. Therefore, he did not expect that this would retard his target date for completion of the Wiley works by the end of 1958 or early in 1959.

¹⁴⁴ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

When I raised the question of how much additional shipping might be accommodated in locks of the proposed dimensions, Mr. Castle suggested that it was not a question so much of being able to accommodate larger ships, although that was a factor to be considered in any forward-looking view. Possibly more important, he thought, was the question of manoeuvrability and insurance of existing vessels; larger dimensions would permit faster clearance of vessels through the locks and afford them greater protection in transit. He thought the factor of protection and insurance to be of considerable importance with respect to vessels carrying iron ore from Seven Islands.

I remarked to Mr. Castle that he must, of course, be aware of the far-reaching engineering and financial implications for navigation up and down the line, i.e., with respect to Upper Lakes channels, the Welland Canal and the new Canadian works. I mentioned: (a) In the Upper Lakes alone, United States 1950 estimates of the money required to deepen the present channels from 25 feet to 27 feet was $90 million, to 30 feet $270 million, and to 35 feet $517 million; deepening of the Upper lakes channels to the 32-foot depth suggested for the Wiley locks would therefore involve an expenditure in the neighbourhood of $400 million. (b) Construction of a new Welland canal with the larger locks would cost somewhere between $300 million and $400 million. (c) The present estimate of $190-odd for the new Canadian works from Iroquois to Montreal would have to be increased by many millions. Mr. Castle replied that he was aware of these factors. He assumed that Canada's main concern, if these ideas were to be introduced at all, would be with the Welland Canal (see section below on the Upper Lakes). He thought that if it came to building a new Welland Canal, the solution would be for "Canada and the United States to make the same arrangement as they made for power in the St. Lawrence, i.e., to split the cost".

Generally speaking, Mr. Castle seemed anxious to assure that he was not trying to create any pressure on Canada and deplored certain newspaper reports of last week's Washington hearings, which might have created that effect. He simply wished to "report" these views on lock dimensions to the Canadian authorities. He indicated that, if it were possible within the financial limitations of the Wiley Act to build locks of the greater dimensions, it would be a pity not to take advantage of the fact that nothing had yet been constructed and that he could start from scratch. From the tenor of our conversation, I think it safe to assume that the United States authorities will give serious consideration (within the limitations of the Wiley Act's $105 million) to increased length and width, as compared to increased depth.

Upper Lakes Dredging

It was Mr. Castle's understanding that bills would be introduced in the next session of Congress, by representative Blatnick in the House and Senators Thye and Humphrey in the Senate (all from Minnesota), to provide $100 million for dredging in the Upper Lakes. These members had attempted during the last session to secure this authorization by introducing amendments to the Wiley and Dondero Bills. These amendments were defeated but Mr. Castle thought it likely that the new bills would be passed by the next Congress.

Iroquois

I asked Mr. Castle what the situation was regarding Iroquois. He replied that the Corporation was convinced that it was mandatory under the Wiley Act for the United States to build at Iroquois, and he was therefore currently making provisions for its construction. In fact his consideration of whether he could construct canals and locks of the increased dimensions under the existing $105 million authorization was predicated on building at Iroquois. However, he stated that he would raise this question with Congressional leaders when Congress reconvened in January, as this obviously was "the sensible thing to do in view of Canada's decision to build at Iroquois."

Traffic and Tolls

Mr. Castle said that the Corporation had had some preliminary traffic estimates prepared, on a highly conservative basis. He expected at least 36 1/2 million tons to move through the canals in the first year of operation, and that this figure would rise to at least 52 million tons in 1965. He assumed that the revenue split would be of the general order of two-thirds to the Canadian Authority and one-third to the United States Corporation, and that on this basis there would be an initial revenue of around $14 millions to Canada and $7 to the United States. In addition to taking care of operating and maintenance costs, such sums could "provide interest on an awful lot of capital expenditure." He promised to send us a copy of his traffic studies.¹⁴⁵

S.A. FREIFELD

A lock of 900-foot length would provide approximately 805 feet between booms. A lock of 800-foot length would provide approximately 705 feet between booms. The longest freighter on the Great Lakes at the present time is 678 feet and therefore has a margin of 22 feet between booms in the present Welland locks.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

You will already have seen a copy of Freifeld's memorandum reporting his October 12 [5?] conversation with Mr. Lewis Castle, Administrator of the United States St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation. As you know, Mr. Castle and his colleagues requested a meeting with Mr. Chevrier and his colleagues which took place on October 11. Only part of the information contained in Freifeld's memorandum was given by Mr. Castle and his colleagues to members of the Canadian Seaway Authority.

2. You will, of course, be aware of the extraordinary financial implications of any proposal to deepen facilities throughout the entire Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin. In addition to the financial implications, there is the problem of the effect which any new proposals may have on the construction timetable of both Seaway Authorities, which have as their target date the completion of the 27-foot navigation works by the end of 1958.

3. In view of what appears to us to be a mounting interest in the United States in the construction of navigation works of larger dimensions than those currently authorized by Canada and in view of the apparent difficulty which Mr. Chevrier and Mr. R.A.C. Henry have encountered in obtaining precise information from their U.S. counterparts, the Canadian Seaway Authority and the Department are both anxious to receive whatever information you can obtain on the following questions:

(1) Who are the real promoters of the larger Seaway proposal? (Do these possibly include previous antagonists of the Seaway who may be seeking to delay or hamstring construction?)

(2) Why is the proposal being pressed forward at this time and what are the main arguments in its support?

(3) Has the United States Administration been apprised of the proposal and, if so, is it prepared to support it?

(4) What precise length, width and depth, with respect to locks, canals and navigation channels, does the proposal involve?

(5) Does the proposal involve increasing the dimensions of the Upper Lakes channels to the larger dimensions in the immediate future, or will these larger dimensions apply only to the international section for the time being, on the understanding that the Upper Lakes channels will be deepened to the proposed new depth at some time in the indefinite future?

(6) If a larger seaway proposal is accepted and supported by the United States Administration, is such acceptance and support based on solid economic studies? If so, can such studies be made available to us?

(7) Mr. Castle indicated to Freifeld that whatever consideration he might give to the construction of facilities of larger dimensions would be within the framework of his present $105 million authorization and would be predicated upon construction by the United States at Iroquois in addition to Barnhart. If the pressure for larger facilities continues and mounts in the United States but if these facilities cannot be financed out of Mr. Castle's present authorization, do you think that a new approach will be made to Congress for more funds, or will the idea be dropped?

(8) Have you any information to support Castle's statement that bills will be introduced in the next session by the Minnesota Representatives to authorize expenditure of $100 million for channel deepening in the Upper Lakes?

4. We realize that this is a large order and would be glad to receive whatever light you may be able to throw on these questions. If a transcript or report of Mr. Castle's October 7 hearings in Washington is available, we would be glad to receive one or more copies.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Yesterday, during a friendly and interesting lunch with Mr. Lewis Castle, Administrator of the United States St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, we had an opportunity to discuss with him several aspects of the proposal to construct on the St. Lawrence Seaway canals and locks of dimensions larger than those set out in the 1941 agreement. Although this was the first opportunity for any real talk between Mr. Castle and the members of this embassy, and although we could not, therefore, press our search for information as far as we might otherwise have done, nevertheless the meeting provided some information on a number of points that we hope will be of value.

2. We began by asking Mr. Castle how his views were developing on the proposals for larger United States canals. He responded by saying that he, personally hoped that it would prove possible to stick to what he called the "Welland Canal dimensions". However, there had been a good deal of pressure, as we knew, from ship-owners in the United States for larger locks and he had thought it advisable to give these interests their day in court. Many ship-owners believed, he said, that their vessels would be cleared more quickly (and consequently more cheaply) through the locks if the dimensions were made a little larger. With longer and wider locks there would also be less risk of damage and, in general, greater manoeuvrability.

3. He had just received, he said, a report on the increased cost that would be involved in building somewhat larger locks. He did not tell us the dimensions on which this costing study had been based; but he did say that it now appeared that each lock would cost approximately $2 million more if it were built to the larger specifications. He was clearly speaking of locks that would be both longer and wider than specified in the 1941 agreement. Whether or not he had in mind locks deeper over the sills than 30', we could not be sure.

4. The final decision on the size of the United States locks would rest with him, he told us; and he would be making up his mind within the next ten days. As soon as a decision had been reached, he would get in touch directly with Mr. Chevrier. In spite of his own preference for the Welland Canal dimensions, he could see that it might be worthwhile to pay something to secure a rather higher degree of manoeuvrability. On the other hand, he had told United States ship-owners that even if their vessels could be cleared more quickly and safely through somewhat larger United States locks in the international rapids section, they would still have to go through the locks in the Welland Canal where the fit would be snugger. At no point in our conversation did he suggest that the Welland Canal might be enlarged or duplicated within the near future. Indeed, he seemed to take the present dimensions of the Welland Canal as perhaps the most important fixed point in the complicated equation that he has to solve; and the fact that the Welland Canal locks would remain at their present size figured in his remarks as an important reason for discounting the argument of United States ship-owners for larger locks in the international rapids section.

5. He also suggested that the proposals for larger locks might be ruled out by financial limitations. Mr. Castle said that, on the basis of 1952 prices, the cost of constructing the navigation works to be built on the United States side of the border had been estimated at approximately $88 million. At 1954 prices for labour, material and equipment, the cost would probably be about $94 million. To this figure there would have to be added some provision for contingencies and administrative expenses. All in all, then, there would be little cushion between the total costs as currently estimated and the $105 million authorized under the Wiley Act. Although the implication of these remarks clearly seemed to be that the present authorization would be insufficient to pay the cost of constructing substantially larger canals, Mr. Castle gave us no reason to believe that any serious thought was being given to the possibility of another approach to Congress for additional funds. We should probably add that nothing was said, either, about the possibility of the United States not building a canal and lock at Iroquois. If they did not build there, of course, the present authorization would be sufficient to permit the construction of substantially larger facilities at Massena. But he appeared to be taking it for granted that the United States would build at Iroquois and the financial aspects of the problem seemed to resolve themselves in his mind into the question of whether there would be room within the authorization of $105 million for a modest increase in the dimensions of the United States canals in order to provide rather more leeway for ships that could, with care, negotiate canals of the dimensions specified in the 1941 agreement.

6. In reply to a question about the type of shipping which he thought would make most use of the new canals, he said that he personally had no desire to build canals on the United States side large enough to accommodate vessels of greater tonnage than the Welland Canal was designed for. No doubt larger vessels would one day ply from the Atlantic to the heart of the continent. But building canals for them would be a "task for another generation", he said. If it was ultimately decided that the dimensions of the United States locks should be somewhat enlarged, it would only be in order to make possible easier handling of the vessels that at present could pass through the Welland Canal. He also stated that the pressure for larger locks had come almost exclusively from mercantile interests in the United States.

7. So far as we could learn yesterday, no economic or engineering studies on the proposal for larger locks and canals have been carried out by any of the United States agencies concerned with the St. Lawrence Seaway. Mr. Castle's staff, which, as you know, is still quite small, has prepared only two reports. The first is the costing study prepared by his engineers which we have already mentioned. The other is an estimate of traffic potential prepared by Dr. Hazard. Dr. Hazard's report, we understand, has now been submitted to Mr. Castle for consideration.

8. We would sum up our impression after this conversation with Mr. Castle as follows:

(a) It is quite possible that he may decide to leave unaltered the proposed dimensions for the United States locks at 800' long by 80' wide by 30' over the sills.

(b) If the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation does decide to increase the dimensions of the United States locks, the increase will be comparatively small and will be made principally in the interest of greater manoeuvrability for ships that can now be accommodated in the Welland Canal.

(c) In that case, the corporation will not try very hard, if at all, to persuade the Canadian authorities to increase the dimensions of the new Canadian locks.

(d) In any event, there is no thought in Mr. Castle's mind of proposing that the Welland Canal be either enlarged or duplicated within the near future.

(e) So far as we can judge, Mr. Castle is sincerely anxious to get forward as quickly as possible with the construction of canals of approximately the same dimensions as those that have hitherto been contemplated in the engineering studies made by the United States and Canadian Governments and will not permit the will-o'-the-wisp of ideally dimensioned canals to delay an all-out programme of construction next spring.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY: THE QUESTION OF IROQUOIS

I am attaching a telegram from Mr. Heeney in which he recommends that Mr. Howe, who will be seeing Secretary of Defence Charles Wilson at the beginning of next week, urge upon Mr. Wilson that the United States should refrain from building a canal and lock on its side at Iroquois. In Mr. Heeney's view there appears to be an increasing likelihood of the United States building at Iroquois, as directed by the Wiley-Dondero legislation; certainly we have no concrete evidence that the United States will not build.

2. One reason for Mr. Heeney's concern is a recent speech by Dr. Danielian, President of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Association (copy attached, and relevant parts marked on page 4).¹⁴⁶ Danielian devoted part of this speech to the necessity for the lowest possible tolls and gave a thinly veiled criticism of Canada for duplicating works (that will have to be amortized) at Iroquois which the United States is going to construct. Quite apart from the question of tolls, the explicit assumption throughout Danielian's speech is that the United States is going to construct at Iroquois.

3. In this regard I should mention that when the United States Seaway Corporation met with the Canadian Seaway Authority to discuss technical questions in September, Mr. Lewis Castle, President of the Corporation, called on an officer of American Division. In reply to a direct question Mr. Castle stated that he had not yet come to any decision about Iroquois and that, while he still considered that it was mandatory for the United States to construct there under the terms of the Wiley-Dondero Act he would postpone a decision until he had a chance to consult with Congressional leaders; this, Mr. Castle said, was surely the intelligent thing to do in view of Canada's decision to build at Iroquois.

4. There are two other factors that bear on this question. The Canadian Authority is currently moving a bridge from Lachine to Iroquois. This bridge will span the present canal and thereby give access to construction equipment for the new Canadian 27' canal. This means that Canada has already begun its preliminary works at Iroquois, and construction of the new canal and lock will proceed apace. If the United States were to build at Iroquois, the United States would therefore be duplicating works authorized by Canada in December 1951 and begun in November-December 1954. Mr. Danielian conveniently forgets that Canada enacted its legislation 2 1/2 years before passage of the Wiley-Dondero Act.

¹⁴⁶ Voir/See Montreal Gazette, October 28, 1954.

5. The other factor is that officials here are inclined to the view that while the United States Seaway Corporation indeed must construct at Iroquois under the terms of the Wiley-Dondero Act, there is nothing in the Act that makes it mandatory for the United States to do so now. As we interpret the Act (and we have recently asked the Embassy for its opinion on this point), the United States could postpone construction for some years at Iroquois, until such a time as traffic conditions warrant duplication of facilities. When that time comes the United States could then construct at Iroquois and thus finally fulfil the terms of the Wiley Act. If our interpretation of the Act is not correct the Administration admittedly would have to seek an amendment of the Act from the new Congress in order to refrain from building at Iroquois. We can, of course, appreciate the Administration's reluctance to do that, especially in view of the fact that another phase of the St. Lawrence project — Mr. Dewey's arrangements for the distribution of power — is apparently going to be investigated by a Senate Committee on Senator Lehman's instigation.

6. Mr. Heeney's assessment may well be right. However, your officials are not so sure that the Administration has made up its mind to build now at Iroquois (in fact, we learned on November 10 that Mr. Castle had not yet made up his mind on this point). Accordingly, it may not be advisable to approach the Administration with the pre-conceived notion that a decision unfavourable to us has already been taken regarding Iroquois. On the contrary, Mr. Howe might mention briefly and casually to Mr. Wilson that the Canadian Seaway Authority has already taken the first steps to build the Iroquois canal on Canadian soil (see the attached press release from the Seaway Authority dated November 13). If Mr. Wilson replies that the United States has taken a decision to build now at Iroquois, I have no doubt that Mr. Howe can then marshal the necessary arguments to impress upon Mr. Wilson the desirability of the United States not duplicating the Canadian canal at Iroquois now.

7. Because of lack of time I am enclosing an additional copy of this memorandum and its enclosures for transmission to Mr. Howe, if you desire.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY: CONSTRUCTION BY CANADA OF NAVIGATIONAL FACILITIES AT IROQUOIS

We are becoming increasingly concerned over the possibility that the United States may go forward with its plans to construct a canal at Iroquois that would parallel the Canadian canal. We have not considered it politic to raise this question directly either with the State Department or with the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation. But in speaking to State Department officials and to Mr. Castle about other aspects of the seaway, we have received the impression that plans here are being made on the firm assumption that a United States canal will be built at Iroquois.

2. It seems to us that such an outcome should be avoided if at all possible. The construction of duplicate canals at Iroquois would certainly lead to considerable criticism in this country. Indeed, the first ominous rumblings are to be heard in the speech given by Danielian in Cincinnati on the 27th of October. Most of such criticism would, we are afraid, be directed at Canada no matter whether Canada or the United States is the first to begin construction. Criticism here of the Canadian determination to build a canal at Iroquois on the grounds that such action would increase the capital costs and so the tolls that are to be applied towards amortization might perhaps be kept under some measure of control by skilful Canadian publicity work in this country. However, we would imagine that the construction of duplicate canals at Iroquois might also arouse considerable criticism in Canada of the policy adopted by the government. Twin canals there, without any paralleling of the navigational facilities in other reaches of the seaway, might seem such a strange result as to provide a target on which all those who for various reasons oppose the present policy could concentrate their fire. It would seem to us that both those who are deeply disappointed that an all-Canadian seaway is not to be built immediately and those, especially in the prairies, who have doubted the necessity for Canada to build any of the facilities that the United States is prepared to build, would in such circumstances be able to join forces and charge that the negotiations between the two countries had produced a monstrosity.

3. For these reasons, we have been wondering whether there might not be some way to dissuade the United States authorities from going forward with their plans to build at Iroquois. We are reasonably certain that it would be unwise for us to try our hand at the task, since any Canadian attempt, except at a very high level, to have the United States scrap its plans for a canal at Iroquois would almost certainly be interpreted, we think, as a sign of weakness. However, we think there would be less risk of such an interpretation if the task were undertaken by a senior Canadian Minister. Since Mr. Howe is to pay a visit at the first of next week to Mr. Wilson, the Secretary of Defense, and since the Department of Defense has responsibility under the President for the operations of the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, the idea has occurred to us that Mr. Howe might think it advisable to raise this matter with Mr. Wilson.

4. Knowing Mr. Wilson so well, Mr. Howe no doubt would have his own ideas of how best to raise this matter. In order to explain, however, the kind of approach that we have in mind, we may perhaps be forgiven for sketching very roughly the course of the remarks that we think Mr. Howe might make. After referring to the weight of public opinion in many parts of Canada in favour of an all-Canadian seaway, he might reaffirm the irrevocable decision of the Canadian Government to construct a canal at Iroquois. Then he might go on to say that it was his understanding that the campaign in the United States in favour of the seaway had been motivated, first, by the desire that the seaway be built by someone and, second, by the desire that the United States have some share in its construction and so some voice in its operation. Mr. Howe might then point out that both these objectives could be achieved even if the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation dropped its plans for building at Iroquois. Moreover, he could suggest that inevitably there would be criticism if, in the upshot, parallel canals were built at Iroquois without parallel facilities being constructed in any other stretch of the seaway.

5. It is our opinion that such an approach would have some hope of success and, indeed, that if — as we suspect — the United States authorities are still planning to build at Iroquois, no other type of approach is likely to be effective. We also think that, if an effort is to be made to budge the United States from what we believe to be its present position, it would be unwise to delay. We should therefore be grateful if you would consider this proposal. If you think it has merit, perhaps you might be able to discuss it with Mr. Howe before he leaves for Washington.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], November 22, 1954

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT

There have been a number of recent developments on which I think you might wish to be brought up to date.

Iroquois Navigation Works

2. Mr. Howe has been assured by Secretary of Defence Charles Wilson that, although the Administration cannot say so publicly, they intend to "drag their feet" so as to enable Canada to get ahead with building the canal and lock on the Canadian side. This might subsequently require Congressional action in view of the terms of the Wiley Act, but Mr. Howe is satisfied that we can proceed on the assumption that the United States will not compete with us now at Iroquois.

3. While this is most welcome — if not completely unexpected — news, we will still encounter some public relations problems in both countries. In the United States, Dr. Danielian has recently made two speeches criticizing Canada for constructing duplicate facilities at Iroquois, thus increasing the total cost of the deep waterway and the tolls required to amortize it. Now that the seaway is a certainty, Danielian's organization has probably lost its main raison d'être; he is now apparently assuming the role of protector of lake shipping interests and may well continue with this line of criticism. In Canada, some critics have asked why — if we maintain that for Canada to construct at Barnhart now would be economically wasteful, and injurious to our relations with the United States — the same does not apply to Iroquois. As the Globe and Mail puts it: "Whether Canadian construction (at Iroquois) constitutes half a courageous stand, or half an inexcusable waste makes an interesting question."

4. It would not be surprising if the Globe's line were taken up further in forthcoming months. To refute both it and the Danielian thesis about duplication, I think we have an even stronger argument than has been used hitherto. Canada took its decision, and enacted legislation, to build all St. Lawrence deep water navigation facilities between Lake Erie and Montreal, including Iroquois, in 1951. In 1952 we secured the concurrence of the United States to this. The Wiley Act, authorizing United States construction at Barnhart and Iroquois, was passed in 1954. Later in 1954 Canada decided to refrain from building at Barnhart now, but to continue with its plans to build all the other works, including Iroquois, in accordance with a decision and legislation on our books for three years. Canada has now begun preliminary work at Iroquois. In this context, therefore, Canada surely cannot be construed as the duplicator.¹⁴⁷

Iroquois Control Dam

5. The United States engineers have agreed to the Canadian proposal to shift the location of the control dam at Iroquois about 2,000 yards downstream. The State Department, the Department, and the I.J.C. are in agreement that this does not require re-opening the I.J.C.'s Order of Approval of October 29, 1952, (although the Federal Power Commission's license to the Power Authority of the State of New York (PASNY) will have to be amended). At its former site the control dam would have been located about half in each country, and it had been agreed between the power entities that Ontario Hydro (HEPCO) would construct the project. However, in its new location the dam will lie almost entirely on the United States side of the boundary, and the power entities have agreed that PASNY will construct it.

6. You will recall that the power entities arranged to divide between themselves the responsibility for the construction of the various component power works on the basis of practicability and of a more or less equal division of total costs. The Iroquois dam will cost nearly $23 millions and its construction by PASNY instead of HEPCO shifts the allocation of work between them considerably in PASNY's favour. Their officials are, therefore, discussing rearrangement of the work programme in order to restore the balance, and are attempting to shift some of the excavation and dredging work to HEPCO.

Dredging

7. About $93 millions of dredging is to be done in the power project of which about $72 millions is on the United States side and $21 millions on the Canadian. (These figures may have to be lowered somewhat in the light of recent developments). In addition, there is dredging to be done for the seaway on both sides of the boundary. It had heretofore been assumed that because of the highly restrictive United States law, Canadian dredges could not operate on the other side of the ¹⁴⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

No — but the US gov't has been instructed to build & we have been authorized. Moreover it could be said that if this argument applies to Iroquois why not also to Barnhart. [L.B. Pearson] boundary. This law would have meant that Canadian dredging interests would have been precluded from operating on the U.S. side, and also that two dredges would have to be employed on a piece of work straddling the boundary that one dredge could otherwise have handled, thus raising costs. It also meant that the problem of overall division of costs could not be effected so readily.

8. However, we have just learned that the United States Administration has decided to permit Canadian dredges to operate on its side of the boundary. This decision was taken on Mr. Anderson's request on behalf of Secretary Wilson, who had asked that the relevant coastal shipping and navigation laws be waived in the interest of the national defence. This was apparently the only way in which the waiver could be made. We have asked the Embassy to report on the precise basis on which the decision was made. As you will appreciate, the Canadian decision to accept or refuse to have U.S. dredges in Canada has serious implications not only as regards dredging for the power project ($93 millions) but also dredging for navigation works below Cornwall ($25 millions) and dredging in the Upper Lakes ($100 millions; we hope that the U.S. Congress will appropriate the funds for these last-mentioned works).

Senate Investigation of Power Arrangements
